THE TIMES LAW REPORTS,

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1927.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Hill, J.) } 1927. Oct. 17.

THE GERTRUD.*

Ship—Collision—Action against owners—Writ—Acceptance of service—Appearance—Bail—Solicitors' undertaking—Alleged mistake as to their authority—Motion by them to set aside acceptance and undertaking—Refusal.

This was a motion by Messrs. Bramwell, Clayton, and Clayton, solicitors, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, to set aside the acceptance of service of the writ and an undertaking to appear and put in bail, which they had given in an action of collision brought by the owners of the Italian steamship Favignana against the owners of the Norwegian steamship Gertrud.

Mr. Harold Stranger supported the motion; Mr. R. H. Balloch appeared for the plaintiffs.

Mr. STRANGER said that the motion was made on the ground that Messrs. Bramwell, Clayton, and Clayton, in giving their undertaking through their Liverpool agents, had acted under a mistake as to their authority. They had received their instructions through Messrs. Wilsons, underwriters' agents, of Newcastle, who were acting for the underwriters of the Gertrud, but in fact they had no authority from the defendants, the owners of the Gertrud, to appear or intervene in the action. So soon as they had discovered their mistake they had communicated with the solicitors on the other side. The Gertrud was still in the Mersey, where the collision occurred, and could be arrested by the plaintiffs.

Mr. BALLOCH submitted that the Court had no power to make the order asked for, and, in any event, ought not to do so on the material before it. The position was quite clear. An undertaking by a solicitor to appear and put in bail was a contract, and failure to perform it rendered a solicitor liable to attachment. It was a contract by the solicitor on behalf of his principal, and, if he had no authority from his alleged principal, he was liable to an action for breach of warranty of authority. The Court could not set aside a contract merely on the ground that there had been a mistake by one party. There was no desire to embarrass Messrs. Bramwell, Clayton, and Clayton, but the plaintiffs were not satisfied that the defendant owners had not given authority. There was no direct evidence from them to that effect.

MR. JUSTICE HILL, in dismissing the motion, with costs, said that he did not think that he could set aside the undertaking, because to do so would be to destroy that which would be the basis of an action by the plaintiffs for breach of warranty of authority. The Court had not before it any statement by the owners of the Gertrud with reference to the matter of authority. But if it were the fact that, at the moment of giving the undertaking, Messrs. Bramwell, Clayton, and Clayton had no authority from the owners, and if he were asked by motion to compel Messrs. Bramwell, Clayton, and Clayton to carry out their undertaking, different considerations would arise. In the event of an action for breach of warranty of authority it might be that the solicitors would have an action over against the agents of the underwriters. He hoped that the result of these proceedings would be that all the persons who were, or ought to be, liable would very quickly enter an appearance.

[Solicitors—Messrs. Stokes and Stokes, for Messrs. Bramwell, Clayton, and Clayton, Newcastle-upon-Tyne; Messrs. Wm. A. Crump and Son, for the owners of the Favignana.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR NOVA SCOTIA v. LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF NOVA SCOTIA.*

Canada — Nova Scotia — Constitution — Legislative Council—Number of members—Tenure of office—British North America Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 3), ss. 88, 92 (1)—Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia of 1923, c. 2, ss. 1, 2.

The Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, acting by and with the advice of the Executive Council of Nova Scotia, has power to appoint in the name of the Crown so many members of the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia that the total number would (a) exceed 21 or (b) exceed the total number at the union mentioned in section 88 of the British North America Act, 1867. The membership of the Council is not limited in number. The tenure of office of members of the Council appointed before May 7, 1925, is during the pleasure of his Majesty the King represented in that behalf by the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia acting by and with the advice of the Executive Council of Nova Scotia.

This was an appeal relating to the Constitution of the Province of Nova Scotia.

The Hon. W. Lorimer Hall, K.C. (Attorney-General for Nova Scotia), and Mr. S. E. Pocock appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Stuart Jenks, K.C., and Mr. W. C. Macdonald (both of the Canadian Bar) for the respondents.

* Reported by SIR W. J. SOULSBY, Barrister-at-Law.

The Lord Chancellor, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said :—This appeal, which is brought by leave of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, raises some questions of great importance relating to the Constitution of that Province.

On May 14, 1926, the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia in Council, acting under section 226 of the Revised Statutes of the Province, referred to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia for hearing and consideration the following matters :—

"1. Has the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, acting by and with the advice of the Executive Council of Nova Scotia, power or authority to appoint in the name of the Crown by instrument under the Great Seal of the Province so many members of the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia that the total number of the members of such Council holding their offices or places as such members would

"(a) exceed twenty-one or

"(b) exceed the total number of the members of said Council who held their offices or places as such members at the union mentioned in section 88 of the British North America Act, 1867 ?

"2. Is the membership of the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia limited in number ?

"3. Is the tenure of office of members of the said Council appointed thereto prior to May 7, 1925, during pleasure or during good behaviour or for life ?

"4. If such tenure is during pleasure, is it during the pleasure of his Majesty the King, or during the pleasure of his Majesty represented in that behalf by the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia acting by and with the advice of the Executive Council of Nova Scotia ? "

The matters so referred to the Supreme Court were heard and considered by a Court consisting of four Judges, who differed in opinion. The Chief Justice answered parts (a) and (b) of question No. 1 in the affirmative. His answer to question No. 2 was that at present a full house is 21 members, but the number can be increased at any time by the Lieutenant-Governor. His answer to question No. 3 was "during pleasure" ; and his answer to question No. 4 was "during the pleasure of his Majesty represented in that behalf by the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia acting by and with the advice of the Executive Council for Nova Scotia." The opinion of Mr. Justice Chisholm was substantially in agreement with that of the Chief Justice ; but Mr. Justice Mellish and Mr. Justice Carroll took other views. Thereupon the Supreme Court, in accordance with Rule 3 of the rules regulating appeals to his Majesty in Council from Nova Scotia, certified pro forma for all purposes of appeal to his Majesty in Council that its opinion on the matters referred to with the reasons therefor was according to the opinion of the Chief Justice and his reasons therefor, and ordered that final judgment be entered accordingly pro forma for all purposes of appeal to his Majesty in Council. It is from the judgment so pronounced that this appeal is brought.

In order to arrive at a decision on the matters in controversy, it is necessary to go some way back into the history of Nova Scotia. There had been for some time a Council with legislative and executive authority when, on February 6, 1838, her Majesty, Queen Victoria, issued her Commission to the Earl of Durham appointing him Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief of the Province, and directing that (in addition to the general Assembly of freeholders and settlers referred to in the Commission) there should be within the Province two distinct and separate councils to be respectively called the Legislative Council and the Executive Council and to have the powers therein mentioned ; and the Commission proceeded as follows :—

"And we do hereby appoint and declare that the said Executive Council and the said Legislative Council respectively, shall hereafter consist of such and so many members, as shall from time to time for that purpose be nominated and appointed by us, under our Sign Manual and Signet, or as shall be provisionally appointed by you, the said John George, Earl of Durham, until our pleasure therein shall be known. Provided, nevertheless, and we do hereby declare our will and pleasure to be that the total number of the members for the time being of our said Executive Council, resident within our said Province, shall not at any time, by any provisional appointment, be raised to a greater number in the whole than nine, and that the total number of members of the said Legislative Council, resident within our said Province, shall not at any time by any such provisional appointments be raised to a greater number in the whole than fifteen ; and we do further direct and appoint that five members of our said Executive Council shall be a quorum for the despatch of the business thereof, and that eight members of our said Legislative Council shall be a quorum for the despatch of the business thereof ; and we do further direct and appoint that the members of our said respective Councils shall hold their places therein during our pleasure and not otherwise."

The Commissions subsequently issued to Sir John Colburne (afterwards Lord Seaton) in December, 1838, to Mr. Charles Poulett Thomson (afterwards Lord Sydenham) in September, 1839, to Sir Charles Bagot in October, 1841, and to Sir Charles Theophilus Metcalfe in February, 1842, appointing them successively to be Captains-General and Governors-in-Chief of Nova Scotia, contained directions as to the constitution and appointment of the two Councils similar to those contained in Lord Durham's Commission. In the Commission issued to Earl Cathcart on his appointment to the Governorship in March, 1846, the same directions were repeated with the substitution of 21 for 15 as the maximum number of members of the Legislative Council who might be provisionally appointed by the Governor ; and like directions were contained in the Commissions issued successively to the Earl of Elgin in October, 1846, to Sir Edmund Walker Head in September, 1854, and to Viscount Monck on November 2, 1861. As the Commission to Viscount Monck remained in force until the Confederation of Canada in 1867, it is desirable to quote here the exact terms of the directions as to the number and constitution of the Legislative Council which were contained in that Commission. They ran as follows :—

"And we do hereby declare our pleasure to be that the said Legislative Council shall consist of such and so many members as have been or shall hereafter be from time to time for that purpose nominated and appointed by us under our Sign-Manual and Signet, or as shall be provisionally appointed by you until our will therein shall be known, all which members shall hold their places in the said Council during our pleasure : Provided, nevertheless, and we do hereby declare our pleasure to be that the total number of the members of the said Legislative Council for the time being resident within our said Province shall not at any time by any such provisional appointments be raised to a greater number in the whole than twenty-one."

This, then, was the position when the British North America Act of 1867 was passed. That Act provided (by section 88) as follows :—

"The constitution of the Legislature of each of the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, continue as it exists at the union, until altered under the authority of this Act; and the House of Assembly of New Brunswick existing at the passing of this Act shall, unless sooner dissolved, continue for the period for which it was elected."

By section 92 (1) of the same Act it was provided that in each Province the Legislature might exclusively make laws in relation to "the amendment from time to time, notwithstanding anything in this Act, of the constitution of the Province except as regards the office of Lieutenant-Governor." By an Act of the Province of Nova Scotia passed on April 18, 1872, it was enacted as follows :—

"After the passing of this Act the appointment of members of the Legislative Council in the Province of Nova Scotia shall be vested in the Lieutenant-Governor, who shall make such appointments in the Queen's name by instrument under the Great Seal of the Province."

In the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia of 1923, cap. 2, the above enactment appeared in the following form :—

"Section 1.—In this chapter, unless the context otherwise requires, the expression 'Council' means the Legislative Council.

"Section 2.—The appointment of members of the Council is vested in the Governor-in-Council, who shall make such appointment in the name of the Crown by instrument under the Great Seal of the Province."

The word "Governor" in this enactment is defined as meaning the Lieutenant-Governor. Lastly, by an Act of the Province passed on May 7, 1925, the section last quoted of the Revised Statutes of 1923 was amended by adding thereto a provision that every member of the Council thereafter appointed should hold his seat in the Council for the term of ten years from the date of his appointment. It is by reason of this enactment that the third question referred to the Supreme Court was confined to members appointed before May 7, 1925.

These being the relevant statutes and documents, their Lordships proceed to consider the questions referred to the Supreme Court in their order.

The first and second questions may conveniently be dealt with together.

It is plain from the above statement that the Commissions issued to successive Governors from the year 1838 until the union of Canada did not by their terms impose any limit upon the number of members of the Legislative Council of the Province who might be appointed by the Sovereign. There was indeed a limit—originally of 15 and afterwards of 21—upon the number of such members who might be provisionally appointed by the Governor subject to confirmation by the Queen; but this provision in no way purported to restrict the power of the Queen herself to appoint "such and so many members" of the Council as she should from time to time think fit. In the year 1838, when the number of Legislative Councillors to be provisionally appointed by the Governor was limited by the Commission to 15, Queen Victoria, in fact, appointed 19 such Councillors; and, although the number was never, in fact, raised above 21, there was nothing in the Commissions which would have prevented her Majesty from so raising the number at any time during that period.

Then was there anything outside the Commissions to limit the number to 21? For this purpose stress was laid on behalf of the respondents on a correspondence which passed between the Lieutenant-Governor for the time being of the Province (Viscount Falkland) and Lord Stanley, as Colonial Secretary, in the year 1845, and it is true that in a letter dated August 20, 1845, Lord Stanley seemed to concur in the view that, as a part of certain changes then contemplated, the number of Legislative Councillors might be fixed at 21. But in the Commission issued to Lord Cathcart shortly after the date of this correspondence, while the maximum number of provisional appointments to the Council was for the first time raised to 21, no limit was placed upon the number of members who might be permanently appointed by the Sovereign; and the inference must be that it was the intention of Queen Victoria, while in practice confining her appointments to 21, not to impose any limit on her own power to make appointments exceeding that number. Similar observations apply to a letter of May 4, 1846, written by Mr. W. E. Gladstone as Secretary of State for the Colonies; and it is noticeable that in February, 1864, the Duke of Newcastle, while declining on grounds of policy to advise her Majesty to increase the number of the Council above 21 for the mere purpose of giving a majority in that body to the Government of the day, expressed no doubt as to the power of the Queen to take that course if she had thought fit to do so. Their Lordships find nothing in this correspondence to limit the number of the Legislative Council.

But it was argued that section 88 of the British North America Act, 1867, which provided that the constitution of the Legislature of Nova Scotia should, subject to the provisions of that Act, "continue as it exists at the union, until altered under the authority of this Act," had the effect of limiting the number of Legislative Councillors either to 18—the number of Councillors who were actually in office at the date of the union—or to 21, the number then ordinarily appointed. Their Lordships are unable to accept this contention. It is the constitution of the Legislature, and not the number of persons actually or usually holding office under that constitution, which was to continue until altered under the authority of the Act; and the constitution then existing provided for the appointment of a Legislative Council not limited except by the decisions from time to time taken by the Sovereign under the advice of her Ministers.

It was further argued that, even assuming that before and at the date of the union the Sovereign had power on the advice of her Ministers in the United Kingdom to increase the membership of the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia, that power has not passed to the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province but remains vested in the Sovereign in this country. Their Lordships cannot agree with that view. Whether on the passing of the British North America Act, 1867, the power to appoint the members of the Legislative Council was delegated by virtue of that Act to the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, as the representative of the Crown for all purposes of provincial government, it is unnecessary to inquire; for at all events that power has been vested in him since the passing of the Nova Scotia Act of 1872 and is now exercisable by him on the advice of his Executive Council. It has not been suggested that either the Act of 1872, which vested the appointment of members of the Legislative Council in the Lieutenant-Governor, or the statute of 1923, which declares the appointment of such members to be vested in the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, was not within the powers conferred upon the provincial Legislature by section 92 (1) of the Act of 1867; and in their Lordships' opinion the right to increase the membership of the Council is not severable from the right to appoint new members. The power which was formerly reserved to the Sovereign was a power to appoint "such and so many members" of the Council as might from time to time appear expedient; and it is this power—which includes the power of increase—which has now become vested in the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. No doubt the exercise of the Lieutenant-Governor's power to increase the number of Legislative Councillors would be restrained by the considerations of policy set out in the letter of the Duke of Newcastle above referred to; but in law the membership of the Legislative Council is unlimited.

Their Lordships would therefore answer both parts of question 1 in the affirmative and question 2 in the negative.

The answer to the third question referred to the Supreme Court is dictated by similar considerations based on the history of the Province. It was expressly provided by Lord Durham's Commission of 1838 and by the Commissions issued to successive Governors after that time and before the union that the members of the Legislative Council should hold their places therein during the Queen's pleasure; and, notwithstanding a suggestion made by the Council in the year 1846 that their tenure should be for life, no change was made in the form of the Commissions. It follows that, according to the constitution of the Legislature as it existed at the time of the union, the members of the Legislative Council were appointed during pleasure; and in this respect, as in others, the constitution was continued by section 88 of the Act of 1867.

With regard to the fourth question, their Lordships agree with the opinion of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Chisholm that the tenure is during the pleasure of the Sovereign represented in that behalf by the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia acting by and with the advice of the Executive Council of the Province. The effect of the Nova Scotia Act of 1872 as re-enacted in the Revised Statutes of 1923 is to vest in the Lieutenant-Governor in Council the appointment of members of the Legislative Council during pleasure; and in their Lordships' opinion this means that they are to be appointed during the pleasure of the appointing authority. It would be strange if the effect of the legislation of 1872 and 1923 were to enable the Lieutenant-Governor to make appointments which might be revoked by the Sovereign acting under the advice of his Ministers in this country; and in their Lordships' opinion this was not the intention or effect of the statutes in question. This view is supported by section 23, subsections 37 and 39, of c. 1 of the Revised Statutes, which provide as follows:—

"(37) Words authorizing the appointment of any public officer or functionary, or any deputy, include the power of removing him, reappointing him, or appointing another in his stead, from time to time, in the discretion of the authority in whom the power of appointment is vested.

"(39) Every officer appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor, unless it is otherwise provided in the enactment under which the appointment is made, shall remain in office during pleasure only."

The result is that their Lordships find themselves substantially in agreement with the opinions of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Chisholm on every point; and they will humbly advise his Majesty that the questions referred to the Supreme Court should be answered as follows:—

Question 1 (a) and (b).—Yes.

Question 2.—At present a full house is 21, but the number can be increased by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

Question 3.—During pleasure.

Question 4.—During the pleasure of his Majesty represented in that behalf by the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia acting by and with the advice of the Executive Council of Nova Scotia.

No question arises as to costs.

Court of Criminal Appeal. (Lord Hewart, C.J., Avory and Salter, JJ.) — 1927. Oct. 24.

REX v. MOSCOVITCH.*

Criminal Law—Bigamy—Foreign marriage—Evidence of validity.

On an indictment for bigamy the validity of a foreign marriage must be proved by the evidence of a professional lawyer or of a person who is to be deemed by reason of his office to be skilled in the law of the country where it was celebrated.

This was an appeal by Barnett Moscovitch, who had been convicted at the Central Criminal Court of bigamy, sentence on him being postponed pending this appeal, for which a certificate was given.

The case raised questions regarding the proof of a marriage between Jews celebrated in a foreign country.

Mr. Hyman Harris appeared for the appellant; Mr. Frederick Levy for the prosecution.

Mr. Harris said that it was alleged that Moscovitch married Leah Moscovitch in 1881 at Lodz, Poland, which was then under the dominion of Russia. He lived with her there for 18 months, and they then both came to England, and lived here until he left her and went to America. He returned from America in 1920, and in 1925 he contracted what had been alleged to be a bigamous marriage with a widow named Sarah Evalanka. For the purposes of proving a charge of bigamy a Jewish marriage celebrated abroad was on precisely the same footing as any other marriage celebrated abroad. To sustain the indictment experts must give evidence that the marriage at Lodz was recognized by the law of the country of its celebration and was not merely binding according to Jewish law. No such evidence, however, was called in the present case.

Mr. Levy said that, even if there were no expert evidence of the relevant Russian law, there was a presumption that a marriage contracted abroad according to the rites of a religion was good without any proof that it was valid according to the law of the country where it was celebrated: Reg. v. Griffin (14 Cox C.C., 308). In Rex v. Shapiro (unreported), tried at the Central Criminal Court on December 10 and 11, 1925, the facts were precisely the same as in the present case, and the same point was taken by the defence, but the defendant was convicted and sentenced and there had been no appeal from that decision.

* Reported by G. F. L. Bridgman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Lord Chief Justice, in giving the judgment of the Court, said that the expert evidence on which the prosecution relied at the trial to prove the validity of the first marriage was that of a witness who was described as a rabbi and an ecclesiastical assessor of the chief rabbi's court. That witness, however, admitted that he could not say whether or not the marriage was valid by the law of Russia, although it would be binding on any Jew. He did not purport to speak with authority on Russian law, and, apart from his testimony, there was nothing that could be called expert evidence.

The law on the matter was quite clear. It was restated a few years ago in Rex v. Naguib ([1917] 1 K.B., 359), where it was held that on an indictment for bigamy the validity of a foreign marriage must be proved by expert evidence. That evidence might be that of a professional lawyer or that of a person who was peritus virtute officii: Reg. v. Povey (Dears., 32). The witness called for the prosecution in the present case was not a professional lawyer, nor was he to be deemed by reason of his office to be skilled in Russian law.

In the opinion of the Court there was no evidence which the Recorder of London was entitled to admit at the trial on the question whether Moscovitch's first "marriage" was legal according to Russian law. The appeal, therefore, succeeded, and the conviction must be quashed.

HALIFAX CORPORATION v. FAIRBANKS' ESTATE.*

Canada—Nova Scotia—Direct taxation—Powers of Province—Business tax—Imposition on owner of premises instead of occupier—Whether a "direct" tax—British North America Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 3), s. 92 (2).

The respondent estate, which was the owner of premises in Halifax, Nova Scotia, and leased them to the Crown for use as a railway ticket office, the Crown to pay the business taxes (if any), was assessed and rated to business tax on the premises by the Halifax Corporation under its charter, which provided that the owner of property let to the Crown or to any person exempt from taxation should be deemed to be in occupation thereof and should be assessed and rated to business tax if the premises were used for business purposes.

Held, that the tax was a direct tax falling within the authority of s. 92 (2) of the British North America Act, 1867, and was therefore within the powers of the Province under that section.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in a suit raising questions as to the validity and effect of certain legislation of the Province of Nova Scotia dealing with municipal taxation in the city of Halifax.

Mr. F. H. Bell, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and Mr. W. Gordon Brown appeared for the appellants; Mr. I. C. Rand, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and Mr. D. N. Pritt, K.C., for the respondents.

The Lord Chancellor, who delivered their Lordships' judgment, said:—The substantial question raised in this appeal is whether a tax imposed by the city of Halifax on the estate of John P. Fairbanks as the owner of certain premises in the city is valid, or whether (as the Supreme Court of Canada has held) it is void as not being "direct taxation" within the meaning of section 92 (2) of the British North America Act, 1867.

The city of Halifax levies under its charter three taxes called respectively a business tax, a household tax, and a real property tax. The business tax is payable by every person occupying real property for the purpose of any trade, profession or calling for purposes of gain, and is assessed on 50 per cent. of the capital value of such property. The household tax is payable by every occupier of any real property for residential purposes, and is assessed on 10 per cent. of the capital value of such property. The real property tax is a tax on the owners of all real property and is assessed on its capital value. By section 391 of the charter real property which is the property of his Majesty used for Imperial Dominion or Provincial purposes, or which is used for certain charitable and other public purposes there described, is exempt from real property tax. By section 392 no household tax or business tax is to be paid by the occupiers of any of the properties declared exempt from real property tax if such occupiers are the owners or lessees thereof and are occupying the same solely for the purposes of the association or other body specified as entitled to exemption. By section 394 it is enacted that property let to the Crown or to any person, corporation, or association, exempt from taxation, shall be deemed to be in the occupation of the owner thereof for business or residential purposes, as the case may be, and he shall be assessed and rated for household tax or business tax according to the purpose for which it is occupied.

The respondent estate is the owner of certain ground floor premises in the city and has let them to his Majesty the King, represented by the Minister of Railways and Canals of Canada, for a term of years, the lease providing that the demised premises shall only be used as a ticket office of the Canadian National Railways, and that the lessee shall pay the business taxes, if any; and the property is in fact used as a ticket office. The respondent estate, having been assessed and rated to business tax in respect of these premises, appealed to the Court of Tax Appeals for the city of Halifax, which confirmed the assessment, and the decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia; but on a further appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada that Court (by a majority) set aside the decision of the Courts in Nova Scotia, and held the tax to be ultra vires and void. Hence the present appeal.

In the course of the argument for the respondent estate it was suggested that an occupation by the Crown cannot be held to be for purposes of gain, and accordingly that the premises in question were not assessable to the business tax; but in their Lordships' view there is no substance in this argument. A business is undoubtedly carried on upon the premises, though on behalf of the Crown, and they are therefore within the ambit of the tax. It was also urged that the tax in dispute is a tax on property belonging to Canada, and so is void under section 125 of the British North America Act, 1867 ; but their Lordships do not consider that a tax on the owner of premises let to the Crown in right of the Dominion can be held to be a tax on the property of Canada. The real and substantial question to be decided is whether the tax is a direct tax falling within the authority of section 92 (2) of the British North America Act, 1867, or whether it is an indirect tax and so beyond the powers of the Province under that section ; and it was because the Supreme Court held the tax to be indirect that they declared the respondent estate not legally liable for payment.

The reasons for the decision of the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada were stated by Mr. Justice Newcombe in a lucid judgment, in the course of which he relied upon the often quoted statement of John Stuart Mill ("Political Economy," ed. 1886, vol. 2, p. 415), that "a direct tax is one which is demanded from the very persons who it is intended or desired should pay it," while "indirect taxes are those which are demanded from one person in the expectation and intention that he shall indemnify himself at the expense of another." The learned Judge held that such an expectation or intention might be inferred from the form in which the tax is imposed, or from the results which in the ordinary course of business transactions must be held to have been contemplated ; and he expressed the opinion that in the present case, where the owner is made liable for a tax which is imposed in respect of the purposes for which the tenant occupies the premises, it was only to be expected that the landlord would exact indemnity from the tenant. He held, therefore, that the tax was an indirect tax upon the tenant and beyond the powers of the Provincial Legislature. On the other hand, Mr. Justice Duff, who dissented from the judgment of the Court, called attention to the great difficulty of determining the actual incidence of local rates on occupiers, building owners and land owners ; and he quoted the opinion of Professor Seligman ("Income Tax," 1914), that the incidence of such rates in an urban district is determined by a great variety of factors depending on the demand for houses or business premises and the general state of trade. He declined therefore to act upon any general theory as to such incidence, and held the tax to be direct.

In considering the question so raised it is, their Lordships think, important to bear in mind that the problem to be solved is one of law, the answer to which depends upon a true understanding of the meaning of the expression "direct taxation within the Province" as used in the British North America Act, 1867. In this connexion some observations made by Lord Hobhouse in delivering the judgment of this Board in Bank of Toronto v. Lambe (3 The Times L.R., 742 ; 12 App. Cas., 575, at p. 581) are of value. The tax there in question was a tax imposed upon banks and insurance companies carrying on business within the Province of Quebec, and Lord Hobhouse dealt with the point as follows :—

"First, is the tax a direct tax ? For the argument of this question the opinions of a great many writers on political economy have been cited, and it is quite proper, or rather necessary, to have careful regard to such opinions, as has been said in previous cases before this Board. But it must not be forgotten that the question is a legal one, viz., what the words mean, as used in this statute ; whereas the economists are always seeking to trace the effect of taxation throughout the community, and are apt to use the words 'direct,' and 'indirect,' according as they find that the burden of a tax abides more or less with the person who first pays it. This distinction is illustrated very clearly by the quotations from a very able and clear thinker, the late Mr. Fawcett, who, after giving his tests of direct and indirect taxation, makes remarks to the effect that a tax may be made direct or indirect by the position of the taxpayers or by private bargains about its payment. Doubtless, such remarks have their value in an economical discussion. Probably it is true of every indirect tax that some persons are both the first and the final payers of it ; and of every direct tax that it affects persons other than the first payers ; and the excellence of an economist's definition will be measured by the accuracy with which it contemplates and embraces every incident of the thing defined. But that very excellence impairs its value for the purposes of the lawyer. The legislature cannot possibly have meant to give a power of taxation valid or invalid according to its actual results in particular cases. It must have contemplated some tangible dividing line referable to and ascertainable by the general tendencies of the tax and the common understanding of men as to those tendencies."

The result of these observations, which are closely applicable to the present case, is that their Lordships have primarily to consider, not whether in the view of an economist the business tax imposed on an owner under section 394 of the Halifax city charter would ultimately be borne by the owner or by someone else, but whether it is in its nature a direct tax within the meaning of section 92 (2) of the Act of Union. The framers of that Act evidently regarded taxes as divisible into two separate and distinct categories—namely, those that are direct and those which cannot be so described, and it is to taxation of the former character only that the powers of a provincial government are made to extend. From this it is to be inferred that the distinction between direct and indirect taxes was well known before the passing of the Act ; and it is undoubtedly the fact that before that date the classification was familiar to statesmen as well as to economists, and that certain taxes were then universally recognized as falling within one or the other category. Thus, taxes on property or income were everywhere treated as direct taxes ; and John Stuart Mill himself, following Adam Smith, Ricardo, and James Mill, said that a tax on rents falls wholly on the landlord and cannot be transferred to anyone else. "It merely takes so much from the landlord and transfers it to the State" ("Political Economy," vol. 2, p. 416). On the other hand, duties of customs and excise were regarded by everyone as typical instances of indirect taxation. When therefore the Act of Union allocated the power of direct taxation to the Province, it must surely have intended that the taxation of property and income should belong exclusively to the provincial legislatures, and that without regard to any theory as to the ultimate incidence of such taxation. To hold otherwise would be to suppose that the framers of the Act intended to impose on a provincial legislature the task of speculating as to the probable ultimate incidence of each particular tax which it might desire to impose, at the risk of having such tax held invalid if the conclusion reached should afterwards be held to be wrong.

What then is the effect to be given to Mill's formula above quoted ? No doubt it is valuable as providing a logical basis for the distinction already established between direct and indirect taxes, and perhaps also as a guide for determining as to any new or unfamiliar tax which may be imposed in which of the two categories it is to be placed ; but it cannot have the effect of disturbing the established classification of the old and well-known species of taxation, and making it necessary to apply a new test to every particular member of those species. The imposition of taxes on property and income, of death duties and of municipal and local rates is, according to the common understanding of the term, direct taxation, just as the exaction of a customs or excise duty on commodities or of a percentage duty on services would ordinarily be regarded as indirect taxation ; and although new forms of taxation may from time to time be added to one category or the other in accordance with Mill's formula, it would be wrong to use that formula as a ground for transferring a tax universally recognized as belonging to one class to a different class of taxation.

If this be the true view, then the reasoning of the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada requires reconsideration. It may be true to say of a particular tax on property, such as that imposed on owners by section 394 of the Halifax charter, that the taxpayer would very probably seek to pass it on to others ; but it may none the less be a tax on property and remain within the category of direct taxes. Probably no one would say that the income-tax levied in this country under Schedule A of the Income Tax Acts, although levied upon the occupier of property who is authorized to recover it from the owner, is not a direct tax. So, although a customs duty paid by a person importing commodities for his own use is not passed on to anyone else, it would hardly be contended that such a duty is a direct tax within the meaning of the British North America Act, 1867. It is the nature and general tendency of the tax and not its incidence in particular or special cases which must determine its classification and validity ; and, judged by that test, the business tax imposed on an owner under section 394 is a direct tax.

The authorities cited by Mr. Justice Newcombe show the use made by this Board of Mill's definition in determining whether a new or special tax, such as a stamp duty, a licence duty or a percentage on turnover, should be classed as direct or indirect ; but, with the possible exception of Cotton v. The King (30 The Times L.R., 71 ; [1914] A.C., 176), which seems to have turned on its own facts, they do not afford any instance in which a tax otherwise recognized as direct has been held to be indirect for the purposes of the British North America Act, 1867, by reason of any theory as to its ultimate incidence. On the other hand, the case of City of Montreal v. Attorney-General for Canada (39 The Times L.R., 17 ; [1923] A.C., 136), where land in Montreal belonging to the Crown in right of the Dominion and let to a tenant was held to have been validly assessed under a section of the city charter which enacted that persons occupying for commercial purposes land belonging to the Federal Government should be taxed as if they were the owners, appears to be directly in point and to support the contention of the appellants in this case.

Upon the whole their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the tax here in dispute is direct taxation within the meaning of the statute, and accordingly that this appeal should be allowed and the decision of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia restored, and that the respondent estate should be ordered to pay the costs of the appellants here and below ; and they will humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

K.B. Div. (MacKinnon, J.) 1927. Oct. 19.

ELLERMAN LINES, LIMITED v. READ AND OTHERS.*

The plaintiffs' steamer stranded in the Black Sea, and the defendant L. agreed to try to salve her on the terms (inter alia) that security for payment of his remuneration should be arranged in London and that he would not arrest the ship unless there was an attempt to remove her before the security had been given. Security was given in London in accordance with the salvage contract, and the ship was refloated and taken to Constantinople for temporary repairs. Before she was ready to leave, the defendant L. brought an action against the master in the Turkish Court on the ground that the ship was about to be removed without security having been given. By order of the Turkish Court the ship was arrested, and, as the master had no evidence of what had been done in London and L. took an oath that security had not been given, the Turkish Court awarded L. £23,890. L. then disposed of the ship, and the plaintiffs brought this action, (1) for damages for breach of contract, (2) for a declaration that the Turkish judgment was invalid, and (3) for an injunction to prevent the Turkish judgment from being enforced.

Held, (1) that as the plaintiffs were not parties to the Turkish proceedings the doctrine of res judicata could not apply to the question of breach of contract and the plaintiffs were entitled to damages, but these damages did not include the loss of the ship, since this was not a necessary consequence of the breach ; (2) that the Court had power to make the declaration asked for, and there would be a declaration that the plaintiffs were not liable to be sued in England on the Turkish judgment ; but (3) that the Court could not grant an injunction restraining the enforcement of the Turkish judgment in any part of the world.

In this case the plaintiffs, Ellerman Lines, Limited, brought an action against three defendants, Landi, Grech, and Read, for damages for breach of contract, for a declaration, and for an injunction.

Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Mr. David Davies appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Wilfrid Lewis for the defendant Read ; and Mr. Wilfrid Lewis and Mr. G. K. Rose for the defendant Landi. The other defendant was not present and was not represented.

In November, 1924, a steamer, the Falernian, belonging to the plaintiffs, stranded in the Black Sea. A salvage steamer, the Semper Paratus, of which, the plaintiffs said, the three defendants were joint owners, and of which the defendant Landi was master, came up. After negotiations the master of the

* Reported by W. B. Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Falernian entered into a salvage agreement with Landi on the terms of "no cure no pay." The agreement was in the usual form approved by Lloyd's and contained, inter alia, provisions that the remuneration for the salvage services should, in default of agreement, be fixed by arbitration in London; that security for payment of that remuneration should be arranged in London; and that the salvor would not arrest the ship except in the case of an attempt to remove her before security had been given.

The Falernian was refloated and taken to Constantinople, and was there placed in dry dock for temporary repairs to enable her to be towed to Marseilles for permanent repairs. The plaintiffs sent out a Dutch tug to tow her to Marseilles, and on July 6, 1925, she was ready to start. Meanwhile, Landi had taken steps to present her leaving Constantinople, and by order of the Turkish Court she was arrested on July 1. Landi had begun an action in that Court against the master of the Falernian on the ground that the ship was about to be removed without security having been given. The Court decided that the onus of showing that security had been given was on the master of the Falernian, and as he had not evidence at Constantinople of what had been done in London, he could not discharge the onus. Landi took an oath that security had not been given, the master of the Falernian took no further part in the proceedings, and the Court gave judgment against him by default.

It appeared that in default of appearance by a defendant the Turkish Court did not go into the merits of the dispute, but gave judgment for the amount claimed by the plaintiff. They accordingly awarded Landi a sum amounting in English money to £23,890. Later, Landi allowed his brother to obtain judgment against him for an alleged debt of £2,500, and the brother took over the Falernian in satisfaction. He then sold her, and in the result she had passed irrevocably out of the hands of the plaintiffs.

Security had, in fact, been given in London in March, 1925, in accordance with the salvage contract, and by swearing that security had not been given Landi obtained the judgment of the Turkish Court by fraud.

In September, 1925, while the Falernian was still lying at Constantinople, the plaintiffs began this action in the English Courts. In the course of the proceedings they had obtained an interim injunction, which was still in force, restraining the defendants from enforcing their Turkish judgment. In the action the plaintiffs claimed, first, damages for breach of contract; secondly, a declaration that the Turkish judgment had been obtained in circumstances which rendered it invalid; and thirdly, an injunction to prevent the defendants from enforcing the Turkish judgment. The defendants counterclaimed to enforce their judgment for the £23,890.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon said that Landi committed a clear and shameless breach of contract in procuring the arrest of the ship. On that part of the case damages were claimed under four heads—namely, the hire of the tug; the wages of the crew and other expenses of the Falernian while she was lying at Constantinople after arrest; the legal expenses of the Turkish proceedings; and the value of the Falernian.

Mr. Lewis had contended that the Turkish Court had already decided that no breach of contract had taken place, and that therefore the matter was res judicata. But there were two answers to that contention. First, the present action was brought by the Ellerman Lines, and they were not a party to the Turkish proceedings. The doctrine of res judicata only applied where the parties to the second action were precisely the same as those to the first. And secondly, the plea of res judicata could only apply to the actual decision of the Court, and here there had been no formal decision of the Turkish Court that Landi had not committed a breach of contract. He held, therefore, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover damages for Landi's breach of contract.

He thought that the cost of the tug was clearly recoverable, as were also the wages of the crew and expenses while the Falernian was lying at Constantinople, and the legal expenses of resisting the arrest and trying to get the ship released. But as to the value of the Falernian, he did not think that the final loss of the ship was a necessary consequence of Landi's breach of contract. If the master had not let judgment go by default, but had stayed and had been able to tell the Turkish Court the true facts, probably the Court would not have given that judgment. He therefore held that the plaintiffs could not recover for the loss of the ship.

Then came the more serious question whether, if the defendants sued the plaintiffs here upon the Turkish judgment, the plaintiffs could prevent the judgment from being enforced here on the ground that it had been obtained by fraud. Mr. Lewis contended that the plaintiffs, before being attacked in this Court, could not obtain a declaration that, if attacked, they would have a good defence. If an action had been begun for the sole purpose of getting such a declaration, that might possibly be so; but, in his view, where a plaintiff had, quite properly, brought an action for damages for breach of contract and the claim for a declaration arose in such action, the Court had power under Order XXV., r. 5, to make the declaration asked for. The matter was one which came within the rule as to declaratory judgments, and if the defendants sought to enforce their Turkish judgment he would make the declaration.

As to the defendants' counterclaim to enforce the Turkish judgment for £23,890, Landi had obtained that judgment by saying that security had not been given, knowing it to be untrue. On the authority of Abouloff v. Oppenheimer (10 Q.B.D., 295), which laid down the general principle that the Court would not allow a party to take advantage of his own wrong, he held that the counterclaim could not be enforced. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs on the counterclaim, and made a declaration that the plaintiffs were not liable to be sued on the Turkish judgment so as to make it an effective English judgment against them.

Then there was the question of an injunction. He was asked to grant an injunction restraining the defendants from enforcing their Turkish judgment. Although the English Courts would refuse to enforce that judgment here, it was beyond the power of the English Courts to say that it should not be enforced anywhere in the world. On that point, therefore, to his regret, he could not give judgment for the plaintiffs.

As to the position of the other two defendants, Grech had appeared to the writ, but had not put in any defence. Judgment would go against him by default. The other defendant, Read, was sued as a partner of Landi, and the evidence against him was that he was registered with Landi as one of the joint managing owners of the Semper Paratus. That being so, on the authority of Frazer v. Cuthbertson (6 Q.B.D., 93, at pp. 97-8) Read must be assumed to have been a part-owner unless the contrary was shown. No evidence to the contrary having been given, judgment must be given against him as well as against Landi.

On the application of Mr. RAEBURN, the injunction was to continue if notice of appeal was given within 14 days.

J. I. THORNYCROFT AND CO., LIMITED v. THORNYCROFT.*

Companies — Shares — Participating preferred ordinary shares—Whether dividend cumulative—Resolutions sanctioning creation of shares—Construction.

This summons raised the question whether the dividends payable in respect of certain Seven-and-a-Half per Cent. Participating Preferred Ordinary shares issued by J. I. Thornycroft and Co., Limited, were cumulative or non-cumulative dividends, and this question turned on the construction of the resolutions of the company creating the shares.

The company was incorporated in May, 1901, with a capital of £260,000, divided into 160,000 Six per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares of £1 each and 100,000 Ordinary shares of £1. Increases took place from time to time in the capital of the company, which amounted in August, 1919, to 200,000 Six per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares and 300,000 Ordinary shares. On August 12, 1919, an agreement was entered into between the company and Sir John Edward Thornycroft, contracting on behalf of the Ordinary shareholders, sanctioning the creation of 250,000 additional shares on the conditions that the agreement was confirmed by an extraordinary resolution of the Ordinary shareholders and that the resolutions scheduled to the agreement were passed. Those conditions were duly complied with. The resolutions were as follows:—

"(1) That the capital of the company be increased from £500,000, divided into 200,000 Preference shares and 300,000 Ordinary shares, all of £1 each, to £750,000 by the creation of 250,000 new shares of £1 each.

"(2) That the said 250,000 new shares be and be called Participating Preferred Ordinary shares and . . . do confer upon the holders thereof the following rights, namely:—

"(a) The right to a fixed preferential dividend on the amounts paid-up thereon at the rate of 7½ per cent. per annum, payable next after the fixed Six per Cent. Cumulative dividend on the Preference shares for the time being in the company's capital, but in priority to any dividend on the Ordinary shares.

"(b) The right in respect of any financial year or other period for which the company's accounts are made up in respect of which a dividend at a rate exceeding 10 per cent. per annum is paid on the Ordinary shares to receive a further dividend for each year or period on the amounts paid up on the Participating Preferred Ordinary shares at the rate of ½ per cent. for every 1 per cent. by which the dividend paid on the Ordinary shares exceeds 10 per cent. per annum, . . . but so that the total dividend payable on the Participating Preferred Ordinary shares in respect of any such year or period shall never exceed 9 per cent. per annum.

"(c) The right in a winding up to have the assets of the company available for distribution amongst the members and remaining after making to the Preference shareholders all payments in respect of such shares to which they are entitled under Article 7 . . . applied in the next place and in priority to any payment being made thereout to the holders of the Ordinary shares in repaying to the holders of the Participating Preferred Ordinary shares the amounts (exclusive of premiums) paid up on such shares, but without any further or other right of participation in such assets."

Mr. Peel appeared for the company; Mr. Luxmoore, K.C., and Mr. Roxburgh for a holder of Ordinary shares; and Mr. Spens, K.C., and Mr. Lionel Cohen for a holder of Participating Preferred Ordinary shares.

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN, in giving judgment, said that the question which he had to determine was a question of the construction of the resolutions relating to the Participating Preferred Ordinary shares, for the purpose of ascertaining whether those shares had or had not a right to a cumulative dividend. It was quite true that, if a preferred dividend was given without more, that was, prima facie, a cumulative dividend, but the question whether a cumulative dividend had been conferred must always be a question of the construction of the articles or resolutions relating to the shares. The Court had to examine the language employed and come to a conclusion as to what was intended from the whole of the language used.

He had done this and had arrived at a conclusion. One or two points emerged on such an examination. First, in the resolutions, the existing Preference shares were referred to as Preference shares entitled to a "fixed 6 per cent. cumulative dividend," while the Participating Preferred Ordinary shares were only stated to be entitled to "a fixed preferential dividend." Again, it was to be observed that the shares were not called Preference shares, but Ordinary shares with certain preferential rights. It was further to be noticed that the Preferred Ordinary shares were given no right to be paid arrears in a winding up. No doubt Preference shareholders might be entitled to a cumulative dividend without having a right to arrears in a winding up, but it would be more natural that Cumulative Preference shares should have arrears provided for in a winding up. There were in the resolutions other matters which suggested that the dividends were to be cumulative, but, on the whole, he had come to the conclusion that the dividends were not cumulative.

That view was confirmed by the provision at the end of sub-clause (b) of the second resolution that "the total dividend payable on the Participating Preferred Ordinary shares in any such year or period shall never exceed 9 per cent. per annum." That was really irreconcilable with the view that there was a right to a cumulative dividend. He therefore held that the Participating Preferred Ordinary shares (apart from the participating rights) only carried a non-cumulative dividend at 7½ per cent.

COMPAGNIE CONTINENTALE D'IMPORTATION v. HANDELSVERTRETUNG DER UNION DER S.S.R. IN DEUTSCHLAND.*

Contract—Sale of goods—Conditions—Notice of appropriation—Date of bill of lading to be stated—Notice to be given within seven days from such date—Provisional invoice—Whether a good notice of appropriation—Whether despatch within the seven days sufficient.

The respondents in Rotterdam contracted to buy from the appellants in Hamburg 6,000 tons of South Russian wheat, the conditions of the contract providing that notice of appropriation with ship's name and date of bill of lading should be given by the shippers to the buyers within seven days from date of bill of lading and that provisional invoice with ship's name and date of bill of lading should be sent by the shippers' London house to the buyers within three days from the arrival of the documents in London. The sellers shipped the wheat at Novorossisk, and within the seven days the sellers sent to the buyers a telegram and confirming letter, which the sellers alleged to be a notice of appropriation, but neither document stated the date of the bill of lading. On the same day the sellers posted to the buyers a provisional invoice which gave the date of the bill of lading, but the provisional invoice was not received by the buyers until after the expiry of the seven days. The buyers contended that there had been no tender in conformity with the contract, and it was found by the appeal committee in an arbitration that there had been no good notice of appropriation in the telegram and confirming letter and that the provisional invoice was not intended as a notice of appropriation and that it was a recognized custom that notice of appropriation and provisional invoice should be separate documents, and that therefore the buyers were under no liability to the sellers.

Held, on a case stated, that even if the provisional invoice constituted a notice of appropriation, yet, as it was not received by the buyers within the contract time, the sellers had not satisfied the contract, and that, as the custom was not unreasonable and was not inconsistent with the contract, the provisional invoice was not a notice of appropriation, and the award of the appeal committee must be upheld.

This award stated in the form of a special case by the Appeal Committee of the London Corn Trade Association raised a question of the construction of a condition printed on the back of a formal contract for the sale of grain.

Mr. Somervell appeared for the appellants, the sellers; Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. Lilley for the respondents, the buyers.

On November 26, 1926, the sellers, the German representatives of the Russian Soviet Republics, carrying on business at Hamburg, entered into a contract with the buyers, a company carrying on business at Rotterdam, to sell to the buyers 6,000 tons of South Russian wheat. The contract was in the form of the London Corn Trade Association, Black Sea and Danubian Grain Contract, and was subject to a number of conditions printed on the back thereof. The sellers shipped the wheat on a steamer at Novorossisk, and the bills of lading were dated December 30, 1926. It was agreed that the period of seven days from the date of the bills of lading included January 6, 1927. On January 4, 1927, the sellers telegraphed, and confirmed the telegram by letter:—

"Contract twenty-sixth November tender 6099 .737 ke wheat no. K.O.5 S.S. Marigo L Novorossisk Gibraltar for order."

On January 6 the buyers wrote in reply that they could not accept that as a notice of appropriation because the date of the bill of lading was not stated. On the same day the sellers posted to the buyers a provisional invoice (which did give, inter alia, the date of the bill of lading), which the buyers received on January 7. On receipt of it the buyers returned it on the ground that no tender had been made in conformity with the contract.

The dispute was then referred to arbitration, and the arbitrators decided that the sellers had given a proper and sufficient notice of appropriation. The buyers appealed from that decision to the Appeal Committee of the London Corn Trade Association, and the Appeal Committee awarded, subject to the opinion of the Court on a special case, that the buyers had not received a proper and sufficient notice of appropriation within the meaning of Condition 1 of the contract, and were, therefore, under no liability to the sellers, and that the award of the arbitrators should be set aside.

Condition 1 on the back of the contract was as follows:—

"Notice of appropriation with ship's name, date of bill or bills of lading, and approximate quantity loaded shall be given by the shipper of the grain tendered under this contract direct or through his house or representative or agent in London to his buyer within seven days from date of bill of lading and by each other seller within the seven days, or in due course if received by him after that time; . . . Provisional invoice based on bill of lading weight with ship's name and date of bill or bills of lading shall be sent by shipper's house or representative in London to his buyer within three business days after arrival of documents in London . . ."

The Appeal Committee found as facts that the letter of the sellers confirming their telegram on January 4 was intended to be a notice of appropriation, but that it was not a good notice of appropriation, because it did not state the date of the bills of lading, and was properly rejected by the buyers. They also found that the provisional invoice of January 6 was not intended as a notice of appropriation, and that it was a well-recognized custom that notice of appropriation and provisional invoice were separate and distinct documents.

It was contended on behalf of the sellers (1) that the provisions as to appropriation were complied with if the ship's name, date of bills of lading, and approximate quantity loaded were given by the seller within the time stipulated in Condition 1; (2) that the communication dated January 6, 1927, was a valid notice of appropriation, and a compliance with the provisions of the contract as to appropriation; (3) that there was no custom of the trade inconsistent with contentions (1) and (2), or, alternatively, that evidence of such custom would be inadmissible as inconsistent with the contract; (4) that notice of appropriation was given within Condition 1 if despatched by the sellers within seven days of the date of the bill of lading; and (5) that there was no custom of the trade inconsistent with contention (4), or, alternatively, that evidence as to such custom would be inadmissible as inconsistent with the contract.

It was contended on behalf of the buyers (1) that the notice of appropriation and the provisional invoice contemplated by the contract were to be separate documents, and the provisional invoice could not be treated as notice of appropriation; (2) that by a custom of the trade they were invariably treated under this and similar forms of contract as distinct and separate documents; (3) that the contract itself properly construed treated them as separate and distinct documents; (4) that the provisional invoice was neither intended nor understood by either party to be a notice of appropriation or to fulfil the functions of a notice of appropriation; (5) that the functions of the two documents were quite different; (6) that, even if the provisional invoice could be treated as a notice of appropriation, it did not satisfy the requirements of the contract as to time, because it was not "given" by the shipper to his buyers within seven days from the date of the bill of lading; (7) that "given" meant not merely "despatched," but "caused to be received"; (8) that by the custom of the trade notice of appropriation must reach the buyer within the said seven days, and this meaning of the word "given" was established by the said custom; and (9) that Condition 1 clearly did not mean that notice of appropriation should be deemed to have been given to the buyer before its coming to his knowledge, or, indeed, without its ever coming to his knowledge.

Mr. Somervell submitted that notice of appropriation simply meant that the required information should be communicated in some unambiguous manner; no formality was required, and it was enough if the information was given by the provisional invoice. The alleged custom, if it existed, was of no importance, for it was inconsistent with the terms of the contract. The word "given" was ambiguous, and was satisfied by the construction "sent" and did not mean "caused to be received."

Mr. Le Quesne contended that the contract itself clearly meant that the notice of appropriation and the provisional invoice should be separate documents. It gave them different names and subjected them to different provisions. The committee had found that the custom existed, and that was a finding of fact which should not be disturbed. To give notice meant to "bring information to the knowledge of," and did not merely mean to "despatch." The condition made a distinction: the notice was to be "given," the provisional invoice was only to be "sent."

Mr. Justice Wright, after stating the facts and reading the documents, said that two points had been taken: (1) that the provisional invoice was enough to constitute a notice of appropriation, and (2) that it had been given in time because it had been sent off within the stipulated time. Mr. Somervell contended that as soon as the seller had posted his notice within the seven days he had satisfied the contract, but he (his Lordship) could not accept that contention. In his view it was the essential feature of the contract that the buyer should have information of the grain tendered to him under the contract as soon as possible, and the proper construction was that the seller must actually see that the buyer received the information within the stipulated time. On the facts of this case, therefore, he thought that the information was not conveyed to the buyers within the contract time.

That was really enough to decide the case in favour of the buyers, but he must consider Mr. Somervell's other point also, that if the provisional invoice contained the necessary information it could be treated as giving the notice of appropriation. Against that, the Appeal Committee had found as a fact that there was a custom that the notice and the invoice should be separate documents, and he could not reject that finding unless he found that such a custom was unreasonable, and he did not think that it was. It was not inconsistent with the terms of the contract, and, even if the contract itself did not contemplate two separate documents, the custom could properly be incorporated with the contract. There were good business reasons why the notice of appropriation and the provisional invoice should be separate documents, and in his view the present contract contemplated that they should be so. Both on the construction of the contract, and on the custom, he thought that the award of the appeal committee was right and must be upheld.

Landlord and Tenant—Rent in arrear—Forfeiture—Judgment for rent and possession—Subsequent agreement by tenant to yield up possession at end of quarter—Application by tenant for relief against forfeiture—Effect of agreement—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 46.

The rent of certain premises being in arrear, the landlord obtained judgment against the tenant for possession of the premises. Subsequently a document was signed by the tenant which provided that if the landlord would withhold the writ of possession, he, the tenant, would pay the rent and give up possession of the premises at the end of the quarter.

Held, that the document was not inconsistent with the tenant's right to obtain relief against forfeiture under s. 46 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the decision of Mr. Justice Clauson, sitting as Vacation Judge.

The plaintiff, Walter Norris Nance, was the landlord of premises No. 69, Broad-street, Reading, which he leased to the defendant at an annual rent of £200. The rent due at Lady Day, 1927, not having been paid, a writ was issued by the plaintiff claiming possession of the premises, one quarter's rent due Lady Day, 1927, and mesne profits, and judgment was recovered accordingly by the plaintiff on May 14, 1927. The defendant was subsequently notified that execution would be levied unless the terms of the judgment were complied with. The defendant, who asked for further time, on June 28 signed a document in the following terms :—

"In consideration of the plaintiff withholding the above writ of possession, I hereby undertake to pay out the amount of debt and costs under the fi-fa not later than Friday next, July 1, to give vacant possession of the premises No. 69, Broad-street, Reading, on or before September 29 next, and also to give independent security for the mesne profits from June 25, 1927.

"I further undertake to carry out the repairs which I am liable for, and of which I have received notice, under the terms of the lease."

Upon that document being signed the defendant continued to remain in possession.

On July 27 the defendant took out a summons in the Reading District Registry for relief against forfeiture. The summons was dismissed by the District Registrar on August 2, but his decision was reversed by Mr. Justice Clauson on August 9 upon the ground that the document signed by the defendant was no bar to his right to relief against forfeiture under section 46 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which provides : "In the case of any action for a forfeiture brought for non-payment of rent, the High Court or a Judge thereof shall have power to give relief in a summary manner and subject to the same terms and conditions in all respects as to payment of rent, costs, and otherwise as could formerly have been imposed in the Court of Chancery."

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. J. B. Matthews, K.C., and Mr. A. F. Engelbach appeared for the appellant ; and Mr. C. J. Radcliffe for the respondent.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in giving judgment, after stating the facts, said that this was a case in which the tenant did not pay with regularity. Therefore an action was brought by the landlord for ejectment for non-payment of the rent and other relief, and judgment was signed in May.

The tenant did not pay, so the landlord proceeded to execute the judgment by fi-fa, whereupon the agreement above set out was entered into. His Lordship read the agreement and said that before September 29 the tenant applied for relief against forfeiture. The question ultimately came for decision before Mr. Justice Clauson, who granted the relief asked for. The question, therefore, was whether in face of the agreement that decision was right. There could be no doubt that the right of granting relief against forfeiture had always been jealously guarded by the Courts and that relief might be granted in a case where a tenant had been turned out. The question here was whether the agreement on the part of the tenant to give up possession before September 29 was so inconsistent with the grant of relief against forfeiture that it must be taken that the right to relief had ceased to exist.

Speaking for himself, he had some doubt on the matter, because it seemed to him to be possible to say that the agreement to go out on September 29 was not consistent with a right to stay on after that date. But, as he had already said, the right to grant relief had always been jealously preserved in favour of tenants, and after some hesitation he had come to the conclusion that he was not in a position to say that Mr. Justice Clauson was wrong in holding that he had power to grant relief.

Lord Justice Atkin said that he agreed. The right to relief against forfeiture was recognized by section 210 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, which began by giving the landlord the power to recover the demised premises when a half-year's rent was in arrear and there was a right of re-entry. The section then proceeded to say that if the lessee permitted judgment to be recovered "and execution to be executed thereon, without paying the rent and arrears, together with full costs and without proceeding for relief in equity within six months after such execution executed, then and in such case the said lessee . . . shall be barred and foreclosed from all relief or remedy in law or equity." Section 211 provided that if the lessee proceeded in equity he was not to have an injunction or relief without payment of rent and costs. The provisions of section 1 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, had now been substantially embodied in section 46 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which provided as follows : "In the case of any action for a forfeiture brought for non-payment of rent, the High Court or a Judge thereof shall have power to give relief in a summary manner, and subject to the same terms and conditions in all respects as to payment of rent, costs, and otherwise as could formerly have been imposed in the Court of Chancery. . . ." It was quite plain that the equitable right was a right to proceed for relief in Chancery even although the judgment had been fully executed and possession had been taken under the judgment. In the present case the landlord had obtained judgment for possession, and the writ was duly put in the hands of the sheriff's officer, but then an arrangement was made by virtue of which time was given to the respondent on the terms set out in the document of June 28. He could well understand that an agreement might be made on the terms that if time were given the tenant would surrender his right to relief against forfeiture, or an agreement might be made on such terms that a term by the tenant to surrender his right to obtain relief must necessarily be implied. It was a question of inference in each case. In this case he (the Lord Justice) could find no evidence that the tenant knew anything about his right to relief against forfeiture. That was not conclusive, but it did not seem to him that an agreement to allow further time was inconsistent with a right to relief still existing.

For these reasons he was not satisfied that the learned Judge was wrong in the decision to which he had come.

Lord Justice Greer said that he agreed that the appeal turned on the proper interpretation of the document of June 28, 1927. The landlord was entitled to have the fi-fa executed and possession of the premises given up to him, but that did not prevent the tenant from applying for relief under the section. The agreement to give vacant possession upon the date specified did not deprive the tenant of his right to apply for relief against forfeiture. In order to deprive him of that right plainer words would have to be used than those contained in the agreement. In his judgment, therefore, the appeal failed.

FLETCHER v. FLETCHER.*

Husband and Wife — Maintenance — Order— Refusal by justices—Wife's appeal—Application against husband for security for wife's costs — Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict., c. 39)— Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 51).

A wife who has failed in her application before justices for a maintenance order on the ground of her husband's desertion is not entitled to an order against her husband for the security of the costs of her appeal against the justices' decision.

This was a summons adjourned into Court by the Registrar. The wife applied to the Bury (Lancashire) Justices on July 28, 1927, for an order for maintenance on the ground of her husband's desertion. The application was dismissed after evidence had been given by and on behalf of both parties. The wife gave notice of appeal and issued a summons asking for security for the costs of her appeal. The Registrar on September 7, 1927, decided that he had no power to make such an order without the husband's consent.

Mr. F. S. Laskey appeared for the wife ; Mr. Noel Middleton for the husband.

Mr. Laskey said that there was no precedent for the relief asked for here, but on the other hand there was no reported case where a wife in these circumstances had been refused security for the costs of her appeal. He invoked the usual practice of the Divorce Court in regard to a husband's liability for his wife's costs and referred to Sirrell v. Sirrell (27 The Times L.R., 155 ; [1911] P., 38).

Mr. Noel Middleton said that Order LIX., Rule 4A, and Rule 17, of the Rules of the Supreme Court governed the question of security for costs in appeals of this class to a Divisional Court. Rule 17 applied Order LVIII., Rule 15, which concluded with the words :—

"Such deposit or other security for the costs to be occasioned by any appeal shall be made or given as may be directed under special circumstances by the Court of Appeal."

In this context "special circumstances" meant residence abroad or insolvency of an appellant. He submitted that a wife should not, any more than an insolvent person, be allowed to drag her husband from one Court to another at his expense. He cited passages from the judgments of Lord Justice Bowen in Cowell v. Taylor (31 Ch.D., 34, at p. 38) and of Mr. Justice A. L. Smith in Swain v. Follows (18 Q.B.D., 585) in support of this contention. He referred to Shufflebotham v. Shufflebotham (39 The Times L.R., 206), in which the Court of Appeal refused to order a husband's appeal against the grant of a decree nisi to his wife to be stayed until her costs of trial had been paid by him and he had given her security for her costs of the appeal. The rule as to the wife's costs was based on the duty of the husband to provide necessaries for his wife, but an appeal was not a "necessary." The foundation of the old rule in the Ecclesiastical Courts was that the wife should be able to secure a hearing.

Lord Merrivale.—This question has been quite properly raised and well and precisely argued. The wife, who is now an appellant, took proceedings before the justices on the ground of desertion to obtain provision for her maintenance, and she was unsuccessful, and she now moves under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1925, that the husband may be ordered to give security for her costs of appeal. In the ordinary jurisdiction of this Division as between husband and wife there is an inveterate practice of ancient origin whereby the common law presumption is acted upon that a wife has prima facie no means of prosecuting her suit. Out of that common law presumption there arose a practice whereby in this Court, if the wife is a suitor and if there is no ground by reason of the means of the parties for refusing the order, she obtains an order, as of course, that proper provision be made for the conduct of her part of the litigation.

The real question in the case is whether the principle must be held to apply to an appeal to this Division, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, by a wife who has been unsuccessful in the Court below. There is no precedent which provides that, as a matter of course or as a matter of discretion, an order for security for her costs should be made against the husband in such a case. Until the decision of the Court in Sirrell v. Sirrell (27 The Times L.R., 155 ; [1911] P., 38) there was, so far as I am aware, no decided case in which the general practice of the Court as to security for costs where the wife was a suitor was held to apply in cases under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. But in that case it was held that, where a wife had been successful and the husband appealed, the practice of the Division was to direct him to give security for the proper costs. That decision has been embodied in the practice of the Court and has been followed ever since. It is, indeed, the every-day practice, where a wife under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts has succeeded, that the husband shall not be allowed to proceed with his appeal without giving security for her costs. But different principles obviously apply where the wife has been the applicant below and has been unsuccessful. In the first place she is not a suitor in this Court within the ordinary definition of a suitor in the divorce jurisdiction. She is a complainant against the failure of justice before the bench of justices. There is in the statutes nothing which encourages the application. So far as the statutes and the Rules of the Supreme Court applicable in common law practice throw any light upon the matter, as Mr. Middleton pointed out, on the whole they are rather opposed to such an application because obviously the application would not succeed in an ordinary appeal to the King's Bench Division under the common law practice, and the practice of the Court of Appeal in respect of appeals from the King's Bench Division certainly would not give the wife any such security as she seeks here. I do not say that that was made clear in the case of Shufflebotham v. Shufflebotham (39 The Times L.R., 206). But it is a matter of common knowledge that where the wife is a litigant in this Court and has appealed in such litigation, although her costs have been provided for her under the general jurisdiction of the Court, if the case goes to the Court of Appeal the procedure of the Court of Appeal operates. The matter has then ceased to be a proceeding in this jurisdiction, and therefore the old rules of common law jurisdiction apply. There is no statutory authority for the order which is sought here. There is no precedent in any decided case and there is in the established practice nothing which renders it necessary or proper that the order which is sought in this case should be made. I must hold that this application is outside the settled practice of the Court under the decision in Sirrell v. Sirrell (supra) and is not warranted either by statute or by any decided case, and therefore must fail.

I may point out that there are great facilities now in the Poor Persons Rules for poor persons who come into litigation. Moreover, if the wife has good grounds for appeal it may be that the appeal will be necessary and that the husband is under the common law liable to solicitors who take up the wife's case. That has nothing to do with the jurisdiction or the practice with regard to the wife's costs in this Court.

His Lordship dismissed the application, with costs.

DRUMMOND v. HERVEY.*

County Court — Appeal — Dismissal — Costs—Appeal under Poor Persons Rules—Discretion to award costs against appellant.

The Court may award costs against an appellant who appeals under the Poor Persons Rules, if the appeal is entirely frivolous and vexatious and is an abuse of the process of the Court.

On November 1 the Divisional Court dismissed this appeal from the Brentford County Court. The facts were of no public interest. The Court reserved judgment on the question whether there was jurisdiction to order the appellant, who appealed as a poor person, to pay the respondent's costs on the ground that the appeal was frivolous.

Mr. H. Harcourt appeared for the appellant ; Mr. H. H. Edmunds for the respondent.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER, in giving judgment, said that the case raised a question of some importance with regard to costs in appeals under the Poor Persons Rules. In the present case the appellant, having lost his case in the county court, went to the Poor Persons Committee, who, after the customary inquiries, granted his application for assistance in his appeal. It was to be observed that on such applications to the committee the proposed respondent had no locus standi. It might be that if he could have been heard he would have convinced the committee that the appeal was frivolous or hopeless and ought not to be allowed.

When the present appeal came before the Court it turned out to be, he would not say frivolous, but so wholly unfounded as to approach the frivolous. There was no evidence of misconduct on the part of the appellant in the sense that he misled the committee ; his only fault was that he had that undue optimism which sometimes existed in litigants. In those circumstances, the only question was whether the Court could, or ought to, award costs against the poor person, or whether the certificate of the committee was conclusive.

On the question whether the discretion of the Court extended so far as to order costs against a poor person appellant, he was of opinion that it did so extend, and that the Court could award costs if the appeal was entirely frivolous, vexatious, and an abuse of the process of the Court. But he thought that it ought not to make an order in the present case as there had been no misconduct by the appellant. The appeal would be dismissed, without costs.

MR. JUSTICE TALBOT concurred.

IN RE NATIONAL BENEFIT ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Companies — Winding-up — Proof—Contract of marine insurance—No stamped policies—Rejection of proof.

The Court held that the liquidator had rightly rejected a proof by the English Insurance Company, Limited, in the winding-up of the National Benefit Assurance Company, Limited, in that the contract between the two companies in respect of which the proof of debt was advanced was a contract of marine insurance and no stamped policy of marine insurance was issued to the English Insurance Company, Limited, as required by law, and therefore the contract was invalid.

Decision of Eve, J. (43 The Times L.R., 594), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Eve (43 The Times L.R., 594), which raised the question whether a contract entered into between the English Insurance Company, Limited (hereinafter called the English Company), and the National Benefit Assurance Company, Limited (hereinafter called the National Company), was or was not a contract of marine insurance. The National Company was in liquidation, and the liquidator rejected a proof of debt by the English Company arising out of the contract on the ground that its subject-matter was marine insurance ; and that, as no properly stamped policies of marine insurance had been issued to the English Company, it was invalid under the provisions of section 93 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and sections 22 and 23 of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906.

The English Company issued a summons to determine whether the rejection of their proof was justified, and in his judgment Mr. Justice Eve found the facts as follows :—

"The contract is embodied in a document dated January 27, 1922, with a schedule and addendum attached, but not affecting its construction. It is described as a participation agreement and it provides in article 1 that the National Company shall be entitled to, and shall accept, a quota participation equal to one-eighth share of all and every risk, excluding obligatory reinsurance agreements with other companies, arranged by the head office of the English Company upon any marine insurance or upon any war risks, whether alone or in conjunction with marine risks, accepted by the English Company

* Reported by G. T. WHITFIELD-HAYES and H. LANGFORD LEWIS, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(including their agencies and branches at home and abroad) through their marine department.

"The expression 'marine insurance' as used in the agreement means all forms of insurance, including war risk and reinsurance, transacted by the marine department of the English Company.

"By article 2 the participation was fixed at 50 per cent. of the share retained by the English Company at their own risk of all marine insurances accepted on and after a date therein mentioned. The maximum limit of the National Company by any one ship was fixed at £1,875, and any special reinsurances effected by the English Company of risks within the scope of the agreement were to be for common account of the two parties. Under article 3 the liability of the two parties was to begin automatically, at the same time any cover given by the English Company becoming immediately binding on the National Company, the expressed intention being that the two companies should participate pari passu in all the marine insurances accepted by the English Company through its marine department.

"Articles 4 to 7, inclusive, free the English Company from any obligation to furnish any particulars in regard to risks accepted and limit the right of the National Company to the receipt of monthly statements of premiums and losses only. It is to be entitled to a proportionate part of the net premiums, salvages, and other benefits received by the English Company and is to bear its proportionate share of all losses, including any loss due to failure on the part of the original assured to pay the premium. The whole control of the business, including the settlement of all claims and the institution or defence of legal or other proceedings, is committed to the English Company, which is to receive as consideration for the agreement and as remuneration for obtaining, managing, and supervising the business a commission of 2½ per cent. on the net premiums paid or allowed to the National Company in respect of its participation, and a commission of 10 per cent. on the profits derived by the National Company from the whole of the business under the agreement.

"Article 10 begins with these words :—'This being an agreement executed in a spirit of trust, one with the other, the participator' (that is the National Company) 'is absolutely bound in every case to follow the fortunes of the (English) Company.' And in the arbitration clause it is agreed that all disputes shall be settled by an equitable and liberal interpretation of the provisions of the agreement according to the spirit thereof, and that the arbitrators are relieved from all judicial formalities and may abstain from following the strict rule of the law."

Upon these facts his Lordship thought that there could be no doubt as to the true character of the document. It was intended to cover marine risks ; it was, therefore, a policy of marine insurance ; and, no stamped policies having been issued, it was void.

The English Company appealed.

Mr. Porter, K.C., Mr. Andrewes-Uthwatt, and the Hon. Michael Morris appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. L. W. Byrne for the liquidator.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that the appeal was from a decision of Mr. Justice Eve, who had confirmed an objection to a proof in the liquidation of the National Company. His Lordship then stated certain of the terms of the agreement of January 27, 1922, and continued : The English Company never furnished any particulars as to the risks, and did not ask for an insurance policy to cover them. The only question was whether the English Company was disentitled to prove in the liquidation of the National Company by reason of the fact that no stamped policies were issued. A policy of sea insurance included a policy of reinsurance of sea risks. There were in this case no such policies of sea insurance issued as could satisfy sections 92 and 93 of the Stamp Act, 1891. His Lordship then referred to the facts as to how business was conducted between the companies, and said that there was merely a statement made of the premiums payable and the losses incurred.

The claim of the English Company was to be indemnified against losses under policies issued by the company in respect of marine risks and paid by them directly. The appellants were really driven to say that the National Company could have been sued on the policies directly, but the claim negatived that contention. By section 23 of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, "a marine policy must specify (1) the name of the assured, or of some person who effects the insurance on his behalf ; (2) the subject-matter insured and the risk insured against ; (3) the voyage or period of time or both, as the case may be, covered by the insurance ; (4) the sum or sums insured ; and (5) the name or names of the insurers." There was no policy on which the name of the National Company appeared as insurers. There were no losses for which the English Company sought indemnity against the National Company which that company were liable to make good to the English Company. The agreement was described as a "participation agreement," and by article 1 the National Company agreed to accept and share a quota participation of the risks insured by the English Company. Bearing in mind the sections which he had referred to, and considering the nature of the agreement, he thought Mr. Justice Eve was right in coming to the conclusion to which he came. The only way in which the agreement could be effective between the parties was by way of reinsurance. There was no direct liability to the assured. The observations of Mr. Justice Mathew in Home Marine Insurance Company, Limited v. Smith (14 The Times L.R., 366 ; [1898] 1 Q.B., 829), a decision affirmed in the Court of Appeal (14 The Times L.R., 459 ; [1898] 2 Q.B., 351), applied to this case. The agreement was a contract of marine insurance, and the proof tendered must be rejected. The appeal would be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Sargant delivered judgment to the same effect, and Lord Justice Lawrence concurred.

Revenue — Income-tax — Carrying on trade—Successive adventures—Additional assessment —When made—Time limit—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 125 (2), Schedule D.

During the "boom" in the Lancashire cotton trade in 1919, the appellant, in company with other persons, engaged in the operation known locally as "turning over" a cotton mill—i.e., acquiring a controlling interest in the mill, organizing its administration and finances, and reselling it to a new company. The operation was successful and the appellant was asked to join and did join other syndicates, composed partly, but not entirely, of the same persons engaged in "turning over" three other mills. In each case a profit resulted to the appellant. On March 24, 1923, the Additional Commissioners for the Division in which the appellant resided signed the book containing an estimated assessment upon the appellant to income-tax under Schedule D for the year 1919-20. The book was not delivered to the General Commissioners until April 18, 1923; notice was given to the appellant on May 5, 1923, and the assessment was signed by the General Commissioners on September 5, 1923.

Held, that though each adventure of "turning over" a mill, taken singly, was not a trade, but a capital transaction, yet the succession of such adventures, in each of which the appellant took part, might constitute the carrying on of a trade, and the Special Commissioners on an appeal against the assessment were not estopped by their previous decisions from reconsidering the whole of the facts, and finding that the appellant in so doing was carrying on a trade on the profits of which he was liable to income-tax and excess profits duty on the profits.

Held also, that the assessment was made in time, having been made when it was signed by the Additional Commissioners within the three years allowed by s. 125 (2) of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The subsequent steps need not be within that time.

These were appeals from the decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 659) on cases stated by the Special Commissioners under the Income Tax Acts on appeals against assessments made on the appellant to income-tax and excess profits duty respectively.

The appellant, Mr. G. Pickford, appealed against an assessment to income-tax under Schedule D in the sum of £15,000 for the year ending April 5, 1920, made on him in respect of promotion profits by the Additional Commissioners for the Middleton Division of Lancashire. On March 24, 1923, the Additional Commissioners for the Division in which the appellant resided signed the book containing an estimated assessment upon the appellant to income-tax under Schedule D for the year 1919-20. The book was not delivered to the General Commissioners until April 18, 1923; notice was given to the appellant on May 5, 1923, and the assessment was signed by the General Commissioners on September 5, 1923.

The case arose out of the profits made in the process locally described as "turning over" cotton mills during the boom in the Lancashire cotton spinning trade in 1919. Many spinning mills were being sold by their old proprietors, and when this was done it often happened that the old mill manager was dismissed by the new board of directors, and a new man engaged who was personally known to the group who had obtained control of the business. As a consequence the position of mill managers in 1919 tended to become insecure and their future prospects uncertain.

In 1919 John William Wroe was manager of the Commercial Mills Spinning Company, Limited, Oldham. Knowing that many mills in the neighbourhood were changing hands, and that another local spinning company wished to purchase the Commercial Mills, he approached Mr. C. H. Pickford, the chairman of directors of the old company, and put the position before him. Mr. Pickford, who was about 70 years of age, was willing to sell his shares and retire from the business, and proposed that Mr. Wroe should join forces with his son, Mr. George Pickford, the appellant, and buy out the shareholders. These two, together with three others, Messrs. J. S. Higham, T. Norcliffe, and Frank Partington, having command of sufficient funds, bought up all the shares in the old company for £118,770, including a sum of £6,600 paid to the directors for loss of office. They then determined to liquidate the old company and form a new company called Commercial Mills Spinning Company (1919), Limited, to purchase the assets and business of the old company for the sum of £150,000, in 150,000 £1 shares, of which 10s. per share was paid up upon allotment. It was agreed that the appellant George Pickford and J. S. Higham should retain for themselves and divide all profit made on the sale by the old company to the new company, and might allot the shares in the new company to any persons and retain any profit made by selling the shares at a premium. The old company went into voluntary liquidation. The new company was duly incorporated on November 13, 1919, the five associated persons being directors of the new company. They received £150,000 from the liquidator of the old company as shareholders therein, and they then allotted to themselves 150,000 shares of £1 each (10s. paid up) in the new company. They retained 2,000 shares each as directors' qualification shares and sold the remainder at the price of 12s. 6d. per share.

Transactions of this character were very common in Lancashire at the time, and the appellant, at the request of the managers, shortly afterwards assisted in carrying out a "turning over" of three other cotton mills, the Glodwick Mill, the Lime Mill, and the Olive Mill. He was approached to assist in many other reconstructions and promotions, but declined to be associated with them. At the time of the hearing of the appeal to the Special Commissioners the appellant was still a director of the four new companies formed in connexion with these transactions, being a shareholder therein and having money on loan with each of them.

It was contended for the appellant: (a) That the signing of the assessment by the Additional Commissioners did not constitute the making of the assessment, and that the assessment appealed against was therefore invalid as not having been made within three years after the expiration of the year of assessment; (b) that the appellant was not in those transactions carrying on a trade the profits of which were assessable under Case I. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918; (c) that the profits arising from those transactions were not assessable under Case VI. of Schedule D; and (d) that the assessment should be discharged.

For the Crown it was contended: (1) (a) that it was not competent for the appellant to raise or for the Special Commissioners to decide in proceedings by way of appeal against an assessment, the question whether in making that assessment the procedure of the Income Tax Act, 1918, had been strictly followed, and therefore no evidence as to the dates when the assessment in question was signed should be received by the Special Commissioners; (b) that the assessment was "made" when it was signed by the Additional Commissioners, and therefore that it was made within the time limited by law; (2) that the profits arising to the appellant from the four transactions in question were assessable as profits of a trade or adventure in the nature of trade under Case I. of Schedule D, or alternatively, were assessable under Case VI. of Schedule D.

The Special Commissioners came to the conclusion that although each transaction considered separately might not have constituted a trade under Case I., yet taken together they showed that the appellant had entered habitually into profitable contracts of the kind and had in fact made a business of "turning over" cotton mill companies. In two other similar appeals the appellants had "turned over" in one case eleven and in the other no fewer than sixteen cotton mills, and the Special Commissioners had held that the appellants had made a business of "turning over" mills. They could not distinguish the case of the present appellant, though he had carried out these transactions on a smaller scale than others, and had not made as much profit from them as he might have done.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt affirmed their decision and decided the contention of the appellant that the assessment was out of time, having been signed more than three years after the expiration of the year in which the first assessments were signed, in favour of the Crown.

The appellant appealed.

Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Edwardes Jones, K.C., appeared for the appellant; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Reginald P. Hills for the Crown.

The Court, without calling upon counsel for the Crown, dismissed the appeal.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that the appeal arose on the separate claim against Mr. Pickford in respect of the four cases tabulated. It appeared to him (his Lordship) that the Special Commissioners had rightly appreciated the problem before them. There might be an isolated transaction which did not give any indication that a trade was being carried on. When, however, one came to look at four successive transactions of the same kind, one might properly draw quite a different inference from those incidents taken together. The Special Commissioners found that the question as they had stated it was a question of degree. He (his Lordship) thought they were right. If it was a question of degree, it was a question of fact. The case on this point was one of fact, and the matter was determined by their conclusion on the facts. But a further point was taken, and it was said that the Special Commissioners knew all the facts before, and in coming to a previous conclusion they had prejudged the facts in the appellant's favour. They had held that each of the cases was a single capital transaction, and one which did not connote trading at all. Thus it was said that the Special Commissioners were estopped from treating those as trading transactions. It appeared to him (his Lordship) that the argument which had been based on estoppel was unfounded. The case which had been cited to the Court as establishing the doctrine of estoppel—Hoystead v. Commissioner of Taxation (42 The Times L.R., 207; [1926] A.C., 155)—did not in its terms cover the present case.

Lord Shaw, in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in that case, said at p. 170, quoting the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Wigram in Henderson v. Henderson (3 Hare, 100, at p. 114): "The plea of res judicata applies, except in special cases, not only to points upon which the Court was actually required to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time."

But here the Special Commissioners were quite right in resetting all the facts before themselves and considering whether on those facts the appellant was not carrying on a trade. The appeal, therefore, on this point should be dismissed, and the judgment affirmed. That covered both cases of income-tax and excess profits duty. But it did not touch the income-tax point as to the time-limit being exceeded when the assessment was "made" under section 125 (2) of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

He (his Lordship) agreed with the reasoning of Mr. Justice Rowlatt on this point, and it was only out of deference to the argument that he would add a few words. Decisions on the Stamp Act, 1891, or on rating Acts, which had been cited were of no value or assistance at all. When one came to look at subsection (2) of section 125 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, it provided that "an assessment may be amended or an additional first assessment may be made at any time not later than three years after the expiration of the year of assessment." By the Taxes Management Act, 1880, section 52 (2), the additional assessment which might be made by the Additional Commissioners was of an amount which ought in their judgment to be charged on the taxpayer, subject to objection by the surveyor and to appeal. The words which the Court had to construe were an "assessment made" not a "charge" which rested on the taxpayer. It was plain that much work had to be done at an early stage, and an assessment could be made in respect of which an appeal could be entered and it might be reversed. There was intended to be given to the original assessment a certain importance, as it ultimately crystallized into a charge on the taxpayer. Here the assessment was made on March 24, 1923, and therefore it was within the time-limit. The appeals, therefore, failed on all points.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., [Sargant and Lawrence, L.JJ.)
1927. Oct. 27.

TREDEGAR v. HARWOOD.*

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant by lessee—Insurance against fire—Named office—Alternative—Other responsible office to be approved by lessor—Extent of lessor's discretion.

A covenant by a lessee to insure the demised premises in the joint names of the lessee and the lessor, "in the Law Fire Office or in some other responsible insurance office to be approved by the lessor," confers upon the lessee an alternative to be exercised at his volition ; and the lessor, upon an office being submitted to him, provided that it is a responsible one, must come to a reasonable decision from the point of view of the question whether the office is suitable for meeting loss by fire, and he must not be influenced by external and extraneous considerations such as convenience of estate management.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Tomlin.

The plaintiff, Lord Tredegar, was the ground landlord of large property in the neighbourhood of Newport, Mon., and Cardiff, upon which some thousands of houses had been erected. The defendant, Mrs. Annie Harwood, was the assignee of a building lease under which a house had been built. The lease was for 99 years and contained the usual covenant by the lessee to insure the house, the covenant being in the following words :—". . . insure and ever afterwards during the said term keep insured the said messuage . . . in the joint names of the lessee and the lessor in the Law Fire Office or in some other responsible insurance office to be approved by the lessor. . . ."

The defendant, when the lease was assigned to her, did not continue the then existing policy in the Law Fire Office, but insured in the Atlas Company. The plaintiff refused to accept that insurance, or to "approve" the Atlas Company, and he brought the action against the defendant in the form of an action for forfeiture of the lease by reason of breach of covenant. At the hearing of the action, however, and during the present appeal counsel stated that the plaintiff did not desire to obtain a forfeiture of the lease, but desired to know whether he could require a lessee or an assignee to insure in the Law Fire, or in some other office of his (the plaintiff's) selection, or whether he was bound to approve an insurance effected with a company chosen by a lessee. In his statement of claim and subsequent particulars he stated that the reason for requiring insurance in the Law Fire was to facilitate estate management.

Mr. Justice Tomlin decided in favour of the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Mr. Archer, K.C., and Mr. Foa appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Gavin Simonds, K.C., and Mr. Romer for the respondent.

It was submitted on behalf of the appellant that the form of the covenant obviously gave an alternative choice to the lessee, who was to effect the insurance. The lessor was to "approve," but he was not to "select." There was no mention of "estate management" in the covenant, and no indication that it governed the spirit of the arrangement between the parties.

The Master of the Rolls, in his considered judgment, after stating the facts, said that the plaintiff did not question the Atlas policy as to amount, terms, or conditions ; nor did he dispute that the Atlas was a "responsible" insurance office within the meaning of the covenant. His case was that the covenant was directory, and that the so-called "alternative" part of it only came into play if, and when, for some reason, the Law Fire Office were not available ; and further, that in any case the lessor could refuse his consent at his absolute discretion. The defendant alleged that the covenant offered a true alternative, which ought not to be refused upon a ground extraneous to the purpose of the insurance.

The form of the covenant had appeared for years in many text-books. The purpose of taking the policy in the joint names of both lessor and lessee was to make the money available for both parties, who had each an interest in the matter. The form of the covenant appeared on the face of it to give an option to the lessee. Although direct authority was lacking, Lord Justice Warrington, as he then was, in Upjohn v. Hitchens (34 The Times L.R., 412 ; [1918] 2 K.B., 48), read such a covenant as conferring a choice upon the lessee subject to approval by the lessor.

The meaning put upon the words by the plaintiff really required the addition of some such words as "failing which" to indicate that the alternative was really a subservient clause, only coming into play upon the failure of the Law Fire Office to accept the risk. He could see no reason for adopting a device to avoid the plain meaning of words expressing an alternative. The words "to be approved" also seemed to indicate that the submission of another office was to be originated by the lessee, with the right and duty of the lessor to give his decision as to approval or disapproval.

Cases had been cited in which the right to an arbitrary or capricious negation of approval was not accepted—Braunstein v. Accidental Death Insurance Company (1 B. and S., 782) ; Scott v. Barclays Bank, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 198 ; [1923] 2 K.B., 1), and Houlder Brothers and Co. v. Gibbs (41 The Times L.R., 487 ; [1925] Ch., 575). He was unable to see why the covenant should not be construed according to its terms and be given a reasonable meaning. It appeared to confer an alternative upon the lessee to be exercised at his volition. And the lessor, upon an office being submitted to him, provided that it fulfilled the condition of being a responsible one, must come to a reasonable decision. He must not come to a capricious decision, nor one that could be used by him to secure a personal end, even if that end were both purposeful and useful from his point of view.

The decision must be in accordance with such considerations as were appropriate and would guide a reasonable man in coming to a decision whether a particular insurance office was or was not suitable for the purpose of meeting loss by fire. There was no reason to say that an absolute discretion was given to the lessor, if that term were intended to allow him complete freedom in introducing external and extraneous considerations. The appeal must be allowed, with costs.

Lord Justice Sargant said that the first question was what was the true construction of the covenant in question. The respondent had contended that it did not give the lessee an alternative, but that the lessee was bound to insure in the Law Fire Office, and that it was only if such an insurance was impossible that he could insure in another office. In his (his Lordship's) judgment that view was unsound as involving the insertion, after the word "or" of some such words as "failing that office," and further as not giving due effect to the word "approved."

The words of the covenant in their ordinary meaning imposed on the lessee an alternative obligation only, and he could fulfil it by insuring either in the Law Fire Office or in some other responsible office approved by the lessor. If the lessee elected for the second alternative it was for him to submit the name or names of one or more other responsible office or offices, and it was for the lessor to consider whether he did or did not approve the office or one of the offices submitted. The use of the word "approved" indicated that the original selection or choice of an office was in the lessee, and that the right of the lessor was limited to considering and approving or declining to approve the office so selected or chosen.

It was worth while to note that the form of covenant given alike in the 3rd and 12th editions of Key and Elphinstone's Precedents, published in 1890 and 1926 respectively, provided for insurance in an office "approved" by the lessor, and contained as a variant the word "prescribed," thus making a distinction between the more stringent form where the lessor definitely prescribed the alternative office, and the less stringent form found in the present case where his function was limited to approving the office. His Lordship's own experience had been that the less stringent form was the ordinary one, and it was the form found in Woodfall on Landlord and Tenant (21st ed., at p. 204), though Mr. Foa in his work on the same subject used the word "direct" as being that in ordinary use (6th ed., at p. 274). But it was at least clear that the wording of such a covenant had been carefully considered by those dealing with the matter, and that there was a clear differentiation between the forms in common use.

In his (his Lordship's) opinion, there were limits to the exercise of the lessor's right or discretion in approving of an office selected by the lessee, similar to those which, in the recent case of Houlder Brothers and Co. v. Gibbs (41 The Times L.R., 487; [1925] Ch., 575), the Court held applicable to a lessor's right or discretion in the matter of consenting to an assignment to a proposed assignee. Here, as there, the lessor could not act arbitrarily or capriciously, but must have regard to the purpose of the covenant, and could not take into account extraneous or collateral considerations unconnected with the relationship of landlord and tenant. Here the subject-matter of the demise was a single building only, and the purpose of the covenant obviously was to give adequate security for the reinstatement of the building in the case of damage by fire. It was not suggested by the plaintiff that the office proposed by the defendant, viz., the Atlas, afforded security which was insufficient or inferior to insurance with the Law Fire Office. All the reasons given by the lessor had reference to the circumstance that he owned a large building estate of which that building formed part, and that it was for his convenience as the owner of the estate that the insurance of that particular building should be in the same office as the insurances of his other buildings. In his (his Lordship's) judgment the fact that the plaintiff was the freeholder of the other buildings was an extraneous or collateral circumstance unconnected with the demise of the particular house, just as were the special circumstances relied on in Houlder Brothers and Co. v. Gibbs (supra) and in the cases there relied on. Further, it was to be noted that the plaintiff had not expressed a want of approval of the Atlas office and had only expressed a preference for the Law Fire Office.

But there was another and shorter way of dealing with the case. Assuming, as was in his Lordship's opinion clear, that the covenant gave the lessee an alternative or option, then the plaintiff in declining to approve of any office except the Law Fire Office had in effect claimed to strike out the alternative and deprive the lessee of his option. Such a claim was, in his Lordship's judgment, quite inadmissible. He agreed that the appeal must be allowed and the action dismissed.

Lord Justice Lawrence, having stated the question raised, said that it was one of importance to the plaintiff and his lessees. As regards the plaintiff, it was to his advantage from the point of view of estate management that he should be able to compel his lessees to insure in the Law Fire Office, with which he had made an arrangement for the notification to him of the non-payment of premiums under all policies affected by his lessees. As regards the lessees it was to their advantage to have the power to select the insurance office so as to be in a position to comply with any demand which might be made upon them by their mortgagees to insure in some office suggested by them.

The question turned entirely on the true meaning and effect of a few simple words in the covenant to insure. The covenant was in one of the well-known common forms, and it was worthy of note that the lessor had not adopted another equally well-known form which provided for insurance in a named insurance office or in such other insurance office as the lessor should direct, which if it had been adopted would have justified the plaintiff in selecting the insurance office, but might have rendered his leases less attractive. He (his Lordship) confessed that, but for the opinion of the learned Judge and the arguments of counsel for the respondent, he would have thought that the construction of the covenant did not present any real difficulty. The lessee was given the option of complying with his covenant in one or other of two different ways, namely, either by insuring in the Law Fire Office or by insuring in some other responsible office to be approved by the lessor. The expression "to be approved" connoted that the choice of the other office was in the lessee and that the lessor was to sanction or ratify that choice and not make it himself. The practical effect of the covenant was that the lessee, if so minded, might insure in some responsible office other than the Law Fire Office and might choose such other office, which however must be submitted to the approval of and be approved by the lessor. If that were the true meaning and effect of the covenant, then it followed that the lessor was placed under an implied obligation to consider any responsible insurance office selected by the lessee, and to approve of it unless he had some reasonable ground for objecting to that office, otherwise the option given to the plaintiff would be altogether illusory. The attitude adopted by the plaintiff in insisting on the Law Fire Office was in his (his Lordship's) opinion clearly wrong as it amounted to a complete negation of the right of the lessee to fulfil his obligation under the covenant by insuring in some responsible office other than the Law Fire Office. The lessor was in effect treating the covenant as if it were one to insure in the Law Fire Office only. In the face of the declared intention of the lessor not to approve of any insurance office other than the Law Fire Office, the question of the nature of the grounds upon which he would be justified in withholding his approval of any particular office selected by the lessee did not, in his (his Lordship's) opinion, arise. The plaintiff did not suggest that the Atlas Assurance Company was not in all respects a suitable office in which to insure the buildings comprised in the lease. As, however, the question had been debated, he (his Lordship) desired to express his entire concurrence with the opinions expressed on the point by the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Sargant. The implied obligation resting on the lessor to approve of a responsible insurance office selected by the lessee necessarily involved an obligation not to withhold such approval arbitrarily or unreasonably. The principle of Houlder Brothers and Co. v. Gibbs (41 The Times L.R., 487 ; [1925] Ch., 575) applied as much to a case (such as the present) where the obligation not to withhold approval unreasonably was implied as to a case where such obligation was expressed. On that principle the plaintiff was not entitled to withhold his approval for reasons which, though rational in themselves, were extraneous to the subject-matter of the contract. He agreed that the appeal succeeded.

K.B. Div. (Wright, J.) } 1927. Nov. 3.

COTTAGE CLUB ESTATES, LIMITED v. WOODSIDE ESTATE COMPANY (AMERSHAM), LIMITED.*

Arbitration — Contract — Assignment to third party of moneys due thereunder—Arbitration clause—Whether transferred to third party—Power of arbitrator—Effect of assignment—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 20), s. 136 (1).

Building contractors assigned to a bank all moneys due and to become due to them under the building contract, which contained an arbitration clause, and the proper notice of the assignment was served on the building owners. Disputes having arisen regarding a claim by the contractors for compensation and extra payment, recourse was had to arbitration.

Held, that the arbitrator had jurisdiction to entertain the arbitration since the contractors' rights under the arbitration clause did not constitute a "legal" or "other remedy" for the debt within the meaning of s. 136 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and were, therefore, not passed and transferred to the bank by the assignment.

Held, further, that the arbitrator had to consider not merely the terms of the contract within the limits of the document but also the application and enforcement of those terms having regard to the whole legal position which the parties had created, including the relinquishment by the contractors themselves by the assignment of their right to claim the debt, and, therefore, that he must make his award in favour of the building owners.

His Lordship delivered a considered judgment on this award made in the form of a special case by the arbitrator in an arbitration between the claimants, the Cottage Club Estates, Limited, a firm of building contractors, and the respondents, the Woodside Estate Company (Amersham), Limited, building owners, in which were submitted disputes arising out of a claim by the claimants for £705 compensation and extra payment in connexion with 16 houses erected by the claimants on land belonging to the respondents and pursuant to their instructions.

By their defence the respondents pleaded that by a deed dated August 30, 1926, the claimant contractors had assigned to the Bank of Liverpool and Martins, Limited, all moneys due and to become due under the building contract on which the claim was founded and that written notice of such assignment was served on the respondent building owners by letter dated August 31, 1926, from the solicitors of the bank.

The building owners accordingly contended that the deed of assignment and the notice thereof precluded the contractors from maintaining their claim either in whole or in part. They also submitted that on the interpretation of the contract and on the facts they were not liable for the amount claimed.

The building contract contained an arbitration clause and the disputes regarding the building owners' liability to pay the sum claimed were referred to an arbitrator.

Before the arbitrator the contractors denied that the deed of assignment and the notice thereof were any defence to their claim. They said that the arbitration was under the building contract and under a submission and that the proper parties to the arbitration were the parties to that contract and that submission.

The arbitrator was of opinion that the contentions of the contractors were correct and found that £448 7s. 5d. and costs were due to them from the building owners. At the request of the parties he stated his award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court whether the deed of assignment and the notice thereof precluded the contractors from maintaining their claim. If the Court took the view that they did, he awarded, alternatively, that the contractors were not entitled to recover anything, but were liable to pay to the building owners their costs.

Mr. Barrington-Ward, K.C., and Mr. Bensley Wells appeared for the claimant contractors ; Mr. Cave, K.C., and Mr. Graham Mould for the respondent building owners.

His Lordship reserved judgment.

On November 3, Mr. Justice Wright delivered a considered judgment, in which he said :—Mr. Cave, for the building owners, relied on section 136, subsection 1, of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which is as follows : "Any absolute assignment by writing under the hand of the assignor (not purporting to be by way of charge only) of any debt or other legal thing in action, of which express notice in writing has been given to the debtor, trustee or other person from whom the assignor would have been entitled to claim such debt or thing in action, is effectual in law (subject to equities having priority over the right of the assignee) to pass and transfer from the date of such notice—(a) the legal right to such debt or thing in action ; (b) all legal and other remedies for the same ; and (c) the power to give a good discharge for the same without the concurrence of the assignor. . . ." Mr. Cave submitted that by virtue of those provisions the contractors' rights under the arbitration clause were transferred from them and vested in the bank as coming within the description "all legal and other remedies" for the debt. That argument is not well founded. An arbitration clause is a personal covenant, and in my judgment it cannot be transferred. Nor indeed was it in any sense transferred in this case. If there had been any cross-claim by the building owners against the contractors the arbitration clause would have remained in full force and effect with reference to that claim and, in my opinion, it also remains in full force and effect with reference to all claims made by one of the parties against the other. I think that the parties were entitled to go to arbitration and that the arbitrator was bound to entertain the claim and to come to such conclusion as, on the terms of the contract and the relevant legal considerations, he thought just and proper.

Mr. Cave further, and principally, relied on the contention that the effect of the assignment was to divest the contractors of their right to claim from the building owners the moneys due under the contract. He relied on the express terms of section 136, subsection 1, and maintained that the legal right to a debt or any chose in action had passed from the contractors entirely, and they were now unable to give a good discharge for the debt.

Mr. Barrington-Ward, for the contractors, contended that the award of the arbitrator was right. He admitted that the assignment was absolute and was a good legal assignment of an unquantified debt within the meaning of section 136, subsection 1, of the Act, but he said that the arbitrator was bound to quantify by his award the amount of that unascertained debt.

I do not think that those contentions are right. In my opinion, the arbitrator had jurisdiction under the arbitration clause to deal with this dispute and, in doing so, it was his duty to consider not merely the terms of the contract within the limits of the document, but also the application and enforcement of those terms having regard to the whole legal position which the parties had created. The contractors by their own act had divested themselves of their right to claim the debt. The arbitrator, in considering the rights of the parties, was bound to give effect to that legal position. He has awarded that the contractors are entitled to recover £448 from the building owners. If that award were to stand and to receive effect the position would be that the building owners would have to pay the money to persons who are not now their creditors and who cannot give them a discharge for the debt. They would be liable to pay the same amount—or some other agreed amount—to the bank, and the fulfilment of the award would not be any defence to a claim by the bank.

It may be that, if the contractors sought to enforce the award in its present form, the Court might hold that it was bad on its face, the conclusion expressed in it being inconsistent with the facts stated in it. It cannot be upheld in the form in which, subject to the case, the arbitrator has made it.

As to Mr. Barrington-Ward's contention that the assignment was a matter which was entirely irrelevant to the arbitrator and outside his jurisdiction, an arbitrator may have to take into account matters arising under the general law—for instance, Statutes of Limitation, impossibility of performance or frustration. In the same way he cannot close his eyes to the fact that the claimants have assigned money payable under the contract to a third party who is not a party to the arbitration.

That being so, the award in which the arbitrator in the present case finds that the claimants are entitled to recover £448 from the respondents cannot be upheld. His alternative award must receive the sanction of the Court. According to that award the contractors are not entitled to recover anything from the building owners.

DALE v. MITCALFE.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Income accumulated for benefit of a person contingently—Beneficiary having only a life interest—Claim to relief—Meaning of "benefit"—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 25.

By s. 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918 :—"Where in pursuance of the provisions of any will or settlement any income arising from any fund is accumulated for the benefit of any person contingently on his attaining some specified age or marrying, and the aggregate amount in any year of assessment of that income and the income from any other fund subject to the like trusts for accumulation and of the total income of that person from all sources (hereinafter referred to as 'the aggregate yearly income') is of such an amount only as would entitle an individual either to total exemption from tax or to relief from tax, that person shall, on making a claim for the purpose within three years after the end of the year of assessment in which the contingency happens, be entitled . . . to have repaid to him [a sum calculated as therein mentioned]."

Held, that the words "for the benefit of" include a case where the accumulations of income are added to the capital of a trust fund in which the beneficiary has only a life interest and where therefore the accumulations never pass to the beneficiary.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 481 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 491), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 481 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 491) affirming a decision of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

At a meeting of the General Commissioners on October 29, 1925, Mary Catherine Louise Mitcalfe (formerly Burn), the wife of William Stanley Mitcalfe, of Oak House, 17, Aigburth Hall-road, Liverpool (the respondent), appealed against an objection made by the Inspector of Taxes for Hexham (the appellant) to a claim made by the respondent for relief under section 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of income accumulated under the trusts of the settlement hereinafter referred to.

By section 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918 :—"Where in pursuance of the provisions of any will or settlement any income arising from any fund is accumulated for the benefit of any person contingently on his attaining some specified age or marrying, and the aggregate amount in any year of assessment of that income and the income from any other fund subject to the like trusts for accumulation and of the total income of that person from all sources (hereinafter referred to as 'the aggregate yearly income') is of such an amount only as would entitle an individual either to total exemption from tax or to relief from tax, that person shall, on making a claim for the purpose within three years after the end of the year of assessment in which the contingency happens, be entitled . . . to have repaid to him [a sum calculated as therein mentioned]."

By a settlement dated October 18, 1910, made between (1) John Henry Burn and (2) the trustees therein named, John Henry Burn (the settlor) settled certain stocks, securities, and moneys (the trust funds) upon certain trusts in favour of his children, of whom he then had five—namely, two sons and three daughters, all of whom were minors. Such trusts (so far as they were material to the questions raised in this case) were as follows :—

"Cl. 5. Upon trust for all or any the children or child of the settlor now living or hereafter to be born who being male shall attain the age of 21 years or being female shall attain that age or previously marry if more than one in equal shares except that each son shall take double the share of each daughter.

"Cl. 7. Provided further that the said trustees or trustee shall retain the share of each daughter of the settlor now living of and in the trust funds upon the trusts following (that is to say) the said trustees or trustee shall pay the income thereof to such daughter during her life and so that during coverture the same shall be for her separate use without power of anticipation but which restraint shall not preclude the payment of such income to a bank or banker for the credit of such daughter and after the death of such daughter shall stand possessed of her said share upon the like trusts and subject to the like powers and provisions in favour of the issue of such daughter as are hereinbefore declared and contained concerning the share of each of the sons of the settlor now living in the trust funds to take effect after the death of each of such sons in the same manner in all respects as if such trust powers and provisions were herein repeated with the substitution of the name of the said daughter for such son.

"Cl. 10. Provided always that the said trustees or trustee shall apply the whole or such part as they or he in their or his discretion shall think fit of the income of the expectant or presumptive share (whether settled or unsettled) of any child or grandchild of the settlor in the trust funds under the trusts hereinbefore contained for or towards his or her maintenance education or benefit (whether there is any other fund applicable or any person bound by law to provide for such maintenance or education or not) and may either themselves so apply the same or may pay the same to the parents or guardians or guardian of such child or grandchild for the purpose aforesaid without seeing to the application thereof and shall during the minority of any such child or grandchild and in the case of a female spinsterhood accumulate the surplus (if any) of the same income by investing the same and the resulting income thereof in any of the investments hereby authorized in augmentation and so as to follow the destination of the share from which the same shall have proceeded but with power to apply any such accumulations in any subsequent year for or towards the maintenance education or benefit of the child or grandchild for the time being presumptively entitled as aforesaid in the manner in which such accumulations might have been applied had they been income arising in the then current year."

The following facts were proved or admitted :—

The respondent, then Mary Catherine Louise Burn, was a daughter of the settlor and attained the age of 21 years on May 26, 1921, and was married to her present husband, William Stanley Mitcalfe, on August 31, 1922. Income-tax, at the rates appropriate to each tax year, had been duly paid by deduction or otherwise by the trustees for the time being of the settlement, in respect of the whole income of the trust funds up to May 26, 1921. As from that date the income of her share of the trust funds (including the income of her share of the invested accumulations) had been paid to the respondent, and she had been fully repaid all the tax recoverable by her in respect of such income up to the date of her marriage. The respondent claimed on September 12, 1922, under section 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, repayment of £380 3s. 11d., for or on account of tax paid or deducted in respect of income accumulated during her minority under the settlement. The appellant refused the claim. The accumulations of income from the trust funds were, during the minority of the respondent, set aside to the credit of a separate accumulations fund in the names of the trustees of the settlement.

The appellant refused the claim on the ground that "as the accumulations of the income are added to the capital of the trust fund, which never passes to the beneficiary, the claim under section 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, cannot be admitted."

No question arose as to figures.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent :—That the surplus income of the trust fund had been accumulated during her "minority for her benefit," to the extent of the share thereof to the income of which she became entitled on May 26, 1921, inasmuch as, on attaining the age of 21 years, she became entitled to receive the income from these accumulations in addition to her other income ; that the words "for the benefit of" in section 25 must be given their ordinary meaning, there being nothing in the Act to restrict that meaning in the way suggested by the Crown ; that the surplus income had been accumulating for the benefit of the respondent within the meaning of section 25 none the less because she was not under the trusts of the settlement entitled absolutely to these accumulations ; and that clause 10 of the settlement empowered the trustees of the settlement to apply accumulations in any subsequent year for the benefit of the child or grandchild presumptively entitled to a share in the trust funds in the manner in which such accumulations might have been applied had they been income arising in the then current year.

The Crown contended that the respondent must herself be entitled to the income, and said that, as a matter of fact, it was the income of the trustees.

The General Commissioners held that the respondent was entitled to repayment of the tax, the subject of the claim. The Crown appealed.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt thought that, in substance, the accumulations were "for the benefit" of the respondent, and dismissed the appeal.

The Crown again appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the Crown.

Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Cyril King, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that there were no authorities to guide the Court, but the section itself must be looked at. The Attorney-General had contended that the respondent was not entitled to the repayment, as she had never become absolutely entitled to the accumulations of income but they were to be held by the trustees and added to the corpus. If that were the correct view, then in many settlements, not in the present one, but in many others, there would be a marked differentiation between the shares of sons and the shares of daughters; for in many settlements the shares of sons were payable to them upon attaining 21, while the shares of daughters, in their own interests, were settled upon further trusts. In such cases the taxation would be recoverable by a son in respect of his share, but not by a daughter in respect of hers.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt's decision appeared to be the right one. That Judge had pointed out that by section 25 the rebate was allowed, not in respect of any fund accumulated for a person contingently entitled, but of any fund accumulated for the benefit of any person contingently entitled. It seemed clear to him (the Master of the Rolls) that the accumulations in question were for the benefit of the respondent, even if she were not allowed actually to receive the corpus. They would mean an increased income from a corpus increased by the accumulations, and that would surely be for her benefit. It could hardly be contended that an accumulation added to a daughter's share was not for the benefit of that daughter just because the whole share was not handed over to her.

Further, the right given to recover the tax within a certain time seemed to be in the nature of a personal right. The nature of the interest of the person claiming was the result of the settlement and the operation of the time limit. It did not arise out of any relation between the claimant and the Crown. The present claimant's right arose under the trust. The object of section 25 was to relieve from taxation incomes which ought not to have been taxed, and the person entitled to claim was the person who could prove a claim to moneys which had been accumulated, in the broadest sense, for that person's benefit. The appeal would be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Sargant said that certain provisions of the settlement had not been set out in the case stated. Clause 9, for instance, gave a beneficial power to a son or a daughter of the settlor to appoint a life interest to a surviving husband or wife, and it had been held that a power of jointuring was clearly a power for the person's own benefit, and he might dispose of it or deal with it for a valuable consideration to come to him. Again, clause 11 of the settlement enabled the trustees to raise any part of the capital of a presumptive or vested share, and apply it towards the purchase of any business, or for the purpose of a settlement on an intended marriage of a daughter—again a clause markedly for the benefit of a child, son or daughter. At the time of the passing of the Income Tax Act, 1918, the law was that with regard to the income of a share which was contingent upon a child attaining 21 there was no power to get back any income-tax which had been deducted while the income was being accumulated for the child should the child ultimately reach 21. There was really no reason why such a child, on reaching 21, should not have had the benefit of an income-tax rebate on small incomes, as a child in whom the income was vested would have had; but that was the position of affairs, and section 25 was undoubtedly passed for the express purpose of putting a child whose share was contingent upon the same footing as a child whose share was vested. That being so, it was hardly likely that the Legislature in removing one anomaly would create another, and, looking at a very ordinary form of settlement, where the shares of sons and daughters were both contingent, but a son on reaching 21 was entitled absolutely to his share, and a daughter on reaching that age found that her share was settled on trust for herself for life, with remainder to her issue, it would seem extremely hard in such a case that a son should be able to get back tax deducted from his small income and a daughter should not. With regard to the wording of section 25, "for the benefit of" was not a phrase of art at all. It was a general phrase, to be interpreted in view of the general nature of the subject-matter, and it seemed very difficult to say here that this share of the settled funds was not settled "for the benefit of" the respondent. To put a narrower construction upon the words would defeat the primary object of the section. He agreed that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Justice Lawrence said that the argument of counsel for the Crown was that exemption could only be allowed where the income belonged to the person claiming the exemption; but it seemed to him (Lord Justice Lawrence) that the respondent had sufficient interest in the income to put her upon the same footing as a person absolutely entitled to the accumulations. A restricted meaning should not be given to section 25, or to the particular words "for the benefit of."

REX v. WOOD—EX PARTE ANDERSON.*

Coroner—Inquest—Coroner present during jury's deliberations — Misconduct — Certiorari—Inquisition quashed.

At the conclusion of the evidence in an inquest on the body of a man killed by a motor-car the jury retired and after some time sent for the coroner who went into the jury room and remained with the jury in private for a quarter of an hour. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death," but added a rider censuring the driver of the motor-car.

Held, that in going into the jury room during the deliberations of the jury, the coroner was guilty of misconduct, and the inquisition must be quashed and a fresh inquest held before the coroner for an adjoining district.

Reg., at the prosecution of O'Brien and Bourchier (17 Ir. L.T., 34) and In re Mitchelstown Inquisition (22 L.R.Ir., 279) approved and followed.

This was a rule nisi for a certiorari to quash the inquisition taken before Mr. John Richardson Wood, the coroner for the Thirsk Division of the North Riding of Yorkshire, on an inquest to inquire into the death of Mr. Walter Tindall, a veterinary surgeon, of The Hollies, Stillington. On August 4, 1927, Mr. Tindall was knocked down and killed by a motor-car driven by Mr. Henry Yarborough Anderson, of The Cottage, Bishopthorpe, near York. The inquest was held on August 6 and 9, and the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death," but added a rider that they thought that there had been a certain amount of negligence and they desired to censure severely the driver of the motor-car.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Anderson obtained a rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up and quash the inquisition on the grounds, (a) that the coroner was in the jury's retiring-room while they were considering their verdict and he took the verdict in private, and (b) that the verdict and the rider were contradictory and bad on the face of them.

Mr. Guy Lailey showed cause for the coroner; Mr. H. J. Wallington supported the rule for the applicant; and Mr. A. R. Linsley appeared for the Chief Constable of the North Riding of Yorkshire.

Mr. LAILEY read long affidavits describing in detail the proceedings at the inquest, and suggesting that the coroner, who was an old man, was unable to appreciate the evidence; that he failed to direct the jury or give any sufficient summing-up; and that after the jury retired he went, at their request, to their room and remained with them for a quarter of an hour. That fact was admitted by the coroner in his affidavit. Mr. Lailey admitted that the going to the jury room was irregular, but said that what was complained of was not the actual verdict, but the rider. He submitted that the Court had power at common law to strike out the rider, but he contended that it was not inconsistent with the verdict. If, in the jury's opinion, the negligence was not criminal and would not justify a verdict of "Manslaughter," "Accidental death" was the right verdict.

Mr. WALLINGTON said that, while he desired to say as little as possible to wound the feelings of the coroner or his family, it was clear on the evidence, which was uncontradicted by the coroner, that the coroner was not in a fit state to conduct the inquiry, and that the jury had really never had the case put before them by a coroner fit to do so.

On the question of his presence in the jury room, reference was made to Reg., at the prosecution of O'Brien and Bourchier—the Ballyragget case—(17 Ir. L.T., 34); and to In re Mitchelstown Inquisition (22 L.R.Ir., 279). There appeared to be no English or Scottish authority.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—This is a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to remove into this Court an inquisition taken before one of the coroners for Yorkshire on August 6 and 9, 1927, on the body of one Walter Tindall. It is sought to bring that inquisition into this Court in order that it may be quashed without further order. Various grounds are set out in the rule. It is enough, I think, to refer to the first of them: that is, the ground that the coroner was guilty of misconduct in, first, being present in the jury's retiring room; secondly, taking the verdict from the jury privately. With regard to the facts of the case there does not appear to be any substantial dispute. According to the affidavit of Mr. Anderson, who was present at the inquest, the following matters happened after the jury had retired to consider their verdict: "The jury had been absent for approximately 20 minutes when they sent a message asking to see the coroner. The coroner then went to the room into which the jury had retired, remaining alone with them at least a quarter of an hour. The coroner then came back into the room where the inquiry was held, and, sitting down at the top of the table, turned to Mr. Crombie" (that is a gentleman who was engaged as a solicitor on behalf of one of the parties) "and whispered certain words to him. Mr. Crombie, who was seated next to me, whispered to me saying that the coroner had told him, 'Verdict of accidental death but they wish the driver to be censured.' The jury then returned to the room, and on being asked by the coroner whether they had agreed on their verdict, the foreman answered, 'Yes' and read, from a piece of paper in his hand, the following words, 'We find after carefully considering all the evidence that Mr. Tindall was accidentally killed by being knocked down by a motor-car, but the jury are of the opinion that there has been a certain amount of negligence on the part of the driver of the car and they wish to pass a severe vote of censure upon him.'" In like manner, Mr. Crombie in his affidavit says, "The jury accordingly, under the guidance of the police, then retired into another room on the ground floor. The jury had been absent for about 20 minutes when I was informed and believe that they sent for the coroner, and that he accordingly went into their retiring room and remained with them for about a quarter of an hour. I was with Mr. Anderson in the room on the first floor where the adjourned inquest was being held. The coroner returned into this room just prior to the jury returning and sat in his seat. I was sitting immediately on his left. The coroner whispered to me, 'It is all right, it is a verdict of accidental death, but the jury want the driver censured.' I repeated these words in a whisper to Mr. Anderson. The jury then returned, and, on being asked by the coroner whether they were agreed on their verdict, the foreman of the jury stood up and said, 'Yes,' holding in his hand a piece of paper from which he read the following words,"—those are the words I have already referred to. Now what is the observation of the coroner himself upon this matter? It is very brief. All he says is this, "I went to the jury's retiring room at their request as alleged in the affidavit of Mr. Anderson and dealt with the questions upon which they sought my direction." It is not necessary, I think, to enter into other questions which are raised by the affidavits and by the arguments in this case. Speaking for myself I confine my judgment to this sole ground. It seems to me to be clearly contrary to public policy that a coroner should go into the jury's room after they have retired to consider their verdict, even though it be for the purpose of answering an inquiry which the jury seek to make of him, or of giving the jury further directions which they request. The principle, it seems to me, was clearly stated in a few words in the Irish case, to which reference has been made, in the year 1882, the case of Reg., at the prosecution of O'Brien and Bourchier (17 Ir.L.T., 34). That was a case which came before a Court consisting of Lord Chief Justice May, Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, and Mr. Justice Barry, and one of the allegations was that during the time when the coroner's jury in that case were in deliberation, the coroner and his clerk remained present. In giving judgment, in which Mr. Justice Fitzgerald and Mr. Justice Barry concurred, Chief Justice May said at page 36: "As to his not interfering in the discussion when the jury were deliberating, this is no excuse. He has violated the principle to be observed in such cases. The jury should have been segregated from all the rest of the public. This is the proper practice, and it is no answer to the complaint to say that the coroner read the evidence to the jurors when they returned to the room." In like manner in another Irish case, in the year 1888, In re Mitchelstown Inquisition (22 L.R.Ir., 279), an inquisition was quashed on the ground of irregularity and of misconduct. In that case also after the jury had retired, the coroner, being informed that the jury had agreed, but before their verdict was declared, entered the room where they were in consultation and took their verdict in the room before returning into Court. Those matters having been proved, it became common ground that that inquisition could not be supported. The case was heard before a Court consisting of Chief Justice Sir Michael Morris, Mr. Justice Harrison, Mr. Justice O'Brien, and Mr. Justice Murphy ; and Chief Justice Morris, in giving the judgment of the whole Court, used these words at page 301 : "I now approach a portion of the case with considerable reluctance, because I am obliged to discuss the conduct of the coroner. I am not going to enter into a pedantic exposition of the whole line of authorities showing that an inquisition could be quashed for misconduct on the part of the judicial officer who held it. The cases were to be found in Grady and Scotland's Crown Practice. I will only refer to the Ballyragget case"—that is the case in 17 Irish Law Times I have already mentioned—"which was decided in this Court before Lord Chief Justice May, the present Lord Fitzgerald and the present Lord Justice Barry. In that case it was held that the coroner, being in the room with the jury before they found their verdict, was an irregularity for which there was no excuse." And having referred to the facts of the case then before the Court the Chief Justice went on to say : "The coroner called his apprentice into the jury room and the apprentice swore that the coroner took no part in the deliberations of the jury, although the apprentice was not there when the coroner first went in, and the apprentice said that the finding which he wrote down was dictated to him by the coroner and not by the jury. But the question did not depend on any groping to ascertain whether or not the coroner interfered. It was public policy that the coroner should not go into the jury room, but that the jury should declare their verdict in open Court." Those words, and all those words, seem to me to apply clearly to the present case. I forbear to enter into other matters ; especially do I refrain from making any observations upon the very things which the coroner said and did. It is not suggested by anybody that when he was in the jury room he was doing anything other than helping the jury according to their request with their verdict ; but so doing in that place, in those circumstances, he was doing something which ought not to have been done. I am clearly of the opinion, therefore, that this rule should be made absolute and this inquisition quashed.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I am of the same opinion. I think the cases which have been quoted in the Irish Courts are sufficient authority for quashing this inquisition upon the first ground on which the rule was granted. Quite apart from that there appear to me to be general grounds for saying that the proceedings in this case before the coroner were quite unsatisfactory and that the jury never had any proper direction before them as to what their duty was in this case. I agree that the inquisition should be quashed.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I agree. I think that the segregation of the jury while considering their verdict is an essential principle in all jury trials and that principle was not observed on this occasion.

The Lord Chief Justice.—The order of the Court is that an inquest be held touching the said death and that that inquest be held by the Coroner for the Pickering district of the North Riding of Yorkshire, Mr. J. F. Porter. There need be no view of the body.

WILSON v. YATES.*

Animals—Disease—Notice to police constable—Knowledge of owner—Diseases of Animals Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., c. 57), ss. 4, 52, 57.

This was a case stated by Derbyshire Justices.

At a Court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Belper, in the county of Derby, a complaint was preferred by Joseph Wilson (a superintendent of police, hereinafter called "the appellant") against John Thomas Yates (hereinafter called "the respondent"), "for that he on February 5, 1927, in the county of Derby, being the owner of two cows affected with foot and mouth disease did fail to give notice with all practicable speed of the fact of the animals being so affected to a constable of the county of Derby," in contravention of the provisions of section 4 of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894. The said Court of summary jurisdiction dismissed the said complaint.

Upon the hearing of the said complaint the following facts were proved or admitted :—

(1) That the respondent was a farmer carrying on business at Champion Farm, Quarndon, in the county of Derby.

(2) That on February 5, 1927, he was the owner of two cows which were affected with foot and mouth disease.

(3) That the respondent did not give notice as required by section 4 of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, until February 7, 1927.

(4) No evidence was called on behalf of the respondent, but it was contended on his behalf that as there was no evidence before the Court that he knew the said animals were suffering from foot and mouth disease before February 7, 1927, he had discharged the onus which lay upon him under section 4 of the before-mentioned Act by giving notice upon that date. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that as it was proved that the said animals were in fact affected with foot and mouth disease on February 5, 1927, section 57 of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, placed the burden of proof upon the respondent, and that the justices were not entitled to dismiss the said complaint until the respondent had shown to the satisfaction of the Court that he had no knowledge that the animals were so affected and could not with reasonable diligence have obtained that knowledge.

The justices accepted the contention on the part of the respondent, and rejected the contention on the part of the appellant, and accordingly unanimously dismissed the said complaint.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether upon the above statement of facts the justices came to a correct determination and decision in point of law.

By the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, section 4 (1): "Every person having in his possession or under his charge an animal affected with disease shall . . . (b) with all practicable speed give notice of the fact of the animal being so affected to a constable of the police force for the police area wherein the animal so affected is."

The omission to give such notice is, by section 52, made an offence against the Act.

By section 57 (1) : "Where the owner or person in charge of an animal is charged with an offence against this Act, relative to disease or to any illness of the animal, he shall be presumed to have known of the existence of the disease or illness, unless and until he shows to the satisfaction of the Court that he had no knowledge thereof, and could not with reasonable diligence have obtained that knowledge."

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. H. H. Maddocks appeared for the appellant; the respondent was not represented.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—This is a perfectly clear case. The justices dismissed this charge on the contention by the respondent that as there was no evidence before the Court that he knew these animals were suffering from foot and mouth disease before February 7 he had fulfilled his duty under section 4 by giving notice on that date. The respondent chose in the Court below to hold his tongue and not give evidence. The appellant in those circumstances contended that section 57 placed the burden of proof on the respondent. That is manifestly true. In other words, the present respondent succeeded below in arguing that the presumption of knowledge was the exact opposite of that which the statute says it shall be. The case must go back to the justices with a direction to convict.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I agree.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—I agree.

REX v. ELECTRICITY COMMISSIONERS—EX PARTE YORKSHIRE ELECTRIC POWER COMPANY.*

Electricity—Supply—Company—Special Act—Application by local authority to take over supply—Whether consent of company required—Yorkshire Electric Power Act, 1901 (1 Edw. VII., c. cxvi.), s. 49.

The Yorkshire Electric Power Company were by the Yorkshire Electric Power Act, 1901, empowered to supply energy within an area including the urban district of Silsden. Section 49 of the Act provided: "Nothing in this Act shall prejudice any application which is now being or may hereafter be made by any local authority company or person for a Provisional Order under the principal Acts for power to supply energy within the area of supply under this Act and in any Provisional Order to be granted by the Board of Trade [now the Electricity Commissioners] authorizing any local authority company or person so to supply energy provision may be made as to the taking over of any supply then given by the company for use exclusively within the area of supply defined in such Order."

The Silsden Urban District Council having applied to the Commissioners for a Special Order (taking the place of the former Provisional Order) for power to supply energy within their urban district, and to take over the supply given by the Yorkshire Electric Power Company, the company sought to prohibit the Commissioners from proceeding with the consideration of the Draft Special Order, on the ground that the consent of the company was required.

Held, that s. 49 clearly contemplated proceedings in invitum and that the consent of the company was not necessary, and that the Commissioners were not usurping jurisdiction in proceeding to consider the Draft Order.

This was a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition at the instance of the Yorkshire Electric Power Company, directed to the Electricity Commissioners, to prohibit them from proceeding with the further consideration of an application by the Silsden Urban District Council for the amendment of the Silsden Electricity (Draft) Special Order, whereof notice was given on June 2, 1927; and from making an order giving effect to the application. The rule was obtained on the ground that the provisions which the council sought by the amendment to include in the Order were ultra vires of the Electricity Commissioners.

The Yorkshire Electric Power Company was incorporated by the Yorkshire Electric Power Act, 1901, its area being a portion of the West Riding, including the whole of the urban district of Silsden. By section 48 of the Act the company was restricted to supplying energy to authorized undertakers and to persons requiring a supply for power. These restrictions were removed by a later Act. By section 49:—

"Nothing in this Act shall prejudice any application which is now being or may hereafter be made by any local authority company or person for a Provisional Order under the principal Acts for power to supply energy within the area of supply under this Act and in any Provisional Order to be granted by the Board of Trade authorizing any local authority company or person so to supply energy provision may be made as to the taking over of any supply then given by the company for use exclusively within the area of supply defined in such Order."

On April 20, 1926, the Silsden Urban District Council served upon the company notice of an application to the Electricity Commissioners for a special order under the Electricity (Supply) Acts, 1882 to 1922, to authorize the council as undertakers to supply electrical energy for all public and private purposes. The council later intimated that they proposed to ask for the inclusion in the order of a provision enabling the council to take over the distribution mains of the company in the Silsden urban district. Notice of an application for amendment of the order accordingly was served on the company on June 2, 1927.

On July 4, 1927, the company sent to the Electricity Commissioners their objections that it was ultra vires of the Electricity Commissioners to make, and of the Minister of Transport to confirm, an order containing the proposed provisions as to the transfer of the supply of electricity and of low-tension mains without the consent, and against the wishes, of the company. The company's view was that the intention of section 49 of the Yorkshire Electric Power Act, 1901, was that where the parties were agreed upon a transfer of supply the Commissioners might make an order giving statutory effect to that agreement.

The Commissioners intimated their intention to proceed with the consideration of the proposed amendment, whereupon the company obtained this rule nisi.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. W. Bowstead showed cause for the Electricity Commissioners ; Mr. Tristram Beresford appeared for the Silsden U.D.C. ; and Mr. Rowand Harker, K.C., Mr. W. P. Donald, and Mr. H. M. Paul supported the rule.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL submitted that the company's contention involved the insertion of the words "with the consent of the company" in section 49. That section was, in terms, intended to prevent prejudice to the applications therein described. Anything more certain to prejudice these applications than a requirement that the consent of the company should be given was hard to imagine.

The COURT suggested that the application for prohibition was premature. It was not clear that the Commissioners would make the order asked for by the urban district council ; it might be that they would decide to make an order quite satisfactory to the company.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—This seems like a substitute for a consultative case under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, whereby the Court is asked to give an arbitrator its opinion on law to guide his decision beforehand.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—Is this not within the rule that where there is jurisdiction the proper remedy is by appeal, not by prohibition ? Have not the Commissioners clearly jurisdiction to entertain the application of the urban district council ?

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL agreed that it would be more convenient to wait till the order was made and then, if necessary, proceed by certiorari. He was, however, quite prepared to argue the case, unless the Court thought it more convenient to decide the question whether the application was premature.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—The Court's difficulty is that we must beware of making a bad precedent. We should launch upon a sea which has no shore if we began to decide proleptically questions of law which may or may not arise in the future. We should like to hear Mr. Harker on this question.

Mr. HARKER said that if he could satisfy their Lordships that the Commissioners were contemplating making an order in the terms asked by the urban district council, and that they had no power to do so, then he submitted that prohibition was the right remedy. All that the Commissioners could do was to make an order "as to the taking over of any supply then given by the company for use exclusively within the area of supply defined in such order." Suppose that at the date of the order the company were supplying one of their customers with 100 kilowatts, that was the supply "then" given to that customer, and that was all that could be transferred. The Silsden Urban District Council asked for a transfer of the whole supply ; they were not entitled to that.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—I have hitherto been reading the section as meaning that the new undertakers may take over any supply then given by the company, provided that when they have got it they use it exclusively within the area defined in the order.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that he read the words from "supply then given" to "order" as one compound substantive.

Mr. HARKER said that it had been decided by Mr. Justice Tomlin that, in the absence of contract to the contrary, a consumer who received energy within the supply area might use it either within or without the area. It was only in regard to such supplies as were in fact exclusively used within the area that an order could be made for transfer.

Mr. Harker developed at length his argument that the consent of the company was necessary before an order could be made transferring the supply of energy. He submitted that in the absence of any express provision for compensation the Court should not interpret the Act as giving compulsory powers of transfer. Counsel also dealt with the question of transferring the company's low-tension mains as distinct from the right of supply.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Suppose that the Commissioners made an order transferring the consumers and the right of supply, would it not be more advantageous to the company that the appropriate mains should be taken over, subject to proper compensation, than that they should lie idle ?

Mr. HARKER said that he had not sufficient information on the technical side to answer that. It seemed to be a question of what was included in "supply." If it were clear, as seemed to be indicated by one of the Commissioners' letters, that they did not intend to make any order dealing specifically with low-tension mains, he must admit that there was no case for prohibition on that point. It might be that the low-tension mains were not used exclusively within the area of the urban district council, and that at some time some tribunal would have to consider precisely what came under the word "supply." The question was one of great importance not only to the Yorkshire Power Company, but to all power companies, all, or nearly all, of which had similar clauses in their Acts.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—This is a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the Electricity Commissioners from proceeding with the further consideration of a certain application by the Urban District Council of Silsden for the amendment of the Silsden Electricity Draft Special Order and from making an order giving effect to that application. The grounds for the rule were that the provisions which, as it was said, the council seek by the said amendment to include in the order are ultra vires of the Electricity Commissioners.

It is not necessary, I think, after the course which the argument before us has taken, to review all the facts leading up to the present application, but it is to be observed that the remedy which is now being sought by the Yorkshire Power Company is the remedy of prohibition ; that is to say, this Court is being asked to issue a writ directed to the Electricity Commissioners for the purpose of preventing them from usurping a jurisdiction with which they are not legally vested. It is therefore material to see exactly upon what ground it is alleged that the Electricity Commissioners are usurping, or are about to usurp, a jurisdiction of that character. The question arises with reference to section 49 of the Yorkshire Electric Power Act, 1901. That Act, of course, was passed at a time when the Electricity Commissioners had not yet come into existence. To-day the Electricity Commissioners stand in the shoes, for this purpose, of the old Board of Trade, and the order of the Electricity Commissioners stands in the place of what at that time was a Provisional Order. Section 49 of the local Act of 1901 provides as follows : "Nothing in this Act shall prejudice any application which is now being or may hereafter be made by any local authority company or person for a Provisional Order under the principal Acts for power to supply energy within the area of supply under this Act and in any Provisional Order to be granted by the Board of Trade authorizing any local authority company or person so to supply energy provision may be made as to the taking over of any supply then given by the company for use exclusively within the area of supply defined in such order." Now the real ground, and, I think it is strictly accurate to say, at the close of the argument the only ground, upon which it is alleged that the Electricity Commissioners are about to usurp a jurisdiction is that according to the contention of the Power Company these words in the second half of section 49 of the statute with reference to the taking over of an existing supply ought to be, but by the Electricity Commissioners are not about to be, read as if they included the expression, or some such expression as, "with the consent of the company." The gist of the argument for this rule consists, and consists solely, in the contention that the transfer or taking over which is provided for in the second half of section 49 can be ordered only if there is an antecedent agreement between the company and the local authority that such a transfer or taking over shall be made, and as to the terms upon which it should be made; and it is said that when one looks at the correspondence exhibited to the affidavit in this case it is apparent that the Electricity Commissioners are at any rate in a mood to consider an application involving a transfer of that nature in the absence of such assent on the part of the company. The real question, therefore, which has to be decided on the present application is whether it is true to say, as a matter of law, that in the second part of section 49 of the Yorkshire Electric Power Act, 1901, words are to be inserted or are to be regarded as being present which require the antecedent assent of the company. In my opinion that construction would be a misconstruction of this section. In the first place, there are no such words in the section, and, when one looks a few lines higher up the page to the last subsection of the next preceding section, one finds that where consent is being dealt with the statute uses express words about it. Subsection (4) of section 48 provides that "After any place shall have become the whole or part of the area of supply of a distributing authority the company shall not without the consent of such authority supply," &c. The question of consent in a proper case was clearly present to the mind of the Legislature. But when one comes to section 49 it is natural to ask, what is the scheme and purpose of this section? It may be expressed in very simple terms. Where the company has acquired the large powers which are conferred by this statute, nevertheless there may be a local application by, for example, a local authority, and section 49 begins by saying in the clearest, the most unambiguous, language, "Nothing in this Act shall prejudice any application which is now being or may hereafter be made by any local authority . . . for a Provisional Order . . . for power to supply energy within the area of supply under this Act." Could it possibly be suggested, even for controversial purposes, that such an application as that required the consent of the company? The very essence of it is that it is made in invitum, and the powers with which the company is by this Act clothed are not in the smallest degree to prejudice such an application, although the effect of granting the application is pro tanto to curtail the activities and, it may be, the profits of the company. Section 49, that is to say, begins by providing that, without the consent and, it may well be, very much against the will and, as it is thought, against the interests of the company, the local authority may make such an application, and that application so being made is not to be prejudiced by any of the provisions of this Act. How paradoxical it would be if, when the section has started in that way, we are to import the exactly opposite words, "with the consent of the company," into the second part of the section. If the section were to be re-written as a whole in the way which is suggested, it would have to take some such form as this: "Nothing in this Act shall prejudice any application without the consent of the company made by any local authority for a Provisional Order, and in any Provisional Order to be granted, provision may be made with the consent of the company as to the taking over of any supply," &c. In my opinion not only is the meaning of this section made plain by the omission in this context of any words about consent, but the whole scheme and system, as well as the phrasing of the section, make it plain that consent on the part of the company is not necessary. I think, therefore, that this application for a writ of prohibition fails upon the threshold.

It was said that the transfer or the taking over which is contemplated in the last words of section 49 could not possibly be a transfer without consent, for the reason that nothing is expressly said as to compensation or the mode of assessing compensation, but the words which are used are, "provision may be made as to the taking over of any supply"; and, as has been held again and again, and as was clearly stated in the case of Cannon Brewery Company v. Gas Light and Coke Company (20 The Times L.R., 543; [1904] A.C., 331), to which Mr. Rowand Harker in the course of his argument referred, it is not to be supposed that any property is to be transferred or taken over by a local authority from a company without payment of compensation unless the statute so provides. The fact that there is no mention of compensation, so far from excluding compensation, shows that compensation is payable for the reason that it is not said not to be payable.

With regard to the remaining points, which turn upon two phrases respectively in the last words of section 49—namely, the word "supply" and the words "given by the company for use exclusively within"—it is not necessary, I think, to express any opinion; and that for two reasons. In the first place, with regard to one of these phrases, Mr. Rowand Harker frankly admits that in view of the letter dated the 4th day of October, 1927, from the Electricity Commissioners the point with reference to the word "supply" cannot be said at present to arise and may never arise; and with regard to the words, "given by the company for use exclusively within," the possible construction which was suggested in the course of the argument is a construction well worthy, no doubt, of consideration, but, as it is conceded, not yet so much as mentioned by the Electricity Commissioners. I do not wish to be led into a superfluous discussion as to the meaning of these phrases at the close of this section, both for other reasons and because any such discussion would tend to obscure what has now become perfectly clear at the close of this long, though not too long, argument, that the real point here is that it is urged by the Power Company that the transfer of the existing supply, if made, must be made with the consent of the company. That, I think, is an erroneous view, and, failing in that, those who seek this writ of prohibition in my opinion fail altogether.

In these circumstances and for these reasons I think that this rule ought to be discharged.

Mr. Justice Avory.—In view of the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of Rex v. Electricity Commissioners (39 The Times L.R., 715; [1924] 1 K.B., 171), I do not think that we ought to decide this case upon the ground, as at one time suggested, that the application was in any view premature. That being so, the question is whether there is any evidence before the Court that the Electricity Commissioners are now about to proceed in any matter which is not within their jurisdiction. I entirely agree with the judgment of my Lord that upon the main question, and the only question upon which it was suggested originally that the Electricity Commissioners were about to exceed their jurisdiction in that they were about to make an order under this section without the consent of the company, there is no ground for saying that section 49 ought to be read as if it indicated that the order could not be made without the consent of the company. Mr. Harker has quite frankly admitted that his contention involves reading at all events into the latter part of the section the words "provision may be made with the consent of the company." I see no ground whatever, especially in view of the comparison between section 48, subsection (4), and section 49, for putting that construction upon this section.

Then with regard to the remaining points which have been argued: first of all as to the question whether taking over the supply involves taking over the low-tension mains, it is now admitted that the Commissioners do not propose to make any order in excess of their jurisdiction in that respect.

With regard to the last contention as to the meaning of the words "supply given for use exclusively within the area," there appears to me to be no ground for saying, and there is no evidence, that the Commissioners are about to put any wrong construction upon this Act of Parliament; and, even if there were any indication that they were about to do that, it appears to me that it is well worthy of consideration whether the case to which I have called attention of Denaby Main Colliery Company v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway Company (3 Neville and Macnamara's Railway Cases, 426) is not an authority for the proposition that such an anticipated misconstruction of an Act of Parliament by such a body is not subject-matter for prohibition. I observe that that case does not appear to have been quoted in the Court of Appeal when the decision was given in the case of Rex v. Electricity Commissioners (supra). It is unnecessary to express any opinion upon the proper construction of those words in the last two lines of that section because, as I have said, there is at present no indication that the Commissioners are about to put any particular construction upon them. For these reasons I agree that the rule should be discharged.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I am of the same opinion, and I will give my reasons shortly because this motion raises questions of some general importance, inasmuch as it involves the construction of a section of an Act of Parliament which is in a form frequently employed.

The question is whether the Electricity Commissioners are threatening or intending to make an order in excess of their powers. They are proposing to consider the expediency of making an amendment to the Draft Special Order which would require and compel the Yorkshire Electric Power Company to submit to the taking over by the Silsden Urban District Council of the supply now given by the company within the area of the council. It is said, and it is the only point, that section 49, properly read, does not authorize any such order except by consent. The Yorkshire Electric Power Company are exempt by their private Acts from provisions of certain public Acts under which they would have been liable to be bought out by the district council, so far as the urban district is concerned, upon a mere notice after the lapse of a certain time; but having been thus exempted, they then come under the liability of section 48, subsection 4, the result of which is that, if an order were made (and a draft order has been made) authorizing the Urban District Council to supply energy within their district, the Yorkshire Electric Power Company might continue to supply their present customers; all other consumers in that district would be the customers and the exclusive customers of the local authority, and it may be—I am not sure whether it would be—that the present consumers of the Yorkshire Electric Power Company might transfer themselves to the local authority, or might take a supply from each; the Yorkshire Electric Power Company would have their supply mains in the streets and the local authority would have theirs, and it is obvious that a condition might arise which might not be thought to be in the public interest. That being so, there is the second part of section 49, which provided that a Special Order authorizing a local authority to supply in their district may contain provisions for the taking over of any supply then given by the company. If that be read as being a taking over by consent, it appears to me that it might well render futile the order empowering the local authority. Further, it is obvious that the first part of section 49 contemplates proceedings in invitum. It is, I think, exceedingly difficult to read the latter part as confined to cases of transfer by consent. Mr. Harker's reading would involve the writing in of the words "by consent" after the words "as to the taking over," and I can see no warrant for writing these words into that section. It is quite true that the words which we have to construe are apt and necessary in the case of an agreement to transfer. The Yorkshire Electric Power Company could not relieve themselves of their duties and liabilities under that Act except by an order, and if an agreement were made between them and the local authority to transfer the existing supply they would require to have such agreement recorded and sanctioned in the Special Order. To my mind it does not at all follow that because they cannot be relieved of their duties without an order, they cannot be relieved of their duties against their will.

With regard to the second point, as to the meaning of the words which qualify the word "supply" in the closing words of the section, it has already been pointed out—this point has not yet been submitted to the Commissioners—that there is nothing to show that they will read these words in any sense other than that in which Mr. Harker says they ought to be read.

For these reasons I think that the rule must be discharged on these grounds.

The Lord Chief Justice.—Perhaps it would be useful to add that we have not dealt with the question of low-tension mains, for the obvious reason that there is nothing to indicate that in that respect, or in any respect, there is any evidence on the part of the Commissioners of an intention to usurp jurisdiction; but perhaps with a view to the future it may be well to emphasize what was said in argument. Conceivably it might possibly hereafter be suggested that the Commissioners ought to include, or ought to have included, a transfer of the low-tension mains in their order. In view of that possibility (which is no more than a possibility) it may be well to mention and to record the fact that Mr. Rowand Harker expressly stated that he did not ask for that.

Court of Criminal Appeal.
(Lord Hewart, C.J., Avory and Salter, JJ.)
1927. Oct. 17.

REX v. TEESDALE.*

Criminal Law—Vagrancy—Incorrigible rogue—Previous conviction—"Shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond"—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV., c. 83), ss. 4, 5.

It is not necessary in order that a person may be dealt with as an incorrigible rogue under s. 5 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, on a second conviction for any of the offences named in s. 4 of that Act, that the previous conviction should use the actual words "rogue and vagabond," since the statute itself provides that a person convicted of any of those offences "shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond."

This was an appeal against sentence. The appellant, Thomas Teesdale, was convicted on January 7, 1925, at a court of summary jurisdiction at Lincoln, of exposing his person with intent to insult females, which was one of the offences named in section 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824. In the conviction as drawn up the words "rogue and vagabond" were not used, the offence being described as "Vagrancy—exposing person with intent to insult certain females in Boultham-lane."

On July 12, 1927, the appellant was again convicted before a court of summary jurisdiction at Lincoln of indecent exposure, and on the previous conviction being proved was committed to Quarter Sessions for sentence as an incorrigible rogue. He was there sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment, with hard labour. Leave was granted to appeal against sentence.

Mr. A. M. Lyons appeared for the appellant; Mr. Tinsley Lindley appeared for the Crown.

Mr. Lyons contended that Teesdale was wrongly convicted as an incorrigible rogue, and that therefore the sentence could not stand. Quarter Sessions had before it a certificate which, after reciting the conviction of the present offence, went on to certify that Teesdale on January 7, 1925, was convicted as a rogue and vagabond. That was inaccurate, for the conviction itself when referred to showed that he had only been convicted of indecent exposure, and the justices had not thought fit to add, as they might have done, an adjudication that he was a rogue and vagabond. Such a previous adjudication was an essential condition precedent to conviction as an incorrigible rogue.

The Lord Chief Justice.—But section 4 says that any person convicted of the offences named in that section "shall be deemed" a rogue and vagabond. Can you contend that a special adjudication using the very words "rogue and vagabond" is necessary? Dose it not automatically follow on conviction?

Mr. Lyons submitted that it did not, but that justices might refrain from adding the description "rogue and vagabond" to the conviction, if in their opinion the case was such that a second conviction ought not to carry with it the very serious consequences of being an incorrigible rogue. He referred to Rex v. Evans (31 The Times L.R., 410; [1915] 2 K.B., 762, at p. 765) and Rex v. Johnson (25 The Times L.R., 229; [1909] 1 K.B., 439, at p. 443).

The Lord Chief Justice.—This appellant, Thomas Teesdale, was convicted at a court of summary jurisdiction at Lincoln of being an incorrigible rogue within the meaning of section 5 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, in that he did indecently expose his person with intent to insult a certain female, the appellant having previously been convicted as a rogue and vagabond under section 4 of the same Act. He was sent to Quarter Sessions and was sentenced by the Recorder to 12 months' imprisonment. His application for leave to appeal was heard on August 18, 1927, when his counsel apparently raised for the first time a point which was not taken below, with the result that on this appeal against sentence we are looking into the merits.

The point urged is that upon a true view of the materials before Quarter Sessions the conditions laid down by the statute were not fulfilled. It is necessary to see what those are. By section 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, it is provided that any person who commits any of a large class of acts "shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond within the true intent and meaning of this Act." Section 5 provides: ". . . every person committing any offence against this Act which shall subject him or her to be dealt with as a rogue and vagabond, such person having been at some former time adjudged so to be and duly convicted thereof . . . shall be deemed an incorrigible rogue within the true intent and meaning of this Act; and it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace to commit such offender . . . to the house of correction, there to remain until the next general or quarter sessions of the Peace. . . ."

In other words, in order that a person may be committed to the house of correction, there to remain until the next general or quarter sessions, he must satisfy the condition that he has committed an offence under this Act, having previously committed an offence which brings him within the category of rogues and vagabonds.

Before Quarter Sessions there was a certificate: "Thomas Teesdale is this day convicted of being an incorrigible rogue"—it enters into particulars and then recites that on January 7, 1925, as was duly proved, the appellant was duly convicted of being a rogue and vagabond. It is not denied that if that certificate is correct, the conditions were complied with, but it is said that in respect of the earlier act there was not in so many words an adjudication that he was a rogue and vagabond, but merely that he was guilty of the offence of exposing his person.

In other words, it is said that he had committed an act which brought him within the category, but that the minute of conviction was insufficient because it did not go on to state what the statute said should be deemed—namely, that he was a rogue and vagabond—and it is said that that was an omission which could not be cured by the certificate before the Quarter Sessions. It is argued that there must be an adjudication in express terms that the person is a rogue and vagabond. Attention has been directed to two cases, Rex v. Evans (31 The Times L.R., 410; [1915] 2 K.B., 762) and Rex v. Johnson (25 The Times L.R., 229; [1909] 1 K.B., 439). With regard to both those authorities it is enough to say that they dealt with cases quite different from the present case, and the condition did not arise. Nor do I think it necessary to deal with the question which arose obiter in Rex v. Evans (supra) whether where a person has been twice convicted as a rogue and vagabond he must necessarily be convicted of being an incorrigible rogue.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question what is the true meaning of the words of section 5 may require consideration on some future day. But the position seems to be as to the second offence that no argument is open to the appellant that the first conviction was not a conviction as a rogue and vagabond, merely because the words "rogue and vagabond" do not in terms appear in the conviction setting forth particulars of an offence mentioned in section 4. In the opinion of the Court that argument fails, not only because the certificate was in proper form or because the point was not taken, but because the justices clearly treated the appellant in the earlier case as having committed an act of such a character that under the Act he was deemed to be a rogue and vagabond.

With regard to the sentence we see no ground for interference.

BIRMINGHAM CORPORATION v. MOTHER-GENERAL OF THE CONVENT OF THE SISTERS OF THE CHARITY OF ST. PAUL AND OTHERS.*

Private Street Works — Objection — Ratio of apportionment — No evidence by objectors— Birmingham Corporation (Consolidation) Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict., c. lxx.), ss. 46 to 50.

The Birmingham Corporation proposed to execute certain private street works under ss. 46 to 50 of the Birmingham Corporation (Consolidation) Act, 1883, which was substantially identical in these provisions with the Private Street Works Act, 1892. The Corporation duly complied with the formalities required and made a provisional apportionment on the respondents, being the frontagers on the street in question, according to their respective frontages. The respondents objected that the works were unnecessary. On the hearing of this objection the respondents called no evidence. The stipendiary magistrate held that some works were necessary, but was of opinion that the estimated expenses were too heavy. He reduced the estimate and ordered that one respondent should pay one-half and each other respondent two-thirds of the respective sums named in the provisional apportionment.

Held, that inasmuch as the Corporation had not resolved that the apportionment should be on any basis other than frontage, the stipendiary magistrate could not direct an apportionment on any other basis. Subject to that limitation, he must consider and determine, upon evidence, whether the proposed works were in any, and what, respect unnecessary, and must have regard to any alternative proposals (if the respondents made any and supported them by evidence) and to the cost thereof.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a case stated by the Stipendiary Magistrate for the City of Birmingham.

1.—The Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Citizens of the City of Birmingham (hereinafter called "the appellants") resolved in pursuance of the Birmingham Corporation (Consolidation) Act, 1883, to do certain private street works in a street known as Greenland-road, Selly Park, in the said city. All the requisite formalities were duly complied with and certain objections were duly lodged in writing by certain owners of premises shown in the provisional apportionment prepared by the appellants as liable to be charged with the expenses of executing the said works in such street. The appellants duly applied to the stipendiary magistrate to determine the matter of these objections, which were heard on the 8th day of March, 1927.

The material sections of the said Act were as follows:—

Sec. 46. "(1) Where any street (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large or a street belonging to or repairable by a railway company) or the carriageway or footway or any other part of such street is not sewered levelled paved metalled macadamised flagged curbed channelled or made good or is not lighted to the satisfaction of the Corporation the Corporation may from time to time resolve with respect to such street or part to do any one or more of the following works (in this Act called private street works) that is to say to sewer level pave metal macadamise flag curb channel or make good or to provide proper means for lighting such street or part and the expenses incurred by the Corporation in executing private street works shall be apportioned (subject as in this Act mentioned) among the premises fronting adjoining or abutting on such street or part. Any such resolution may include several streets or parts of streets or may be limited to any part or parts of a street.

"(2) Provided always that with respect to any such street as shall be of a suburban character the words 'paved' and 'pave' shall with regard to the carriageway thereof be held to mean unless otherwise agreed a covering of broken stone commonly called macadamising and with regard to the footways of such streets the words 'flagged' and 'flag' shall be held to mean unless otherwise agreed a covering of gravel or tar and limestone.

"(3) The surveyor shall prepare as respects each street or part of a street: (a) A specification of the private street works referred to in the resolution with plans and sections (if applicable); (b) an estimate of the probable expenses of the works; (c) a provisional apportionment of the estimated expenses among the premises liable to be charged therewith under this Act.

"(4) Such specifications plans and sections estimates and provisional apportionments shall comprise the particulars prescribed in the first part of the first schedule to this Act and shall be submitted to the Corporation who may by resolution approve the same respectively with or without modification or addition as they think fit.

"(5) The resolution approving the specifications plans and sections (if any) estimates and provisional apportionments shall be published in the manner prescribed in the second part of the first schedule to this Act and copies thereof shall be served on the owners of the premises shown as liable to be charged in the provisional apportionment. During one month from the date of the first publication the approved specifications plans and sections (if any) estimates and provisional apportionments (or copies thereof certified by the surveyor) shall be kept deposited at the Council House and shall be open to inspection at all reasonable times.

Sec. 47. "During the said month not fewer than one-third in number of the owners of any premises shown in a provisional apportionment as liable to be charged with the expenses of executing the works or the owners or owner of any premises shown in a provisional apportionment as liable to be charged with one-third or upwards of such expenses may by written notice served on the Corporation object to the proposals of the Corporation on any of the following grounds (that is to say) :—

"(a) That an alleged street or part is not or does not form part of a street within the meaning of this Act; (b) That a street or part is (in whole or in part) a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large; (c) That there has been some material informality defect or error in or in respect of the resolution notice plans sections or estimate; (d) That the proposed works are unnecessary insufficient or unreasonable or that the estimated expenses are excessive; (e) That any premises ought to be excluded from or inserted in the provisional apportionment; (f) That the provisional apportionment is incorrect in respect of some matter of fact . . . ."

Sec. 48. "(1) The Corporation at any time after the expiration of the said month may apply to a court of summary jurisdiction to appoint a time for determining the matter of all objections made as in this Act mentioned and shall publish a notice of the time and place appointed and at such time and place any such court may proceed to hear and determine the matter of all such objections in the same manner as nearly as may be and with the same powers and subject to the same provisions with respect to stating a case as if the Corporation were proceeding summarily against the objectors to enforce payment of a sum of money summarily recoverable. The court may quash in whole or in part or may amend the resolution plans sections estimates and provisional apportionments or any of them on the application either of any objector or of the Corporation. The Court may also if it thinks fit adjourn the hearing and direct any further notices to be given.

"(2) No objection which could be made under this Act shall be otherwise made or allowed in any court proceeding or manner whatsoever. . . .

"(4) Provided that so long as there is a stipendiary magistrate for the borough he shall be the court of summary jurisdiction for the purposes of this section.

Sec. 49. "(1) The Corporation may include in any works to be done under this Act with respect to any street or part of a street not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large any works which may be reasonably necessary for bringing such street as regards sewerage drainage level or other matters into conformity with any adjoining street (whether repairable or not by the inhabitants at large). . . .

Sec. 50. "(1) In a provisional apportionment of expenses of private street works the apportionment of expenses against the premises fronting adjoining or abutting on the street or part in respect of which the expenses are to be incurred shall unless the Corporation otherwise resolve be apportioned according to the frontage of the respective premises but the Corporation may if they think just resolve that in settling the apportionment regard shall be had to the following considerations (that is to say) :—

"(a) The greater or less degree of benefit to be derived by any premises from such works; (b) The amount and value of any work already done by the owners or occupiers of any such premises."

The Birmingham Corporation Act, 1924, provided :—

Sec. 28. "(1) In sections 46 to 62 (relating to private street works) of the Act of 1883 the words 'paved' 'metalled' and 'flagged' shall be construed as including macadamised asphalted gravelled or made good by any other method and the words 'pave' 'metal' and 'flag' shall have a corresponding meaning.

"(2) The words 'macadamised' and 'macadamise' in section 46 of the Act of 1883 and sub-section (2) of that section are hereby repealed."

The Public Health Act, 1925, provided :—

Sec. 81. "Any local authority, by whom notices requiring the execution of works have been served under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, or any provision relating to street works in a local Act, may, if they think fit, at any time resolve to contribute the whole or a portion of the expenses of the works."

2.—On the hearing of the said objections it was proved :—

(a) That a certain street known as Greenland-road, Selly Park, in the said city, was an unadopted highway not repairable by the inhabitants at large;

(b) That the appellants by resolution dated the 10th day of April, 1924, resolved to do certain private street works in respect of the said street;

(c) That a specification of the private street works referred to in the said resolution, an estimate of the probable expenses of the works and a provisional apportionment of the estimated expenses among the premises liable to be charged therewith under this Act were duly prepared and submitted to the appellants and approved by them by resolution dated the 25th day of February, 1926;

(d) That the said resolution of the 25th day of February, 1926, was duly published in the manner prescribed by the said Act and that copies thereof were duly served upon the owners, including the respondents, of the premises shown as liable to be charged in the provisional apportionment and that during one month from the date of the first publication thereof the approved specification, plans, estimates, and provisional apportionments were kept deposited at the Council House in the said city and open to inspection at all reasonable times;

(e) That objections had been lodged by all the respondents in accordance with this Act on the ground that the proposed work was unnecessary;

(f) That the lowest estimated cost of putting the said street into such a state of repair as would enable the appellants to adopt the street thereafter was £5,441, which was apportioned among the 18 owners of the land fronting adjoining or abutting on the said street;

(g) That such apportionment, made according to frontage, varied as between the said owners from the sum of £2,709 9s. 3d. in respect of the land owned by the Mother-General of the Convent, the back of which adjoined the said street, to £97 11s. 4d. in respect of the owner of one of the houses fronting the street;

(h) That the land fronting on and adjoining the said street consisted of certain fields belonging to a convent, 13 houses and gardens, some allotment land, and an ornamental garden;

(i) That the said street was in a very bad state of repair and not fit for the use to which it was subjected.

3.—On behalf of the respondents it was contended :—

(a) That the proposed works were unnecessary as the said street was mainly used by the owners of the houses which fronted the street and tradesmen supplying the said houses ;

(b) That the rural nature of the said street would be destroyed if the proposed works were carried out according to the specification ;

(c) That the estimate of expenditure was excessive in order to put the said street into such a good state of repair as would meet the requirements to which the street was put ;

(d) That such expenditure would impose a very great hardship upon the owners of the land to be charged therewith ;

(e) That the respondents did not want the said street taken over or adopted by the appellants and they, the respondents, were prepared to maintain the street in good repair themselves ;

(f) And it was further contended on behalf of the Mother-General of the Convent of the Sisters of Charity of St. Paul that the said street was not and would not be used by the convent or the occupiers thereof as the only part of the convent property which fronted on to the said street consisted of certain fields, and the buildings and entrance to the said convent fronted on to another street at a considerable distance from the said Greenland-road.

4.—The stipendiary magistrate found as a fact that the said street was in a bad state of repair and that some street works were necessary but he was of opinion that the estimated expenses were excessive in order to put the said street into a state of repair sufficient to meet the ordinary requirements of such street and imposed too heavy a burden upon the respective owners of the land fronting and adjoining the said street. He therefore reduced the estimate and made an order upon the Mother-General of the Convent to pay half the sum mentioned in the provisional apportionment against her and upon the other owners two-thirds of the sums mentioned against their respective names in the said provisional apportionment.

5.—The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether or not, upon the above statement of facts, the stipendiary magistrate came to a correct decision upon the law.

Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. A. P. Marshall appeared for the appellants ; Mr. D. L. Finnemore for the respondent, the Mother-General of the Convent.

The Lord Chief Justice.—It is quite clear that this case must be remitted to the learned stipendiary magistrate for further consideration. Upon the objection taken that the proposed work was unnecessary and in the absence of a resolution by the Corporation to the effect that in settling the apportionment regard should be had to considerations of benefit or work already done, he has revised the apportionment of expense with reference to the benefit and what he conceives to be the suitable burden of the different frontagers ; he has reduced the estimate and made an order upon the Mother-General of the Convent to pay half the sum mentioned in the provisional apportionment against her name, and upon the other owners to pay two-thirds of the amounts mentioned against their respective names in the said provisional apportionment.

Now, whatever else may permit some discussion, one thing is clear, that, in the absence of the appropriate resolution on the part of the Corporation, that mode of apportionment was not open. In the absence of the resolution of the Corporation to a contrary effect, the provisions of the Statute in section 46, subsection (1), are imperative—namely : "The expenses incurred by the Corporation in executing private street works shall be apportioned . . . among the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such street or part" ; and unless there is a resolution to the contrary the apportionment of expenses (section 50, subsection (1)) is to be according to the frontage of the respective premises.

So far, therefore, as the task of apportionment, if it arises, is concerned, the ratio which is to be applied is clear. For the rest, the objection here was, and the only objection, that the proposed work was unnecessary. We are told from the Bar that no evidence at all was offered to the learned stipendiary for the purpose of showing in what sense or in what particular respects the proposed work was unnecessary. The case finds as a fact that the street was in a very bad state of repair and not fit for the use to which it was subjected. When one looks at other expressions there is at any rate a verbal contrast—it is impossible to say whether it is intended to be a real contrast—between a state of repair sufficient to meet the ordinary requirements of the street on the one hand, and on the other hand a state of repair which would enable the appellants to adopt the street thereafter. One does not know, but it is of course open to the learned stipendiary upon evidence to find that the proposed works were in this, that, or the other respect unnecessary ; and it is of course open to him to quash the resolution as a whole or to amend it ; and upon evidence he may quash or may amend the plans, sections, estimates and (subject always to the fundamental rule about frontage) the provisional apportionments.

It seems clear, therefore, that the case ought to go back to the learned magistrate in order that, bearing in mind that the measure of apportionment is fixed by the statute, he may address his mind again to the question whether, and, if so, to what extent and in what respect, these works are unnecessary ; and that of course is a problem to be decided, not by inspiration but upon evidence.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I agree.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I agree.

BELL AND ANOTHER v. HARKER.*

Insurance (Industrial) — Transfer — Holder of several policies in both old and new societies—Transfer of one policy only — Industrial Assurance Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 8), ss. 26 (1), 39.

The provisions of s. 26 (1) of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, with reference to the transfer of members of, or persons assured with, a collecting society or an industrial assurance society, apply whether the transaction involves transfer of the whole membership or interest of the assured, or of only one policy out of several, and whether the transferee is or is not already a member of, or a person assured with, the new society.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Pearl Life Assurance Company, Limited v. Scottish Legal Life Assurance Society, Limited (17 The Times L.R., 238 ; [1901] 1 K.B., 528) and Salvation Army Life Assurance Society, Limited v. British Legal Life Assurance Company, Limited (45 Sc.L.R., 843) applied.

This was a case stated by Stockport justices.

At a Court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Stockport an information was preferred by Harold Parkinson Harker (hereinafter called "the respondent") under the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, against Ethelbert Bell and T. Heaword (hereinafter called "the appellants"), for that they were guilty of an offence under section 39 of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, in that they were unlawfully concerned in the transfer of Annie Parkinson, a member of the British Empire Collecting Society, a collecting society carrying on industrial assurance business, so that she became assured with the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society, Limited, an industrial assurance company, without the written consent of the said Annie Parkinson in the form prescribed by section 26 of the said Act and the regulations made thereunder. The following were the particulars :—Mrs. Annie Parkinson lived at 19, Stanhope-street, Stockport. The policies concerned in the charge were policies in the British Empire Collecting Society and the Royal London Mutual Insurance Company, Limited, respectively, assuring the life of John Parkinson for a premium of 3d. a week.

The information was heard on March 15, 1927, and the justices convicted the appellants and fined each of them 10s. and ordered them to pay the witnesses' expenses and £5 5s. special costs.

Upon the hearing of the said information one witness only was called—namely, Annie Parkinson, the wife of Christopher Parkinson, of 19, Stanhope-street, Stockport, who attended on Crown Office subpœna. The documents produced or referred to at the hearing were admitted by the appellants' solicitor without formal proof and were annexed to the case. The following facts were proved or admitted :—

(1) Before and on April 26, 1926, Annie Parkinson held policies in the British Empire Collecting Society, including a policy No. 15818 on the life of her son John, in respect of which the sum of £9 9s. was payable on her said son's attaining the age of 16 years, the premium being 3d. per week. The said policy was taken out on April 29, 1918. The premiums on the said policy were collected by Mrs. Bell, the wife of the appellant Ethelbert Bell, who had not himself collected any premiums.

(2) The last premium paid in respect of the said policy was paid on April 19, 1926. Some weeks elapsed before the said Annie Parkinson received from the British Empire Collecting Society a lapse notice. The said policy lapsed on June 10, 1926, on 28 days' notice.

(3) The said Annie Parkinson stopped paying the premiums on the British Empire Collecting Society's policies because she was dissatisfied with them through having seen a report derogatory of the British Empire Collecting Society in a newspaper.

(4) On February 22, 1915, the said Annie Parkinson had taken out a policy on the life of her said son John in the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society, Limited, which was in force on April 26, 1926.

(5) The said Annie Parkinson on August 11, 1913, had taken out two other policies in the same company on the lives of herself and of a William Bywater respectively, which, with a large number of other policies subsequently taken out by her in the same company, were on April 26, 1926, in force.

(6) The appellant Ethelbert Bell called on the said Annie Parkinson shortly before April 26, 1926, and asked her if she would give him some new business as he was taking a book of the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society, Limited, and he asked if he might bring the superintendent of that company to talk the matter over with her husband.

(7) On April 26, 1926, both the appellants called, and the appellant Heaword told the said Annie Parkinson that the policies in the British Empire Collecting Society could not be transferred. Of this Annie Parkinson said that she was aware, and she said that she had decided to give him new business. The said Annie Parkinson thereupon signed a proposal form assuring her son John in the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society, Limited. She also signed a number of other proposal forms of the same company. The proposal form for assuring her son John in the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society, Limited, was filled up by one or other of the appellants, the particulars being supplied by the said Annie Parkinson. The policy assuring her son John in the British Empire Collecting Society was not then produced and was not at any time handed to the appellants or to either of them. The said Annie Parkinson could not say why no answer was given to question 14 in the proposal forms, which was as follows :—"Do you, or does any other person to your knowledge, hold a policy on this life issued by any other office ? If so, give particulars hereunder. If none, state 'Nil.'" The said Annie Parkinson did not pay the premiums on the new policies in the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society, Limited, on that day, but she did so later in the same week.

(8) The new policy was for the sum of £6 15s., payable at the expiration of 10 years if her said son John should then be living. The premium was 3d. per week.

(9) The said Annie Parkinson could not remember whether she signed any other proposal forms, nor could she say whether she signed a form similar to the form then shown to her. The form then shown to the said Annie Parkinson was a print of the Industrial Assurance (Individual Transfer) Regulations, 1923, dated December 11, 1923 (No. 1495 of 1923 Statutory Rules and Orders), containing the prescribed form of consent under section 26 of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923.

A preliminary objection was taken by the appellants' solicitor that under section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, the information should have been laid within six calendar months from the time when the matter of complaint arose—namely, within six months after April 26, 1926, and that subsection (5) of section 39 of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, under which proceedings for offences under that Act could be commenced at any time within a year applied only to collecting societies and not to industrial insurance companies. The justices in overruling the objection ordered a note thereof to be made.

The appellants' solicitor submitted that there was no case to answer, and he did not call any evidence. He contended :—

(a) That section 26 (1) of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, under which the information was laid had no application to the present case, inasmuch as Annie Parkinson and her son John were at the date of the alleged offence and had for many years prior thereto, and prior to the issue of the policy in the British Empire Collecting Society, been members of and insured with the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society, Limited, with which the new policy was effected, and that there was no transfer of a member of the British Empire Collecting Society, and the policy therein lapsed in consequence of the said Annie Parkinson's ceasing to pay the premiums payable in respect thereof. The appellants' solicitor further contended that there was no transfer of agency, the appellant Bell not having been proved to have collected any premiums from the said Annie Parkinson in respect of the policy issued by the British Empire Collecting Society on the life of her son John on April 29, 1918.

(b) That section 26 (1) of the Act did not apply to the transfer of a policy only, and in any event there was no evidence of such transfer.

The respondent's solicitor referred to Pearl Life Assurance Company, Limited v. Scottish Legal Life Assurance Society, Limited (17 The Times L.R., 238 ; [1901] 1 K.B., 528), and contended that the decision in that case disposed of the appellants' contention, and that there was a transfer of a person assured with one company to another company within the meaning of the section.

The justices, being of opinion that there had been a transfer of a person assured with one company to another company without the written consent of the assured and that the appellants were officers of the company to which the assured person had been transferred and were concerned in such transfer, convicted the appellants and fined each of them 10s., and ordered them to pay the witnesses' expenses and £5 5s. special costs.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether, upon the above statement of facts, the justices came to a correct determination and decision in point of law.

Mr. J. B. Matthews, K.C., and Mr. A. F. Engelbach appeared for the appellants ; Mr. H. M. Giveen for the respondent.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a case stated by justices for the county borough of Stockport. The question arises out of an information preferred by the present respondent against the present appellants under the Industrial Assurance Act of 1923. The complaint was that the appellants were guilty of an offence under section 39 of that statute in that they were unlawfully concerned in the transfer of Annie Parkinson, a member of the British Empire Collecting Society, a collecting society carrying on industrial assurance business, so that she became assured with the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society, Limited, an industrial insurance company, without the written consent of the said Annie Parkinson in the form prescribed by section 26 of the Act and the regulations made under it. In the result the justices convicted the appellants and imposed a small fine upon each of them, and ordered them to pay certain expenses and special costs. It is against that conviction that the appellants now appeal by a case stated, and the question for this Court is whether upon the facts the justices came to a correct determination and decision in point of law.

It is not necessary, I think, to repeat all the facts, which are carefully set out in this well-stated case ; it is enough to refer to some of them. One witness only was called, Mrs. Annie Parkinson herself, and she attended upon a Crown Office subpœna, and with the help of documents her evidence proved the following facts :—Before April 26, 1926—the importance of that date, as afterwards appears, being that a certain interview then took place—Annie Parkinson held policies (in the plural) in the British Empire Collecting Society, including a particular policy numbered 15,818, on the life of her son John, and that policy was for a sum of nine guineas, which was to be payable when the son attained the age of 16 years. The premium was 3d. a week. The policy had been taken out on April 29, 1918, and the premiums on that policy were collected by Mrs. Bell, the wife of the present appellant, Mr. Ethelbert Bell. Mrs. Parkinson paid the premium in respect of that policy for the last time on April 19, 1926. Some time after April 26, 1926, she received from the British Empire Collecting Society what is called a lapse notice. The effect of that notice was that the policy was to lapse on 28 days' notice, and it in fact lapsed on June 10, 1926. Mrs. Parkinson ceased to pay the premiums on the British Empire Collecting Society's policies because, as the case says, she was dissatisfied with those policies in consequence of something that she had read in a newspaper. But long previously, and in fact in the year 1915 the same Mrs. Parkinson had taken out a policy on the life of her son John in another insurance society, the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society, and that policy also was in force on April 26, 1926. More than that, in the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society Mrs. Parkinson had years before taken out two other policies on the lives of herself and one William Bywater, and indeed there was also a considerable number of other policies in the Royal Mutual Insurance Society which were in force on April 26, 1926, and had been taken out by Mrs. Parkinson. The effect, therefore, was that upon this important date Mrs. Parkinson had some policies in the British Empire Collecting Society, and some policies in the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society, and in the one society, as in the other, in the case of certain policies the person assured was her son John.

Before April 26, 1926, there had been a conversation between the appellant Bell and Mrs. Parkinson, and Bell had asked her for some new business as he was taking a book of the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society, and he asked if he might bring the superintendent of that society to talk the matter over with her husband. Accordingly on April 26, 1926, both the appellants called, that is to say, Bell himself and a man named Heaword. Heaword told Mrs. Parkinson that the policies in the British Empire Collecting Society could not be transferred, and Mrs. Parkinson said that she was aware of that, but added that she had decided to give him new business. Thereupon she signed a proposal form assuring the same boy, John, in the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society, Limited. She signed also a number of other proposal forms in the same company. The policy whereby her son John was assured in the British Empire Collecting Society was not then produced, nor was it at any time handed to the appellants or either of them. Mrs. Parkinson did not find herself able to answer the question why there was no answer in the proposal form to this question : "Do you, or does any other person to your knowledge, hold a policy on this life issued by any other office ? If so, give particulars hereunder. If none, state 'Nil.'" There was no answer to that question. Mrs. Parkinson did not pay the premiums upon the new policies in the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society on April 26, 1926, but she did pay them later in the same week. The new policy, so far as her son John was concerned, was for a sum of £6 15s. payable at the expiration of ten years if her son was then living, and the premium was 3d. a week.

Those being the material facts, the justices had to decide whether it was proved that an offence had been committed, and that task was the quite usual task of ascertaining the real and true nature of the transaction as distinguished perhaps from its superficial form. What is the offence which is referred to? By section 39, subsection 3, of the Act of 1923, it is provided: "If any collector of a collecting society or industrial assurance company, or any other person, contravenes or fails to comply with any of the provisions of this Act affecting such collector or other person, he shall be guilty of an offence under this Act and liable on summary conviction," to a certain penalty. The section under which the offence here was said to have been committed is section 26, and that section is concerned with what are called transfers from one society or company to another. Subsection 1 provides as follows:—"A member of or person assured with a collecting society or industrial assurance company shall not," except in cases which for the present purposes are not material, "be transferred from the society or company in which he was so assured so as to become or be made a member of or be assured with any other such society or company without his written consent, or, in the case of an infant, without the like consent of his parent or other guardian, and any society or company and any collector or other officer of any society or company concerned in such a transfer shall, if the provisions of this section are not complied with, be deemed to have contravened the provisions of this Act." That first subsection having made obligatory a consent in writing, the second subsection proceeds to deal with that consent. That consent is to be in the prescribed form; it is to have annexed to it a document in the prescribed form to be furnished by the society or company to which the transfer is to be made, setting out the terms of and rights under the existing policy, and the terms of and rights under the policy to which the assured will become entitled on transfer, and the consideration, if any, which has been or is to be paid for the transfer, and the person to whom such consideration has been or will be paid. Then subsection 3 goes on to provide: "The society or company to which the assured is sought to be transferred shall furnish to the person by whom such consent as aforesaid is signed a copy of such consent and of the document annexed thereto, and shall, within seven days from the date when such consent is signed, give to the society or company from which the assured is sought to be transferred notice of the proposed transfer containing full particulars of the name and address of the assured and the number of his policy, together with such consent as aforesaid, and the document annexed thereto, and then follow consequential provisions in subsection 4. This section, therefore, is obviously dealing with insurance companies or collecting societies of this particular kind, and it is dealing with what it calls transfers from one society or company to another. It is to be observed that the section begins by drawing a distinction between two sets of cases. The transfer may be a transfer of a member of one society to another society, but it may be a transfer of a person assured with one society to another society, or, in other words, it may be a partial transfer or it may be a complete transfer. It may be a change of membership or it may be the substitution, in effect, of one policy for another, and where such transfers or substitutions or changes are to be made the Act provides that they shall be made subject only to certain exceedingly strict conditions.

The reason for such legislation is quite obvious. Several of the various reasons for it were referred to in the Scotch case of Salvation Army Life Assurance Society, Limited v. British Legal Life Assurance Company, Limited (45 Sc.L.R., 843). In that case, at page 846, Lord Stormonth Darling referred to at least three mischiefs which the similar Act of that time had in view, and at page 847 Lord Low said:—"I imagine that the main object of that enactment is to protect persons insured against the solicitations of collecting agents of such societies or companies. I suppose that such agents are paid by results, and that therefore the interest of each agent is to obtain as much business as possible for the society or company which he represents." The Lord Justice-Clerk, in his judgment, at page 848, referred specifically to another obvious mischief. He said that one evil against which the small insurer in industrial insurance organizations had to be protected was that the companies, or societies, had to be restrained from cutting off the insured from the benefit of the insurance, and so holding past premiums, while getting rid of their obligation.

In this case in the Court below two points were taken. It was urged, first of all, that section 26, subsection 1, of the Act of 1923 did not apply, for the reason that Annie Parkinson and her son John were, on April 26, 1926, and had for some time, been members of, and insured with, the new society, the Royal London Mutual Insurance Society, and that, therefore, there was no transfer. Secondly, it was urged that the section did not apply to the transfer of a policy only, as distinguished from the transfer of a member. Those were the arguments, and the only arguments, adduced below. It has been attempted, in accordance with the common practice, to raise another point in this Court—namely, the point that in the information Mrs. Parkinson is spoken of as a member of the British Empire Collecting Society, whereas in fact she was not a member, but the case finds again and again that she was a member and held policies in the society; and no such point is open to the appellants on this case as it is stated.

With regard to the two contentions that were raised in the Court below it seems to me that they are clearly disposed of by the combined effect of two cases which have already been decided. One is the case of Pearl Life Assurance Company, Limited v. Scottish Legal Life Assurance Society, Limited (17 The Times L.R., 238; [1901] 1 K.B., 528), where, upon facts not quite the same as these, but to some extent the same, Mr. Justice Wills said, at page 530:—"The Act of Parliament is not very artificially drawn. Probably the language used is understood by the class of persons who are most concerned with dealings under the Act; but, however this may be, it is clear that the language used in the Act is popular rather than artificial. One knows that frauds are frequently perpetrated in transactions of this kind, and section 4"—that is to say, section 4 of the corresponding Act of the year 1896—"is intended to check the proceedings of the people who carry out these frauds. The first check is imposed by subsection 1: in order that there may be evidence of a transfer, the written consent of the person to be transferred is required." Mr. Justice Phillimore, in giving judgment to the same effect, said that the clause was strange, and strangely worded. But in that case it was argued, and it was argued with success, that notwithstanding that the old policy overlapped the new one so that the two policies were, for a brief period, co-existent, nevertheless that which had taken place was a transfer.

That case was followed, and, indeed, supplemented by, the Scottish case already referred to where, as in the present case, the member had, if I may use the expression, his foot in both camps. There were insurances in both societies. In that case Lord Stormonth Darling used these words at page 847 :—"It is always desirable that in the construction of an Imperial statute the Courts of the two countries should speak with the same voice, though a Scottish Court may not, strictly speaking, be bound by the decision of an English one. Now, the only case in which this statute has been construed in England is that of Pearl Life Assurance Company, Limited v. Scottish Legal Life Assurance Society, Limited (supra). There an Alderman of the City of London had held that there was no transfer, or seeking to transfer, where two insurances had been shown to co-exist. But a Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Phillimore, reversed his decision, holding that there was a seeking to transfer in the sense of the Act." Also in the Scottish case, as Lord Stormonth Darling pointed out, there was a co-existence for a short time of two insurances substantially securing the same benefits in return for the same contributions, although the persons concerned in the transactions may not have known or intended it.

It seems to me that the effect of these two cases is to cover the present case. Indeed, apart altogether from any such decision, when one looks at the words of this Act—whether they be truly described as "strange" or as "popular"—bearing in mind the notorious mischiefs which this Act was intended to meet, I think that the distinction which is drawn at the outset between a member on the one hand, and a person assured with one of these insurance societies on the other hand, makes it plain that the transfer is complete, whether it be a transfer of a member as such, or whether it be a transfer of a particular policy, and it matters not that before the transaction has taken place the member is a member of both the societies in question, or has policies in both the societies in question. What is being dealt with is the individual transaction, whether it affects the member as a whole, or whether it is limited to a particular policy. The Act provides that the individual transaction, whether it be called a transfer, or a substitution, or a change, shall be carried out in so formal a manner, subject to necessary notices, as to prevent the kind of evil which that Act was brought into existence to meet. I cannot see any reason whatever for the contention that the mischief does not arise, and that the Act does not apply, where that which is transferred is not the whole, but a part of the whole, not all the policies, but some of them, or one of them, not the member qua member, but the policy qua policy. If that were the true interpretation of this statute it seems to me that it would easily be rendered nugatory. Indeed, the argument had to go to the length of saying that the Act would not apply if a person having 27 policies transferred only 26, retaining the 27th so as not to cease to be a member of the old society. That, with great respect to the argument, seems to me to be ludicrous, and I cannot find any support in the vocabulary of this statute for the view that that is what the Legislature intended. I therefore think that this appeal fails, and ought to be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I am of the same opinion. For the purpose of my judgment I assume that Mrs. Parkinson was a member of, and a person assured with, the British Empire Collecting Society. Then the only question which really remains is whether there was a transfer within the meaning of section 26 of the Industrial Assurance Act of 1923, or whether there was evidence upon which the justices could find that there was a transfer. Having regard to the two authorities to which my Lord has referred I have come to the conclusion that there was evidence upon which the justices could find that the circumstances of this case constituted a transfer within the meaning of that section. Therefore I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I agree.

County Court—Appeal—Review of taxation—Claim less than £20—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict., c. 43), s. 120.

There is no appeal without leave from a county court Judge's refusal to review a taxation of costs where the amount claimed is less than £20.

This was a motion to strike out an appeal from a county court. The plaintiff was a solicitor and recovered judgment in the county court on a bill of costs for less than £20. The Judge ordered the bill to be taxed, and refused leave to appeal. The bill was taxed at an amount less than £20, and the defendant asked for a review of taxation. This was refused by the Judge, who again refused leave to appeal. The defendant, notwithstanding the Judge's refusal of leave, entered an appeal to the Divisional Court.

Mr. E. G. Woodward appeared for the plaintiff; the defendant appeared in person.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a motion to strike out an appeal, upon the ground that no appeal lies. The purpose of the appeal is to obtain a review of taxation of certain items in a bill of costs, the total of which was considerably below £20. The contention of Mr. Dawson was that taxation stood on a peculiar footing. Mr. Dawson has argued with no little ability, but I am satisfied that his contention cannot be sustained. Section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888, is as follows : "If any party in any action or matter shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the Judge in point of law or equity, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved by the judgment, direction, decision or order of the Judge may appeal from the same to the High Court in such manner and subject to such conditions as may be for the time being provided by the rules of the Supreme Court regulating the procedure on appeals from inferior courts to the High Court : Provided always that there shall be no appeal in any action of contract or tort, other than an action of ejectment or an action in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditament shall have come in question, where the debt or damage claimed does not exceed twenty pounds . . . unless the Judge shall think it reasonable and proper that such appeal should be allowed, and shall grant leave to appeal. . . ."

Here the action was an action of contract and the money claimed was a sum less than £20. There was at one time a doubt whether an appeal lay in an interlocutory matter. Where the sum claimed exceeds £20, any such doubt has long been laid to rest by such cases as Ward v. Sneiman (41 The Times L.R., 598); Wilson v. Statham (7 The Times L.R., 450; [1891] 2 Q.B., 261); and Gilson and Sons v. Kilner (69 L.T., 310). But it was suggested by Mr. Dawson that in the particular kind of interlocutory matter consisting of taxation there is an appeal without leave no matter what the amount claimed. For that proposition there is no authority whatsoever. The authorities show that if the amount is sufficient or if leave is given there is an appeal notwithstanding that the matter is interlocutory: they do not show that there is an appeal in case of a review of taxation where the amount is insufficient and where leave is refused. The motion, therefore, succeeds and the appeal will be struck out.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I agree, and I have nothing to add.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—I agree. The section refers to "any action or matter," and therefore applies to any interlocutory matter in an action of contract.

Education — School — Attendance — Withdrawal of child for one hour weekly—Music lesson—"Under efficient instruction in some other manner"—Education Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict., c. 75), s. 74—Education Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 51), s. 49—Surrey County Council By-laws, No. 2.

By by-law No. 2 of the by-laws made by the Education Committee of the Surrey County Council under s. 74 of the Education Act, 1870, as amended by the Education Acts, 1876 to 1902 (which is now replaced by sec. 49 of the Education Act, 1921), "The parent of every child of not less than five nor more than 14 years of age shall cause such child to attend school, unless there be a reasonable excuse for non-attendance. Any of the following reasons shall be a reasonable excuse, namely: (a) that the child is under efficient instruction in some other manner. . . ."

Held, that these words mean that the child is receiving the whole of its instruction in some other manner, and do not entitle a parent to withdraw a child for one hour a week for the purpose of attending private lessons in a subject not approved by the Board of Education for elementary schools.

This was a case stated by Surrey Justices.

1. The respondent was summoned to answer an information and complaint preferred by the appellant that on March 24, 1927, he, being the parent of a certain child called Hilda Martin, then residing with him at Merle Common, Oxted, in the Petty Sessional Division of Godstone, being not less than five nor more than 14 years of age, did unlawfully omit and neglect to cause the said child to attend school as required by the by-laws of the Surrey County Council made and confirmed in pursuance of the Education Acts, 1870 to 1921, there being no reasonable excuse for such non-attendance.

2. On April 4, 1927, the justices dismissed the information.

3. The following facts were proved or admitted:—

(a) The appellant was an officer of the School Attendance Sub-committee, for the Petty Sessional Division of Godstone, of the Surrey Education Committee. The respondent was the parent of the said Hilda Martin (hereinafter referred to as "the child"), who lived with him at The Forge, Merle Common, Oxted, Surrey, and was at the material date 12 years of age, having been born on Nov. 28, 1914.

(b) On September 22, 1903, the said Surrey Education Committee made by-laws under sec. 74 of the Education Act, 1870, as amended by the Education Acts, 1876 to 1902, for an area including (inter alia) the Petty Sessional Division of Godstone. The said by-laws were sanctioned by the Board of Education on December 8, 1903.

No. 2 of the said by-laws was as follows: "The parent of every child of not less than five nor more than 14 years of age shall cause such child to attend school unless there be a reasonable excuse for non-attendance. Any of the following reasons shall be a reasonable excuse—namely: (a) that the child is under efficient instruction in some other manner. . ."

No. 3 was: "The time during which every child shall attend school shall be the whole time for which the school selected shall be open for the instruction of children of similar age."

(c) The child was a scholar at the Merle Common Council School, Oxted, and was in the sixth standard.

(d) On March 24, 1927, the head teacher issued a certificate to the effect that the child attended school 170 times from October 11, 1926, to March 24, 1927, the school having been open for the instruction of children 185 times during that period, and that she was absent on Thursday, March 24, 1927.

(e) The morning session at the school began at 9 a.m. and ended at 12 noon, and on Thursday mornings the time-table was as follows: 9.0 to 9.40, Scripture; 9.40 to 10.25, arithmetic; 10.25 to 10.45, physical training; 10.45 to 10.55, recreation; 10.55 to 11.30, English; 11.30 to 12, class singing.

(f) On March 24, 1927, the child attended at 9 a.m., but was withdrawn by the respondent at 11 a.m.

(g) The register was called over at about 10 a.m., the child being marked as "present," but upon her withdrawal the mark was cancelled as required by Regulation 9 of the Education Code, 1926, made by the Board of Education. Regulation 21 of the said Code provided that the attendance of a child must comprise at least two hours' secular instruction.

(h) The child was withdrawn by the respondent on the said date for the purpose of receiving a pianoforte lesson from one Lashmar, a private teacher of music who resided at Lingfield, about five miles from Merle Common.

(i) The respondent habitually withdrew the child from school at 11 a.m. on Thursdays for the said purpose.

(j) The child showed a special aptitude for music, and if her progress was satisfactory it was the intention of the respondent to educate her for the musical profession.

(k) Merle Common was an outlying district, and the respondent had endeavoured but had not been able to find a local qualified music teacher to give pianoforte lessons out of school hours.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(l) The said Lashmar visited the Merle Common district on Thursday in each week, and such visits afforded the only opportunity for the child to receive instruction in pianoforte playing.

(m) Both English and class singing were subjects approved by the Board of Education as subjects of elementary education, but pianoforte playing was not a subject so approved.

4. On behalf of the appellant it was contended :—

(a) That having regard to the Code referred to in paragraph 3 (g) above, the alteration in the marking of the register upon the withdrawal of the child was rightly and lawfully made.

(b) That the certificate of the head teacher referred to in paragraph 3 (d) was conclusive evidence that the child was absent from school in the morning on March 24, 1927.

(c) That instruction in pianoforte playing was not "efficient instruction in some other manner" within the meaning of by-law 2(a).

(d) That inasmuch as the child did not attend school during the whole of the time for which the school was open for the instruction of children of similar age, as required by by-law 3 of the said by-laws, the offence charged had been committed.

5. The respondent contended that, having regard to the facts set forth in paragraph 3 above, and especially in sub-paragraphs (c), (d), (h), (i), (j), (k), and (l) of the said paragraph, it was more advantageous for the child to miss one hour's instruction in school to take a lesson in pianoforte playing at home, and that during the period of her absence she was "under efficient instruction in some other manner" within the meaning of by-law 2 (a).

6. The justices were of opinion that each of the contentions on behalf of the appellant failed, and accordingly dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether the justices' determination was right in point of law, and if not, what should be done in the premises.

Mr. S. G. Turner appeared for the appellant; the respondent was not represented. Mr. Robert Fortune appeared for the justices, but as he had no locus standi except as amicus curiæ, the Court did not call upon him to argue.

The Lord Chief Justice.—I think this is a very clear case. The words "under efficient instruction in some other manner" mean that the whole instruction of the child is being given in some other manner. It was never meant that a child attending the school might be withdrawn for this or that hour to attend a lesson thought by the parent to be more useful or possibly in the long run more remunerative. The time-table and discipline of a school could be reduced to chaos if that were permissible. In my opinion the justices misdirected themselves. They evidently decided as they did because they thought it a good thing that this child should have music lessons, but upon the facts of this case there was no evidence upon which they could decide that she was under efficient instruction in some other manner.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I agree, and will only add that I think "efficient instruction in some other manner" means efficient instruction in the subjects of the curriculum approved for elementary schools.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I agree. A parent is not obliged to avail himself of the free education provided by the State, if he prefers to provide privately for his child's education; but if he does avail himself of it, he must take it as a whole.

GREYHOUND MOTORS, LIMITED v. LAMBERT.*

Metropolis—Stage carriage—"Plying for hire"—Motor omnibus—Seats available only to ticket-holders—Tickets bought at least ten minutes before arrival of omnibus at booking office—Passengers picked up at several booking offices—Antecedent contract—Metropolitan Public Carriages Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vict., c. 115), s. 7—London Cab and Stage Carriage Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII., c. 55).

A motor omnibus belonging to the appellants, which was not licensed to ply for hire within the Metropolitan Police district, picked up at three points within that district passengers who had taken tickets for seats for journeys to destinations outside the district. These tickets were obtained by the passengers at the several offices of the appellants at least ten minutes before the arrival of the omnibus there.

Held, that, as the passengers did not necessarily enter into their contracts of carriage before the vehicle started on its journey, but in some cases did so when it had been travelling for some time, the vehicle was plying for hire within the Metropolitan police district.

Sales v. Lake (38 The Times L.R., 336; [1922] 1 K.B., 553) distinguished.

This was a case stated by Mr. Kenneth Marshall, the magistrate at West London Police Court, which raised the question what constituted plying for hire in the Metropolitan Police district by a motor omnibus which picked up passengers inside that district for destinations outside it on the road to Bristol.

At a Court of summary jurisdiction sitting at West London Police Court an information was laid by the respondent, a sergeant of the Metropolitan Police, against the appellants, a firm of motor omnibus owners, alleging that on May 26, 1927, they were the owners of a stage carriage, to wit a motor omnibus, which was found plying for hire between Hammersmith-road and Cranford Bridge, within the Metropolitan Police district, such carriage not being licensed to ply for hire within the limits of the district, contrary to section 7 of the Metropolitan Public Carriages Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vict., c. 115), the London Cab and Stage Carriage Act, 1907, and the Secretary of State's Order dated October 9, 1924 (1924, St. R. and O., No. 1149), as amended by the Order dated April 6, 1926; (1926, St. R. and O., No. 395).

* Reported by G. F. L. Bridgman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the hearing of the information on July 8, 1927, the following facts were proved or admitted :—

(a) The appellants were the owners of a large number of motor coaches which carried passengers between London and Bristol.

(b) The appellants maintained branch offices at 229, Hammersmith-road, at the Clarendon Restaurant, Hammersmith, and at Hounslow, all being within the Metropolitan Police district.

(c) On May 26, 1927, there was exhibited in the window of the office at 229, Hammersmith-road a poster in which notice was given that London passengers must have tickets ten minutes before the omnibus arrived at the booking office.

(d) At 8.30 a.m. on May 26, 1927, Police-Sergeant Lockyer obtained at the office at 229, Hammersmith-road a ticket entitling him to travel to Slough, a place outside the Metropolitan Police district, for which he paid 1s. 9d.

(e) At the time when Police-Sergeant Lockyer obtained the ticket there was no motor-coach present belonging to the appellants.

(f) At 8.54 a.m. on the same day a motor-coach belonging to the appellants drew up outside the office, was boarded by Police-Sergeant Lockyer and one other passenger, and drove off.

(g) The motor-coach was driven to the Clarendon Restaurant, where three other passengers boarded it. It started from the Clarendon Restaurant at 8.59 a.m., and was driven to Hounslow, stopping on the way at High-road, Chiswick, and High-street, Brentford, at neither of which places did any other passengers board it.

(h) During the journey from the Clarendon Restaurant to High-road, Chiswick, the conductor of the motor-coach took from Police-Sergeant Lockyer and the other passengers the tickets which had been obtained by them at the office, and gave them in exchange paper tickets.

(i) At 9.10 a.m. on the same day the respondent, Police Sergeant Lambert, and another police officer, Police-Sergeant Bryant, obtained at the appellants' Hounslow office tickets entitling them to travel from Hounslow to Maidenhead, a place outside the Metropolitan Police district, for which they paid 1s. 9d.

(j) At the time when the last-mentioned tickets were obtained the motor-coach had not arrived at Hounslow.

(k) At 9.30 a.m. on the same day the motor-coach, with Police-Sergeant Lockyer and the other four passengers on board, arrived at Hounslow, and was boarded by the respondent and Police-Sergeant Bryant and two other passengers, after which it proceeded on its journey to Slough.

(l) After leaving Hounslow the conductor took from the respondent and the three other passengers the tickets which had been obtained at the Hounslow office and gave them in exchange paper tickets.

(m) At Colnbrook, between Hounslow and Slough, the respondent informed the driver and the conductor that Police-Sergeant Lockyer, Police-Sergeant Bryant, and himself were police officers, and left the motor-coach, which thereupon proceeded on its journey.

(n) The motor-coach was not licensed to ply for hire within the Metropolitan Police district in accordance with the statutes referred to.

The appellants called no evidence, but it was stated on their behalf, and the magistrate accepted the statement, that all their offices were in telephonic communication, and if bookings were insufficient a journey would be cancelled.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that the above facts constituted a plying for hire by the motor-coach within the limits of the Metropolitan Police district.

On the part of the appellants it was contended that, as there had been no soliciting of or waiting for passengers, but an antecedent contract of carriage in each case, there had been no plying for hire within the limits of the district.

The attention of the magistrate was directed to the following decisions :—(1) Foinett v. Clark (41 J.P., 359) ; (2) Armstrong v. Ogle (42 The Times L.R., 553 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 438) ; (3) Sales v. Lake (38 The Times L.R., 336 ; [1922] 1 K.B., 553) ; (4) Leonard v. Western Services, Limited (43 The Times L.R., 131 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 702).

The magistrate was of opinion that there had been solicitation of passengers both before and after the motor-coach left the office, 229, Hammersmith-road, by means of posters, and that there were no real antecedent contracts of carriage in respect of the police officers who bought tickets and boarded the coach soon after on its arrival at the two stopping places mentioned en route for Bristol. He held that there had been a plying for hire within the Metropolitan Police district, and he accordingly convicted the appellants, imposed on them a fine of 5s., and ordered them to pay three guineas costs.

The appellants, being dissatisfied with this determination as being erroneous in point of law, applied to the magistrate to state a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of his determination for the opinion of the Court whether he had come to a correct decision.

Mr. Paley Scott appeared for the appellants ; Mr. H. D. Roome for the respondent.

The Lord Chief Justice said that on the poster exhibited at the appellants' office at 229, Hammersmith-road there was a list of places on the road from Bristol to Hammersmith and a list of places on the road from Hammersmith to Bristol giving the times at which a motor-omnibus belonging to the appellants was expected to arrive and to depart. Certain fares which related to somewhat longer journeys than any within the Metropolitan Police district were specifically stated, but there was added in conspicuous type the information that there were "intermediate fares to all stages between Bristol and London at pro-rata rates." His Lordship continued :—The real contention of the appellants both in this Court and in the Court below was that the present case is covered by Sales v. Lake (38 The Times L.R., 336 ; [1922] 1 K.B., 553), but a comparison between that case and the present shows what so often appears—namely, how exceedingly misleading a phrase may be if its meaning is not examined. The phrase here which seems to have become a catchword is "antecedent contract." Antecedent to what? In Sales v. Lake (supra) the passengers bought their tickets before the time of the departure of the vehicle. Indeed, it was not until after the number of passengers had been ascertained that the respondents in that case hired the vehicle. The magistrate there found expressly that there was no plying for hire because no member of the public could have obtained a seat in the vehicle at any of the places where the passengers were picked up unless he had bought a ticket elsewhere antecedently to the starting of the vehicle. In giving judgment Lord Trevethin, C.J., said (38 The Times L.R., at p. 337 ; [1922] 1 K.B., at p. 558) : "If there had been any empty seats for which the driver was prepared to take in casual passengers, I think he would have been plying for hire, but the magistrate's finding negatives this suggestion."

In my opinion, that case was the very opposite of the present case. Here there are contemplated four different starting points within the Metropolitan Police district. The vehicle starts from 229, Hammersmith-road at 9 a.m. It leaves Brentford at 9.20, Hounslow at 9.30, and Colnbrook at 9.55. What is its true aspect in the eye of the law when it starts from 229, Hammersmith-road ? Non constat that at that moment it has any passengers at all. Obviously it is contemplated that it may start with vacant places all or some of which may be filled at Brentford, Hounslow, or Colnbrook by persons who not only have not reserved accommodation before 9 o'clock, but may not even have made up their minds to take the journey that day until, in the case of those joining the omnibus at Colnbrook, nearly 10 o'clock, when the vehicle has accomplished a part of its journey which occupies something like three-quarters of an hour.

Stress has been laid on the fact that here the passengers had to obtain a ticket from an office and not from anyone on the vehicle. That seems to me to be quite immaterial for the reasons explained in Foinett v. Clark and Another (41 J.P., 359).

Without dwelling further on the facts of the present case and the contrast beween them and those of Sales v. Lake (supra), I think that the magistrate had ample evidence to justify him in coming to the conclusion to which he did, and therefore this appeal must be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I am of the same opinion. The importance of this case from the public point of view is that if vehicles such as this are not licensed they may start on their journeys in quite an unfit condition and may be driven by incompetent persons who have merely obtained a licence to drive on payment of the sum of 5s. That being so, it is obvious that the Court ought not to differ from the magistrate unless the case is governed by Sales v. Lake (38 The Times L.R., 336 ; [1922] 1 K.B., 553).

As my Lord has pointed out, the essential difference between the present case and Sales v. Lake (supra) is to be found in the facts. The vehicle there started for Brighton from Charing Cross, and, although it picked up passengers en route at Grosvenor-gardens, Vauxhall Bridge-road, and other places, no passenger was accepted at any stopping place except those who had obtained tickets before the vehicle started from Charing Cross. In other words, the passengers who were picked up had made contracts to be carried for the journey before the vehicle started from Charing Cross. In fact they made these contracts before the vehicle was hired. The magistrate expressly held that there was no plying for hire at Grosvenor-gardens because no member of the public could have obtained a seat in the vehicle at that stopping-place unless he had previously bought a ticket elsewhere. The judgment of Lord Trevethin is based on the same ground. He said (38 The Times L.R., at p. 337 ; [1922] 1 K.B., at p. 558) : "The information in the present case charged that the driver was plying for hire while he was in Grosvenor-gardens. The learned magistrate has, however, found that when the carriage was in Grosvenor-gardens no member of the public could have obtained a seat in the vehicle for that journey who had not previously booked his ticket elsewhere. That is to say, the process of soliciting was then over and the driver was merely receiving passengers who had already booked their seats. On this ground alone, in my judgment, the magistrate was right in refusing to convict."

That being the distinction between the present case and Sales v. Lake (supra), I have no hesitation in saying that we cannot differ from the finding of the magistrate, and that therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—I am of the same opinion. The vehicle in question in this case carried passengers between Bristol and London and London and Bristol, following an ascertained route and travelling by fixed stages, which were notified to the public by posters and by the tickets supplied to passengers. The starting-point in London was the appellants' office at 229, Hammersmith-road. The journey to Brentford occupied 20 minutes and that to Hounslow 30 minutes. If when the vehicle started from Hammersmith-road there were any vacant seats—and there might or might not be—any member of the public who had come to the stopping-places at Brentford or Hounslow could obtain a ticket to travel any of the stages towards Bristol provided that he got it ten minutes before the arrival of the vehicle to take him up.

On these facts the case seems to me plainly to fall within the two conditions which must exist to constitute plying for hire, and which were applied by Lord Trevethin, C.J., in Sales v. Lake (38 The Times L.R., at p. 337 ; [1922] 1 K.B., at p. 557), when he said : "There must be a soliciting or waiting to secure passengers by the driver or other person in control without any previous contract with them." The soliciting here would be partly by the posters and partly by the fact that this vehicle was seen and known to pass along the route every day at fixed times. Lord Trevethin goes on to say that the test is that "the owner or person in control who is engaged in or authorizes the soliciting or waiting must be in possession of a carriage for which he is soliciting or waiting to obtain passengers." Here anyone who pleased might travel by this vehicle. In my opinion the magistrate was right in holding that the vehicle was plying for hire in the Metropolitan Police district.

The distinction between the present case and Sales v. Lake (supra) has already been pointed out. In that case the driver of the vehicle was told to pick up at various points suitable to them the particular persons who had previously taken tickets, and he was not authorized to pick up any other persons, and he did not do so. For these reasons I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed with costs.

IN RE WINTER—EX PARTE WILLIAMS.*

Practice — Judgment summons — Divorce damages and costs — Judgment summonses against co-respondent in respect of both — Priority.

damages, an order will go in respect of the payment of costs first.

The applicant, Mr. David Ebenezer Williams, applied on two judgment summonses to Mr. Justice Astbury, sitting in bankruptcy, for an order for the examination of the debtor, Mr. Ernest Charles Winter, as to his means to pay £1,000, the sum awarded against him as the co-respondent on Mr. Williams's petition for divorce, and the costs, which amounted to £468 5s. 4d. The question arose whether the applicant was entitled to obtain an order against the debtor for the costs in priority to any order against him for the damages.

The first judgment summons related to the costs, and the other to the damages, but they were heard together.

Mr. Acton Pile, who appeared for the applicant, asked that an order should be made against the debtor on the judgment summons as to costs before any order was made on the summons in respect of the damages.

Mr. Justice Clauson said that the two summonses had been before the Court at the last hearing of judgment summonses in bankruptcy. The matter then stood over and he had discussed it with Mr. Justice Astbury, with the result that they had decided that the future practice should be that the order should go in respect of the payment of costs first. The husband was liable to his own solicitor for the costs, and it would be hard, when he was so liable, that he should in the first place only be able to obtain an order against the debtor in respect of the damages.

An order would be made in respect of the costs for the payment by the debtor of £10 per month, the first payment to be made on December 1, 1927. Until the costs were satisfied under that order no order would be made on the judgment summons in respect of the damages.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Atkin and Lawrence, L.JJ.)
1927. Nov. 7.

EASTMAN'S, LIMITED v. SHAW.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Trading profits — Deduction — Multiple shops — Shops closed and opened as demanded by business as a whole—Difference between cost of new fittings in new shops and price realized for old fittings —Capital or income expenditure—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule D, Case I.

A trading company with a number of branch shops controlled by a head office followed a policy of opening and closing their branches in accordance with the local demands and the probabilities of profit or loss.

Held, that the difference between the cost of new fixtures, fittings, and utensils for the new shops, and the receipts from the sales of equivalent second hand fixtures, &c., from the shops that were closed was a capital expenditure, and was not a revenue expenditure which could be debited to the trading account of the company in ascertaining the profits which were assessable to income-tax.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 549), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 549) on a case stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the Finsbury Division.

The case is fully set out in the report below, but the facts may be shortly summarized as follows:—

The company appealed against assessments made upon them under Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the years 1922, 1923, and 1924 in respect of their profits from their business as butchers and meat salesmen. They had a large business as retailers of imported chilled and frozen meat carried on at shops which they owned throughout the British Isles. It frequently became necessary or desirable both to open new shops and to close old ones. Shops might be temporarily opened in a district until the company could acquire an existing butchers' business in a superior situation, and when they did so the former shop was often closed. When a new shop was opened in place of a shop which had been given up the appellants found it less expensive and more convenient to sell the old fixtures and fittings and to purchase new ones for the new shop. In 1911 the company had 1,447 shops, but this number was gradually reduced until 1919 when the total was 749, since when the number of shops had tended to increase.

The appellants contended that the difference between the cost of providing new fittings and fixtures and the price realized by the sale of the old ones in shops they had given up, had properly been debited by them to income and expenditure account, and should be deducted from the profits before ascertaining the net income. The amount of this difference was in the year 1920, £440; in 1921, £4,374; and in 1922, £7,310. The Crown contended that these figures represented capital expenditure, and could not be allowed off income.

The General Commissioners having heard and considered the appeal were of opinion:—

(1) That it was part of the policy of the appellants to open and close shops whenever the state of trade made it desirable.

(2) That the question whether the expenditure incurred in opening shops was or was not of a capital nature was not affected by the fact that the appellants owned a large number of shops.

(3) That the expenses, less the sums received from the sale of fittings in the shops closed were expenses incurred at a time anterior to the carrying on of the trade, and were of a capital nature and were not an allowable deduction as an expense of running the business, and (4) that the assessments ought to be adjusted accordingly.

The company being dissatisfied with this decision requested the General Commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the Court.

On the case stated Mr. Justice Rowlatt upheld the decision of the General Commissioners, holding that if a trader had one shop and gave it up and moved into a new shop the expenditure on new fittings could not be deducted for income-tax purposes, and that it made no difference if he had 20 shops or more instead of one. To multiply the expenditure could not convert it into a revenue expenditure.

The company appealed.

Mr. Raymond Needham appeared for the appellants; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

The Court without calling on counsel for the Crown, dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS said that the case involved a short point under the Income Tax Act, 1918. The question was whether the company was entitled to deduct certain expenses before ascertaining its net income, or whether those expenses should be attributed to capital. The company owned a very large number of butcher's shops in the country; in 1911 they had 1,447, in 1919 this had been reduced to 749, but the number was now increasing again. The Court was told that the policy of the company was to open and to close shops according to their potentialities for profit or loss. They might find that several shops in one area might be more profitable than a single shop in another area. They opened the shops for the permanent extension of their trade, and, if they chose to do so, they could sell the shop fittings in closed shops, and buy new shop fittings for newly opened shops. The General Commissioners had found that it was part of the policy of the company to open and close shops. That, as Lord Justice Atkin had remarked, was not peculiar to the company's trade, but was merely to apply ordinary business policy to their trade. The General Commissioners had not found that the business of the company was one of buying up, fitting, and then selling shops. The principles of law applicable were quite clear, and had been rightly applied by Mr. Justice Rowlatt. The expenses incurred by the company in refitting shops were in the nature of a capital outlay and a capital loss.

LORD JUSTICE ATKIN said that he entirely agreed with the decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt for the reasons given by him and by the Master of the Rolls.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

REX v. SHEFFIELD JUSTICES—EX PARTE T. RAWSON AND CO., LIMITED, AND ANOTHER.*

Licensing—Intoxicating liquor—Redundancy—Same justices acting as licensing justices and as compensation authority—Offer to licensing justices of payment to compensation fund—Extraneous consideration—Effect on decision of compensation authority.

A question arose which of two adjacent licensed houses should be granted a renewal of its licence, and which should be suppressed. The owners of each house submitted to the licensing justices plans of proposed alterations, and the owners of one of the two houses offered to pay £1,250 to the compensation fund if the alterations were sanctioned. The same licensing justices sat as compensation authority to consider the question of redundancy, and decided to renew the licence of the house whose owners had offered the contribution, it appearing from the evidence that this house, when altered, could be made the better of the two. They then, as licensing justices, approved the alterations to this house.

Held, that in considering the question of the contribution offered to the compensation fund the licensing justices had taken extraneous matter into account, and that this must be held necessarily to have affected their minds as compensation authority, and their decision must be quashed.

Per AVORY, J.—It is contrary to the spirit of the Licensing Acts, though it may be within the letter of them, that the powers of the compensation authority should be delegated to the licensing committee so that the two bodies are identical. It was clearly intended that they should be separate and independent bodies.

This was a rule nisi for a certiorari directed to the justices of Sheffield acting as the compensation authority for the city under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, to quash an order made by them at a meeting of the compensation authority on June 21, 1927, whereby they refused to renew the licence of the "Norfolk Arms," Granville-street, Sheffield.

The rule was granted at the instance of Thomas Rawson and Co., Limited, the owners, and Arthur Smith, the licensee, of the "Norfolk Arms," upon the grounds:—

"(1) That the compensation authority considered matters other than the reports made to them pursuant to the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, sec. 19 (1), namely, the offer of the owners of the 'Granville Inn' to pay £1,250 into the compensation fund. (2) That the compensation authority offered to sell the renewal for a money payment which would go to the compensation fund if the committee chose so to direct. (3) That the evidence before the committee differentiated the two houses in favour of the 'Norfolk Arms,' and nothing but the aforesaid money payment by the owners of the 'Granville Inn' could justify a preference for the latter house. (4) That to give such a preference for such a reason amounted to a sale of justice, inasmuch as it put it in the reach of a rich person to defeat the claims of a poorer rival, and was thus contrary to the fundamental provisions of the Constitution."

It appeared from the affidavit upon which the rule was obtained that notice of opposition to the renewal of the licences of the "Norfolk Arms" and the "Granville Inn"—which were both fully licensed houses ten yards apart in the same street—was served upon the respective licensees. At the general annual licensing meeting on February 8, 1927, the question of the renewal of both licences was considered by the licensing justices, and both houses were referred to the compensation authority for consideration at the principal meeting. The compensation authority for Sheffield delegated their powers to the licensing justices under section 6 (1) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. Sir William Clegg was chairman both of the licensing justices and of the compensation authority.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The principal meeting of the compensation authority was held on June 21, 1927, when evidence in respect of both houses was heard. The solicitor for the "Norfolk Arms" submitted plans of proposed alterations and addressed the Bench. The solicitor for the "Granville Inn" also submitted plans for alterations to that house, and was proceeding to address the Bench when he was stopped by the chairman and asked whether he had any proposal to make to the justices. He immediately replied that the owners of the "Granville Inn" were prepared to pay £1,250 into the compensation fund. There was no bargaining about the amount, nor was there any question of the surrender of any other licences as an alternative proposal. The offer was immediately accepted by the chairman, who thereupon announced that the licence of the "Granville Inn" would be renewed and that the licence of the "Norfolk Arms" would be referred for compensation.

Sir William Clegg made an affidavit on behalf of the justices in which he stated that at the transfer sessions on September 8, 1925, plans of the "Granville Inn," showing certain alterations, were laid before the justices, and an application was made for their consent to the alterations under section 71 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. Consideration of the matter was adjourned to enable the licensing committee to visit the inn.

The committee visited the inn on October 1, 1925, but viewed the outside only of the "Norfolk Arms." They came to the conclusion that the "Norfolk Arms" was the better house and, at the transfer sessions on October 27, 1925, refused to give consent to the proposed alterations, as the question of redundancy of one of the two licences was likely to arise in the near future. In November, 1925, the committee viewed the "Norfolk Arms" inside as well as out, and came to the conclusion that their previous opinion was wrong and that it was not practicable so to improve the "Norfolk Arms" that it would be as good as the "Granville Inn" when altered and improved. They considered, having regard to the enlarged drinking facilities provided by the proposed alterations of the "Granville Inn," that consent should not be given unless the owners offered to give an undertaking to surrender a licence or licences, or made some equivalent offer. The "Granville Inn" plans were again submitted, and on December 8, 1925, the consideration of them was adjourned to see what offer would be made by the owners. Subsequently the justices' clerk received a letter dated March 12, 1926, written on behalf of the owners of the "Granville Inn," which said :—

"My clients . . . will pay the sum of £1,250 on the day when the 'Norfolk Hotel' (sic) opposite to the 'Granville Inn' is closed . . . on condition that the plans now submitted to the licensing committee for the improvement and alteration to the 'Granville Inn' are approved."

That offer was at that time declined. At the transfer sessions on December 14, 1926, the licensing committee considered that one of the two licences was redundant. They gave instructions for notices of objection to be served, with a view to determine whether there was a redundancy, and, if so, which of the two houses was the better adapted for licensed premises, or would be so after making any approved alterations. There was evidence before the committee at the general annual licensing meeting on February 8, 1927, that the "Granville Inn" had room for extension, while the "Norfolk Arms" could be improved but not extended.

At the transfer sessions of the licensing committee and the principal meeting of the compensation authority on June 21, 1927, all applications and business had to be dealt with by the justices present either in their capacity as members of the licensing committee or as members of the compensation authority. Among the questions which they had to consider were :—(1) (As compensation authority) Whether, subject to the payment of compensation under the Licensing Acts, the renewal of the licences of the "Granville Inn" and the "Norfolk Arms" or of either, and, if so, which, of them should be refused ; (2) (as licensing committee) (a) whether the consent of the licensing committee should be given to the proposed alterations of the "Granville Inn" ; and (b) whether the consent of the licensing committee should be given to the proposed alterations of the "Norfolk Arms," the plans for which were first produced at that meeting.

By consent of the solicitors for both parties all those applications were heard together. It was clearly understood that, if a renewal were granted to either house, the house would be altered as might be approved by the justices. The same architect had prepared the plans for both houses. He was questioned by the advocate for each side, and stated that in his opinion the "Granville Inn" would be the better house when the alterations were made.

The justices were unanimously of opinion that only one of the two licences was required, and that no practicable alterations would make the "Norfolk Arms" as good as the "Granville Inn." It became apparent to every one in Court that the only question to be decided was whether the licensing committee should give their consent to the proposed alterations to the "Granville Inn." The offer subsequently made related solely to the proposed alterations. The justices decided, in accordance with their opinion on the evidence, that in the interests of the public the licence of the "Granville Inn" should be renewed and that the licence of the "Norfolk Arms" should not be renewed. Before announcing that decision as compensation authority it remained for them as licensing justices to decide as to granting their consent to the making of the alterations to the "Granville Inn." The alterations involved an enlargement of the licensed premises and an increase of the drinking facilities, and the justices were of opinion that the licensees ought either to surrender some other licensed premises or pay to the compensation fund some sum in lieu thereof, as a condition of receiving the consent sought. It was with this in mind that Sir William Clegg asked the solicitor for the "Granville Inn" whether he had any proposal to make. In no sense was he inviting the solicitor to make an offer to the compensation authority as a condition of the renewal of the licence, upon which they had already decided. Every one understood that the offer of payment was made in consideration of the increased business facilities sought. The licensees, said Sir William Clegg, could not have thought that the offer was made or accepted as the price for the renewal of the licence.

The compensation authority would have preferred an offer to surrender a licence or licences of the value of £1,250, or thereabouts, but were aware that owners had difficulty in finding a suitable licence to surrender. As money paid into the compensation fund went to the extinction of licences, they considered the offer a fair one and accepted it, and gave leave to reconstruct the "Granville Inn." They then, as compensation authority, announced their refusal to renew the licence of the "Norfolk Arms" as being redundant, and, as the licensing committee, refused to consent to the proposed alterations to the "Norfolk Arms."

Mr. C. Paley Scott showed cause; Mr. Mitchell Banks, K.C., and Mr. Maurice Healy supported the rule.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—This is a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to be directed to the Keepers of the Peace and Justices in and for the city and county borough of Sheffield acting as the compensation authority for that city and county borough to remove into this Court certain orders made by them, or some of them, at a meeting of the compensation authority held at or about June 21 of this year, whereby they refused to renew the licence of certain premises known as the "Norfolk Arms," Granville-street, Sheffield.

There are four grounds stated in the rule, and perhaps the substance of them is expressed in the first of them—namely, that the compensation authority considered matters other than the reports made to them pursuant to the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, section 19, subsection 1; that is to say, an offer by the owners of the "Granville Inn" to pay £1,250 into the compensation fund. It is not necessary, I think, to repeat all the facts of the case which have been laid so fully and so clearly before the Court both by the affidavits and by the arguments of learned counsel. It is enough to say that in the city of Sheffield the compensation authority, who are all the justices for the city and county borough of Sheffield, have delegated, as they are lawfully entitled to delegate, their powers as the compensation authority to a committee—a committee consisting of the licensing justices for Sheffield.

Now those being the tribunals which, although identical in point of personnel, were quite separate and independent in point of function, it is clear from the affidavit that a question arose, and arose a considerable time ago—not this year, nor even last year—whether of the two licensed houses, namely, the "Norfolk Arms" and the "Granville Inn," the first or the second should be regarded as redundant. The materials before the Court show that there were good grounds for believing that the two houses co-existing were not necessary. The question, however, remained which of the two should be taken and which left. Before that controversy was disposed of, and while it yet remained uncertain, questions arose as to the possibility of improving each of these houses by alteration, and it is not denied that in considering the question whether a particular house is redundant and what its merits are in relation to or in comparison with another house, the justices are entitled to consider not merely what it is in esse but what it is in posse; in other words, they are entitled to see what are its reasonable prospects of improvement by alteration. It happened curiously enough that the skilled witness who was prepared to speak as to the potentialities of each of these two houses in the matter of alteration was one and the same, and undoubtedly when the last stage but one in the matter was reached, having given his evidence, he did express the view that of the two houses the "Granville Inn" was the better both for what it was, and for what it might become.

That matter involved another question, namely, whether permission should be given for the carrying out of the proposed alterations. The question of the alterations was a question for the licensing justices as such; the question of redundancy was a question for the compensation authority. And the first complaint logically and chronologically here is, that in considering the question whether the alterations to the "Granville Inn" should be permitted, the licensing justices not only took into account, but imposed as a condition, the proposed payment of a sum of £1,250. There is no need to read again upon the point the extremely frank and clear affidavit of Sir William Clegg, the chairman of the compensation authority. In two passages, one of them occurring in paragraph 10 of the affidavit, and the other occurring in paragraph 18 of the affidavit, he makes it plain that, whether in express words or in silent reflection, the justices treated the payment of this sum of £1,250 as a condition of their assent to the proposed alterations of the "Granville Inn."

The first question in the case is really whether that proceeding was permitted by law, and let me say at once that as in the case of Rex v. Shann (26 The Times L.R., 435; [1910] 2 K.B., 418) so here; there is not the smallest doubt, and I accept unreservedly the view that Sir William Clegg and his brother justices honestly believed that they were dealing with all these matters according to the merits. The question remains, however, whether that which they did was lawful, and it seems to me to be clear both from the case of Rex v. Shann (supra) and from the case of Rex v. Wandsworth Licensing Justices (37 The Times L.R., 619; [1921] 3 K.B., 487), that licensing justices are not entitled to impose such a condition as a term of their permission for alterations to be made. The matter is made quite plain, for example, by a passage in the judgment of Lord Chief Justice Lawrence, as he then was, in Rex v. Wandsworth Licensing Justices (supra), at page 496, and in the judgment of my Brother Avory, at page 498 of the same volume.

I cannot resist the conclusion involved in the words of Sir William Clegg's affidavit that the payment of this sum of money was in truth and in fact a condition of the permission to make the alterations. But while it was for the licensing justices to consider whether the alterations might be made, it was for the compensation authority to decide whether the house, and which house, was redundant, and although the chronology of the matter is a little involved, it seems to be reasonably clear that the licensing justices sent forward both houses to be considered by the compensation authority, the question of the alterations still remaining in suspense, and thereupon the very same gentlemen, uniting in their own persons the functions of the licensing justices and the functions of the compensation authority, sat in the two capacities and entertained first one question, then the other, and then returned to the first question. There is not merely an alternation of their functions to and fro, there is a reiterated alternation to and fro, and according to the history of the matter, as they finally set it forth, they came to the conclusion as compensation authority that the "Granville Inn" was the inn to be preserved, and the "Norfolk Arms" was the inn that was redundant, but all the time they had in their minds as licensing justices the question whether the proposed alterations to the "Granville Inn" should be permitted, and that question involved the other question, whether they could with success impose the condition that the owners of the "Granville Inn" should pay a sum of £1,250.

Now if they had been sitting separately as licensing justices to consider by itself the question of the alterations, it is obvious on the authorities that they would have taken extraneous matter into consideration if they had been influenced by the offer of £1,250, and I am of the opinion that that extraneous consideration had the effect of vitiating the subsequent decision which they made upon the different but allied question of redundancy when the scale was turned against the "Norfolk Arms" and in favour of the "Granville Inn" by reason of these very alterations still in prospect, but consented to upon the terms of the payment of the £1,250. In other words, in coming to their decision as compensation authority they were influenced by the extraneous consideration which operated upon their minds as licensing justices in imposing the condition with reference to the proposed alterations of the house. No doubt when the very same persons are acting at one moment as licensing justices, and at another moment as compensation authority, it is difficult for them to keep out of their minds as compensation authority considerations which may have entered into their minds as licensing justices. But one thing is very certain : if they choose to sit in both capacities in the same place on the same occasion, then if as licensing justices they permit extraneous matters to be taken into consideration, those extraneous matters must automatically affect their decision as compensation authority.

I have come to the conclusion, while I recognize to the full the public purpose which animated these justices and the honesty of their belief that they were deciding the question according to the merits, that this decision cannot stand. I think that the extraneous considerations which were permitted to operate upon their minds as licensing justices did not cease in their effect with the making of the order about the alterations, but continued so as to affect and so as to destroy the decision which those gentlemen also made in their capacity of compensation authority, because that decision was evidently influenced by those very alterations which had been sanctioned in this improper way. In those circumstances, it seems to me that this rule ought to be made absolute, and this order ought to be quashed.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I have come to the same conclusion. This rule does not specifically raise any question about the constitution of the compensation authority in this present case, but having been informed, as we have, of what the facts were, I think it right to say that although it may be that the committee who acted as the compensation authority in this case were strictly within the letter of the law as provided by section 6 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act of 1910, I am satisfied that the appointment of such a committee, namely, of the same licensing justices who acted as the licensing justices for the borough, as the committee to act as the compensation authority, is clearly contrary to the spirit of the Act of Parliament, which, in my view, contemplates that the compensation authority shall at all events be a different body from the licensing justices. That view is certainly expressed in one of the judgments in the case of Rex v. Shann (26 The Times L.R., 435 ; [1910] 2 K.B., 418), in which Lord Justice Farwell, at page 434, said : "It is, in my opinion, clear that the licensing justices and the compensation committee are two distinct and independent bodies, whether the latter be quarter sessions, as provided by section 1, subsection 1, of the Licensing Act, 1904, or the majority of the whole body of justices as provided by section 8, subsection 2, of that Act as amended by the Licensing Act, 1906." It is idle in this case, in my view, to say that this compensation committee was a distinct and independent body from the licensing justices who were dealing with the very same matter ; in fact, they were the same persons, and, moreover, in fact in this case, they were actually sitting on June 21, which is the material date, in both capacities, both as the compensation authority and as the licensing justices, who were dealing with the application for alterations in licensed premises.

Apart from that point, which I think might have been made one of the grounds of this rule, the only question which remains is whether upon the affidavits which are before us, and particularly whether upon the affidavit made by the chairman, Sir William Clegg, we can avoid the conclusion that the compensation committee, or the compensation authority in this case, in refusing to renew the licence of the "Norfolk Arms" and in granting a renewal of the licence of the "Granville Inn," were influenced by some extraneous consideration which ought not to have influenced their judgment. Whether it be put as a condition which they were not authorized to impose, or whether it be put as an extraneous consideration which influenced their judgment is immaterial. I think upon the evidence which is before us we should be justified in saying that in fact, although not in terms, the compensation authority in this case were imposing a condition of the renewal of the licence of the "Granville Inn" the payment of a sum of £1,250 to the compensation authority ; and in effect they were saying that they would not renew the licence to the "Norfolk Arms" unless either the same or a better offer were made on behalf of the "Norfolk Arms." When once one is driven to that conclusion, namely, that they were influenced by that consideration, it is clear upon the authorities that that was a matter which they had no right to take into consideration at all.

The case of Rex v. Shann (supra), to which my Lord has already referred, I think deserves a little consideration as showing its application to the present case. In that case the Divisional Court had held that the compensation authority were entitled for the purpose of differentiating between the two houses to take into consideration the offers made by the respective owners, and the Divisional Court discharged the rules. That decision was reversed on appeal, and for the purpose of explaining a passage in the judgment of one of the learned Lords Justices, which I am going to read, it is right to look at the argument of Sir Edward Carson, which is at [1910] 2 K.B., page 421, where he was putting it before the Court of Appeal in this way ; he said : "Possibly, in a case where the owner of a licensed house, the renewal of the licence of which had been referred to the compensation authority, had another licensed house, there might be no objection to his arranging with the authority to give up the licence of the latter house if the authority would renew the licence of the former ; but, assuming that to be so, it is quite clear that, where two persons are applying for the renewal of the licences of their respective houses, it is ultra vires for the authority to make the question which licence shall be renewed, and which suppressed, the subject of an auction, as was in effect done in the present case." That view appears to me to have been supported and endorsed by the decision of the Lords Justices in that case. While it is true that Lord Justice Vaughan Williams differed in the sense that he did not see his way to differ from the conclusion of fact at which the Divisional Court had arrived, he said this at page 429 : "The contention, as I understand it, is this, that the only body which has to deal with the question of the alteration or rebuilding of these publichouses was the licensing justices, and that at no time and for no reason had the compensation authority a right to get information as to what these people would be willing to offer either by way of surrender of licences or of contribution to the compensation fund. I think that probably that view is right, if it means that the compensation authority had no right to make willingness to conform to their conditions a condition necessary to avoid the refusal of the licence. I do not think the compensation authority had any right to do that; in fact, I doubt whether even the licensing justices had any such right, at all events after the matter had been referred by them to the compensation authority." Then at page 434 Lord Justice Farwell says: "I can find nothing in the Act that justifies the committee"—that is, the compensation committee—"in offering to sell the renewal, either for a money payment which would go to the rates as if made under section 4, subsection 4, or to the compensation fund, as the committee might choose to direct, or for the surrender of other licensed premises. The illegality of a money payment is, in my opinion, decided by Reg. v. Bowman (14 The Times L.R., 303; [1898] 1 Q.B., 663), and is the more marked in this case because the Act expressly authorizes money payments in the case of new licences and does not do so in the case of these renewals of old licences." Lord Justice Kennedy, as my Lord has already said, at page 439, took the same view that the proceedings in that case could not be upheld even though you accepted the view which was put forward in that case, as it is in the present case, by the chairman of the justices, that they believed they were deciding according to the merits. After saying that he was prepared to accept that view, Lord Justice Kennedy proceeds: "But at the same time I concur with Lord Alverstone, C.J., when, in delivering the judgment of the Divisional Court, he stated that, if the Court thought that it was improper for the compensation authority to ascertain what licences the respective owners were prepared to surrender in consideration of the renewal, the Court would agree with the contention of Sir Edward Carson on behalf of the present appellants that the reception and consideration of the offers of the licensees as to the surrender of the licences or contribution to the compensation fund, if their licences were renewed, would vitiate the subsequent proceedings and establish the contention that the renewing magistrates acted beyond their jurisdiction, even though they disregarded the offers in coming to the decision." He says he agrees with Lord Alverstone in that view of the law, and in the view of the Lord Justice it was fatal to the respondent's case. Then he proceeds to say why he did not agree with the Divisional Court, and he goes on: "The Lord Chief Justice went on to hold, however, that the compensation authority in deciding the question of renewal were entitled to consider what (if any) licences the respective owners would be prepared to surrender, or what contribution they would make to the compensation fund. From this view I respectfully dissent. I cannot find any justification for the action of these justices either in the provisions of the Act of 1904, or in general principles of justice, or in the authority of Leeds Corporation v. Ryder (23 The Times L.R., 721; [1907] A.C., 420), to which the Lord Chief Justice proceeded to refer to in his judgment."

Under those circumstances, it appears to me to be quite impossible in this case to say that the compensation authority was not influenced by the consideration that this money payment was going to be made to the compensation fund, and on that short ground I agree that this rule should be made absolute.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

On an application being made for costs against the justices, the Lord Chief Justice said: Is there not a fund, Mr. Paley Scott, in existence out of which justices in such a case if ordered to pay costs can pay them?

Mr. Paley Scott.—It has been decided that your Lordships may order costs to come out of the compensation fund. It seems almost poetic justice in this case that the offending fund should pay. Would your Lordships in the event of making that order also order that the respondents' costs might come out of the same fund. I do not think there is any other fund.

The Lord Chief Justice.—What sort of justice is that, Mr. Paley Scott?

Mr. Paley Scott.—I think it is equally poetic, my Lord. As I understand this case, it was the desire of the justices to swell the fund and not to deplete it.

Mr. Justice Avory.—Is it quite clear that we can make that order?

Mr. Paley Scott.—Your Lordship will find the matter referred to at page 570 of Paterson. There was a case of Rex v. Sheffield Justices—Ex parte Morrison (32 The Times L.R., 241; [1916] 1 K.B., 682).

Mr. Justice Avory.—I have some recollection of having taken part in that decision in some capacity.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This poem, Mr. Paley Scott, seems to have fallen into more than one part.

Mr. Paley Scott.—Yes, my Lord, there are few things that are original. The way in which the textbook writer deals with it is: "Where a rule for a mandamus is applied for against a compensation authority, and that authority appears to oppose the rule, the costs of the compensation authority, and, if the rule is made absolute, also those of the applicant, may be directed to be paid out of the compensation fund."

Mr. Justice Avory.—Where is there any decision in this case of Rex v. Sheffield Justices (supra) about the costs?

Mr. Paley Scott.—I am very sorry, my Lord, but I am afraid I have not got the case here. I am referring now to page 570 of Paterson, and if I may say so, my Lord, it was also within the recollection of my client.

Mr. Justice Avory.—There is nothing about costs in that case. It was a question whether there had been an agreement as to the amount of compensation.

Mr. Paley Scott.—It is dealt with by section 21 under which in Paterson the note occurs which I have just read to your Lordship. Subsection 5 of that section says: "Any expenses incurred by the compensation authority in the payment of compensation under this Act, or otherwise in the exercise of their powers or the performance of their duties as compensation authority, and such expenses of the licensing justices" and so forth "shall be paid out of the compensation fund, and the compensation authority, in the exercise of their powers, shall have regard to the funds available for the purpose." It was under that section that the order was apparently made in the case to which I have referred, your Lordship, that costs should come out of that fund.

Mr. Justice Avory.—The report of the case of the Sheffield Justices (supra) says nothing about costs, but I am quite sure that this question has been before the Court, and it has been considered under subsection 5 of section 21.

Mr. Paley Scott.—Yes, my Lord. I was told of it by my client, who had personal recollection of the decision in that case, and the learned editor in his work seems to have the same information.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Very well. The order of the Court is that the rule nisi be made absolute, and the costs of both sides will be borne by the compensation fund.

Mr. PALEY SCOTT.—If your Lordship pleases.

K.B. Div. (Wright, J.) } 1927. Nov. 4.

FARR, SMITH, AND CO., LIMITED v. MESSERS, LIMITED.*

Contract — Sale of goods — "Note or memorandum in writing" — Action originally founded on previous contract—Plea in defence in that action—"Earnest"—Undertaking to pay third party's debts—"Part payment"—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 71), s. 4 (1).

Partners in a firm brought an action for damages for breach of a written contract for the sale of goods. In the defence, which was signed by counsel, the defendants pleaded that the firm had been converted into a limited company and that it had been orally agreed between that company and the defendants that, in consideration of the company's undertaking to pay certain debts owing to the defendants by the firm and to perform the obligations of the firm under the written contract, the defendants would supply to the company the goods sold under the written contract. Subsequently the action was amended, the company being substituted as plaintiffs and the cause of action being expressed to be for the breach of the oral agreement.

Held, that the plea in the original defence in which the oral agreement was set out was a "note or memorandum in writing . . . signed by the party to be charged or his agent in that behalf" of that oral contract within s. 4 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

Held, further, that the undertaking to pay the firm's debts did not constitute the giving of "something in earnest to bind the contract" within s. 4 (1), being rather part of the consideration for the contract, but that the payment of those moneys was given "in part payment" within the subsection.

This was an action in which the plaintiffs, Messrs. Farr, Smith, and Co., Limited, of Woolwich, S.E., claimed from the defendants, Messrs. Messers, Limited, of Bishopsgate, E.C., damages for breach of contract.

The history of the case, put shortly, was as follows. The facts and arguments appear fully in the judgment.

On January 9, 1924, a written contract was entered into between the defendants and a firm named Farr, Smith, and Co. for the sale and delivery by the defendants to the firm of a quantity of firewood. Subsequently, the present plaintiffs, a limited company, were formed to take over the business of Farr, Smith, and Co. On July 9, 1924, it was orally agreed between two of the directors of the plaintiff company and one of the defendants' directors that, in consideration of an undertaking by the plaintiff company to pay certain debts owing to the defendants by the firm of Farr, Smith, and Co., and to perform the firm's obligations under the contract of January 9, 1924, the defendants would supply to Farr, Smith, and Co., Limited, the wood sold under the contract of January 9, 1924. The defendants failed to deliver the goods.

On February 21, 1925, an action was begun in which Frederick Augustus Farr and William Henry Smith, the partners in Farr, Smith, and Co., claimed from the defendants damages for breach of the agreement of January 9, 1924. On April 20, 1925, the statement of claim in that action was delivered. On May 12, 1925, the defence was delivered. In paragraph 3 of the defence the agreement of July 9, 1924, was pleaded.

By an order dated November 6, 1925, the present plaintiffs were substituted as plaintiffs for Mr. Farr and Mr. Smith. On November 19, 1925, the amended statement of claim was delivered. In it the plaintiffs claimed damages for a breach of the oral contract of July 9, 1924. By their amended defence the defendants denied the agreement and further pleaded that section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, had not been complied with.

Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. T. Simpson Pedler appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Pitman, K.C., and Mr. Harold Stranger for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT delivered the following judgment:—This is a claim for damages for breach of contract for the sale of certain wood. On January 9, 1924, the defendants, who are timber merchants, sold to a firm of Farr, Smith, and Co., boxmakers, 150 to 200 cubic fathoms first quality firewood at prices which ranged from £9 10s. per cubic fathom to £8 10s. per cubic fathom. The shipment was to be from Kramfors and the goods were to be ready for shipment in September, and payment was to be made by approved acceptance four months from the date of the discharge of each parcel. The firm in question had purchased and received delivery of an earlier parcel of wood goods and in the early part of 1924 they were in some financial difficulty. From time to time they made payments to the defendants on account and they laid their position before the defendants very candidly. The firm desired to obtain further capital and for that purpose a limited company, the present plaintiffs, was formed. Shortly afterwards, on or about July 9, 1924, Mr. Farr, a partner in the old firm and also a director of the new company, accompanied by another director, Mr. Skinnerton, interviewed a director of the defendants. Mr. Skinnerton, in evidence, which I accept, said that the indebtedness of the firm was discussed and eventually it was arranged that the company should pay in cash and in bills the moneys due to the defendants from the firm, and at the same time it was agreed that the company should have the benefit of the contract of January 9, 1924. The arrangement was that the defendants should send to the new company drafts at one, two, and three months, and that they should also receive a cheque for £200. The defendants received the cheque for £200 and they also received acceptances from the plaintiff company for £227 5s., £225 19s., and £224 13s.

I find as a fact that there was such an agreement and that the effect of that agreement was that the defendants undertook to perform the contract of January 9, 1924, with the plaintiffs instead of the firm and in consideration of that undertaking they were promised, and they in fact received, the cheque and the three acceptances. The defendants admitted this in paragraph 3 of the original defence, in which it was stated :—"On or about July 9, 1924, the plaintiff, Farr, partner in Farr, Smith, and Co., called upon the defendants and said that he and his firm were unable to meet the sums then due to the defendants by the plaintiffs and that, to provide money, they had formed a limited company, Farr, Smith, and Co., Limited, and he then orally requested that the defendants, instead of supplying the plaintiffs with the goods under the agreement of January 9, 1924, would enter into the following agreement : (1) That the defendants would accept £200 to be paid in cash on the following Monday and the balance by drafts on the said Farr, Smith, and Co., Limited, as to £224 13s. in one month, as to £225 19s. in two months, and as to £227 5s. in three months ; and (2) that the defendants would supply to the new company which had been formed, called Farr, Smith, and Co., Limited, instead of to the plaintiffs, the goods sold under the contract of January 9, 1924, and accept that company as buyers of the said goods ; and the defendants, through their Mr. Goff, agreed to this arrangement."

My attention has been drawn by Mr. Pitman to paragraph 5 of the original defence which is as follows:—"Further or alternatively it was an implied term of the said agreement of July 9, 1924, that Farr, Smith, and Co., Limited, would enter into an agreement and/or sign a contract forthwith in the terms of the contract of January 9, 1924, except that the company's name would be inserted instead of Farr, Smith, and Co., and that the plaintiffs would arrange that such contract would be entered into by Farr, Smith, and Co., Limited, but, in breach of the said implied terms, Farr, Smith, and Co., Limited, failed to enter into the contract." I see no ground whatever for implying any such term. No evidence has been given of any agreement to that effect, and having regard to the first three words of paragraph 5, "Further or alternatively," I consider paragraph 5 to be an alternative, leaving paragraph 3 standing in the form in which it appears.

It is said by Mr. Stranger that in pleading paragraph 3 he did not intend to allege an agreement between Farr, Smith, and Co., Limited, and the defendants, and that he has not so alleged. I think that he has so alleged that agreement, whether he intended to do so or not. The position at that stage of the action was that the partners in Farr, Smith, and Co. were claiming the performance of the contract of January 9, 1924, and the whole purpose was to allege in defence of that claim that there had been a novation of the contract. That is a reasonable and proper interpretation of paragraph 3. That defence was delivered on May 12, 1925, and thereupon the action was reconstituted and the pleadings were amended. The plaintiffs, Farr and Smith, as individuals, were struck out and for them were substituted the present plaintiff company, Farr, Smith, and Co., Limited. The contract which then became the cause of action was alleged to be an oral contract entered into on July 9, 1924, between the defendants and Farr, Smith, and Co., Limited, and so the action has proceeded up to the present time.

There is no doubt at all that the defendants did not deliver to the plaintiff company the goods under the contract. Certain requests for delivery were made from time to time and it was not until December 15, 1924, that the defendants finally said that they had no contract with the plaintiffs for the delivery of the wood. They offered to deliver some 70 fathoms as under a new contract on certain terms, but the defendants refused that as they were entitled to do, and they never got any further satisfaction. I therefore find a breach of contract and, subject to what I feel to be the real defence, the plaintiffs are entitled to damages.

The defendants, however, have thought fit to rely upon the defence of section 4 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. That subsection provides : "A contract for the sale of any goods of the value of £10 or upwards shall not be enforceable by action unless the buyer shall . . . give something in earnest to bind the contract, or in part payment, or unless some note or memorandum in writing of the contract be made and signed by the party to be charged or his agent in that behalf."

Mr. Schiller contends that that section has been complied with and he takes his stand on each one of its three limbs. He says that there is here a note or memorandum in writing of the contract sued on ; that there is earnest ; and that there is part payment.

Is there any note or memorandum of the contract ? Mr. Schiller submitted that I could find such a note or memorandum in the correspondence. I do not think that I can do so. In the correspondence there is a recognition of the bargain between the parties, but no document which sufficiently identifies the contract or specifies its terms so as to constitute a note or memorandum within the section. He then says that there is a note or memorandum in paragraph 3 of the original defence. I think that that paragraph does contain a correct and complete note or memorandum of the agreement entered into orally on July 9, 1924.

But a further point has to be considered. It has been held that the note or memorandum to be relied on must be in existence at the time when the action is brought and it is not enough that it should be in existence at the time when it is sought to prove the case by adducing a note or memorandum in writing. The leading case on that point is Lucas v. Dixon (22 Q.B.D., 357), the decision of a strong Court which has been accepted since. Lord Justice Fry said : "The statute requires the memorandum as evidence, but requires that evidence to be in existence at the commencement of the action which is brought to enforce the contract. If, then, it only comes into existence after the commencement of such an action, and the plaintiff desires to avail himself of it, he can only do so by discontinuing the action and commencing another." The Lord Justice, in his work on Specific Performance (6th edition), page 240, section 497, refers to "the well-settled rule which requires that the writing relied on as taking a case out of the statute should be in existence before action brought ; a requirement which would be unreasonable and contrary to the usual practice, if it related only to procedure and did not go to the solemnities of the contract." The rule is well fixed. In this case the plaintiffs thought fit, instead of discontinuing the action which was originally brought in the names of the partners of the firm, to take the course which is now not objected to under modern procedure. They struck out the names of the original plaintiffs and substituted as plaintiffs the present plaintiffs, and they also altered the cause of action, because, whereas the original action was a claim on a contract of January 9, 1924, between the partners of Farr, Smith, and Co. and the defendants, the action as at present conceived is brought to enforce a different contract—namely, an oral contract of July 9, 1924, between the plaintiff company and the defendants.

In these circumstances, I have to determine in what sense the rule laid down in Lucas v. Dixon (supra) is to be applied to the present case. I think that I am justified in holding that the rule in Lucas v. Dixon (supra) is satisfied. I think that the memorandum relied on—namely, paragraph 3 of the original defence—ought to be held to have been "in existence at the commencement of the action which is brought to enforce the contract," to quote the words of Lord Justice Fry. I come to this conclusion because, until the proceedings were reconstituted, there was no action to enforce the contract now in issue. I think that it ought to be held, so far as the rule which I am considering is concerned, that, where there is an entirely new departure in the way of the parties and of the cause of action, even though, by reason of the modern procedure, use can be made of the existing writ, that is still to be treated as the beginning of a new action. On that basis I am prepared to hold that the memorandum in this case is sufficient. I ought to refer to a decision of Mr. Justice Russell in Grindell v. Bass (36 The Times L.R., 867; [1920] 2 Ch., 487) where the memorandum came into existence in the course of the action but before the party who sought to rely on it had become a party to the action. The action was for specific performance. There was a defence signed by counsel alleging that the defendant had already contracted to sell the property to a third party, who was thereupon added as a defendant and who counterclaimed for a declaration based on the contract alleged in the defence. It was held by Mr. Justice Russell that the third party was entitled to rely on the paragraph in the defence as being a note or memorandum. I think that, although that is not precisely an authority for the conclusion to which I have arrived in the present case, it does give some support to the view which I have expressed of the true meaning to be attached to the words "commencement of the action which is brought to enforce the contract" in the rule. I ought, in referring to Grindell v. Bass (supra) also to add that I rely on it as being in support of the conclusion at which I have arrived that a note or memorandum signed by counsel in a case is a note or memorandum "signed by the party to be charged or his agent in that behalf" within section 4, subsection 1, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

I think, however, that it is desirable for me to deal with the two other points on which reliance has been placed. One of those points is whether any earnest was given here. The other is whether there was part-payment.

As to the first of these points, it is somewhat difficult to give a precise definition of "earnest." Certain essential characteristics, however, seem to me to be clear. While a deposit may be an earnest, in all the old cases earnest was some tangible thing. And that thing must be given at the moment when the contract is concluded because it is something to bind the contract and must, therefore, come into existence at the making of the contract. It must also be given by one contracting party to the other as a token of good faith and as a warranty that he will fulfil his contract and subject to the condition that if, owing to the giver's default, the contract is not fulfilled, it will be forfeited. If, on the other hand, the contract is duly performed the earnest may well serve the further purpose and operate by way of part payment.

In Howe v. Smith (27 Ch.D., 89, at p. 101), Lord Justice Fry, when dealing with a deposit paid on a contract for the sale of land, said: "Money paid as a deposit must, I conceive, be paid on some terms implied or expressed. In this case no terms are expressed, and we must therefore inquire what terms are to be implied. The terms most naturally to be implied appear to me in the case of money paid on the signing of a contract to be that in the event of the contract being performed it shall be brought into account, but if the contract is not performed by the payer it shall remain the property of the payee. It is not merely a part payment, but is then also an earnest to bind the bargain so entered into, and creates by the fear of its forfeiture a motive in the payer to perform the rest of the contract." In Sumner and Leivesley v. John Brown and Co. (25 The Times L.R. 745), Mr. Justice Hamilton, as he then was, said that earnest meant "something given for the purpose of binding a contract, something to be used to put pressure on the defaulter if he failed to carry out his part. If the contract went through, the thing given in earnest was returned to the giver, or, if money, was deducted from the price. If the contract went off through the giver's fault the thing given in earnest was forfeited." In Benjamin on Sales (6th Edition), page 255, a definition to the same effect is given. The author says: "Earnest may be money, or some gift or token (among the Romans usually a ring), given by the buyer to the seller, and accepted by the latter to mark the final conclusive assent of both sides to the bargain; and this was formerly a prevalent custom in England. And an earnest did not lose its character because the same thing might also avail as a part payment." In Blenkinsop v. Clayton (7 Taunt., 597), it was held that there must be an actual transfer of the thing which passes. I ought to add that in Sumner and Leivesley v. John Brown and Co. (supra), Mr. Justice Hamilton refused to treat the delivery of certain bags to be filled with potatoes which had been bought under the contract as in the nature of earnest. He held that the bags were sent to facilitate the performance of the contract, and not to bind it.

I do not think that, in the present case, there was anything which could be held to be an earnest within the definitions to which I have referred. Nothing, as I find the facts, was given, at the time when the contract was made, to bind the parties. There was a promise to give a cheque and there was a promise to accept and to deliver certain drafts. But those matters, I think, were part of the consideration for the contract. They were not referred to, at the time of the conclusion of the contract, with the intention of binding it. A few days after the contract had been entered into the cheque was paid and the drafts were given, but, in my opinion, that was done, after the contract had been made, in partial performance of it.

With regard to the last point I hold that the consideration passing from the plaintiffs to the defendants was twofold. It was not merely the undertaking to fulfil the conditions as to payment contained in the original contract of January 9, 1924. It also included an undertaking to pay the amounts covered by the cheque and the drafts. I hold that the giving of the cheque and the drafts was a part payment under the contract within the meaning of section 4, subsection 1, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

On these grounds the technical defences to this claim fail, and the only question which I have now to consider is that of damages.

His Lordship proceeded to assess the damages at £300. Judgment was entered accordingly for the plaintiffs, with costs.

Court of Criminal Appeal.
(Lord Hewart, C.J., Avory and Salter, JJ.)
1927. Nov. 7.

REX v. O'DONOGHUE.*

Criminal Law — Infanticide — "Newly-born child"—Child a month old—Infanticide Act, 1922 (12 and 13 Geo. V., c. 18), s. 1 (2).

The appellant was charged with the murder of her child who had been born on August 19, 1927, and had been strangled by her on September 21, 1927. The Judge at the trial held that there was no evidence to go to the jury that the child was "newly-born" within s. 1 (2) of the Infanticide Act, 1922.

Held, that that ruling was correct.

Observations on the form of statements made by accused persons while under arrest.

The COURT dismissed this appeal, which raised the question whether a child aged one month was a "newly-born child" within section 1 (2) of the Infanticide Act, 1922.

That subsection provides :—

"Where upon the trial of a woman for the murder of her newly-born child, the jury are of opinion that she by any wilful act or omission caused its death, but that at the time of the act or omission she had not fully recovered from the effect of giving birth to such child, and that by reason thereof the balance of her mind was then disturbed, the jury may, notwithstanding that the circumstances were such that but for the provisions of this Act they might have returned a verdict of murder, return in lieu thereof a verdict of infanticide."

The appellant, Mary O'Donoghue, a waitress, was convicted at the Central Criminal Court of the murder of her child, John O'Donoghue, by strangling him. She was sentenced to death, but the sentence was afterwards commuted to one of penal servitude for life.

The child was born on August 19, 1927. On September 21, in the words of a confession made to the police by O'Donoghue, she "put a napkin round the child's neck and twisted it because I had nobody to mind him and no money." At the trial Mr. Justice Talbot held that the child could not be regarded as "newly-born" within the meaning of the Act, and that it was not open to the jury to convict O'Donoghue of infanticide.

Mr. Mitchell Banks, K.C., and Mr. Seuffert appeared for the appellant ; Sir Travers Humphreys for the Crown.

Mr. BANKS said that it should have been left to the jury to say whether or not the child was newly-born within the meaning of the Act. If, however, that question were for the Judge, he should have held that the child was newly-born, and then it would have been for the jury to say whether O'Donoghue had fully recovered from the effect of her confinement, or whether, by reason thereof, the balance of her mind was disturbed. The medical evidence showed that mental disturbance normally continued for six weeks after a confinement. The text-books showed that puerperal insanity and melancholia commonly supervened, not immediately after the birth, but at any time up to six weeks or two months after it.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—When do you say that a child ceases to be newly-born ?

Mr. BANKS replied that obviously there must be limits. He based his argument on the fact that there was no hint in the statute of what the words "newly-born" meant. In Rex v. McConnell, which was tried before Mr. Justice Shearman at Reading Assizes on October 17, 1923, the Judge took the view that the question whether a child aged six weeks was "newly-born" was for the jury. He accordingly left it to them, and the jury found the prisoner guilty of infanticide.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I thought that it was generally known that this statute was meant to meet the case of a woman who took the life of her child either while it was being born or immediately after its birth.

Mr. BANKS said that that might have been the origin of the statute, but the words of section 1 were of wider effect. The words were "fully recovered from the effect of giving birth," and a woman came within the words of the section so long as she was subject to any mental or nervous effect of the birth.

Counsel for the Crown was not called on to argue.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE delivered the judgment of the Court as follows :—The ground of this appeal is that the Judge at the trial was wrong in law in holding that the case could not come within the terms of section 1 (2) of the Infanticide Act, 1922. He held that there was no evidence to go to the jury on which they might be asked to find that the child in this case was a "newly-born child." He did not purport to define the term "newly-born child." He merely ruled that a child who had lived from August 19 until September 21 could not be found to be a newly-born child within the meaning of the section.

The argument which has been urged in criticism of that ruling is that the Infanticide Act, 1922, contemplates an act committed by the mother at a time when she has not fully recovered from the effects of childbirth and in consequence is in a state of mental disturbance ; and that the real question to be considered is not how many days or weeks have elapsed since the birth of the child, but whether the child that has been killed is the child from the effect of whose birth the mother who is accused of its murder has not fully recovered at the time of the child's death.

In our opinion, to read the subsection in that way is to misread it and to eliminate from it the epithet "newly-born." If the statute meant what it is urged on behalf of the appellant that it does mean, the natural way to express that meaning would have been to say : "Where a woman by any wilful act or omission causes the death of her child, but at the time of the act or omission she has not fully recovered from the effect of giving birth to such child and by reason thereof the balance of her mind is then disturbed," the jury may return a verdict of infanticide.

The Act, however, does not say that. Wherever the child is referred to—whether in subsection 1, 2, or 3 of section 1—the expression "newly-born child" is used. In other words, that the conditions prescribed by this section may be fulfilled, there must be at least three co-existing circumstances. The first is that the child in question must be the child of the mother who is charged ; the second is that it must be her newly-born child ; the third is that at the time of her act or omission by which the child died the mother must not have fully recovered from the effect of giving birth to such child and by reason thereof the balance of her mind must then be disturbed. It is crucial that while the first and third conditions are fulfilled the second should also be fulfilled.

We do not propose to undertake the task which does not arise of defining the expression "newly-born child." It is enough for the purpose of the present appeal to say that Mr. Justice Talbot made no error in law in holding, with reference to a child of more than a calendar month in age, that there was no evidence on which he could permit the jury to find that the child was a "newly-born child" within the meaning of the subsection. This appeal, therefore, fails.

The appellant made a statement to the police in which she showed that she was well aware of all the past and existing circumstances of the case. That statement begins by saying : "I have been informed by the police and have been cautioned that I need not say anything about it [i.e., the death of her child], but in spite of that I wish to make a voluntary statement concerning it." At the end of the statement, before her signature, she adds : "This statement has been read over to me and is true." In view of the fact that accused persons frequently deny that they have been cautioned when they have been cautioned, or deny that the statement has been read over to them when it has been so read, we think that no objection can be taken to the practice which was followed in the present case.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P.) } 1927. Nov. 4.

S. v. S. AND P.*

Divorce—Costs—Husband's petition for dissolution of marriage—Wife's admission of birth of child—No allegation by her that petitioner was the father—Denial of adultery with co-respondent—Security for costs.

On a husband's petitioning for divorce on the ground of his wife's alleged adultery with a named co-respondent, the paternity of a child being in dispute, the wife by her answer admitted the birth of the child, and she did not allege that the petitioner was the father, but she denied adultery with the co-respondent. It was urged on behalf of the petitioner that the pleadings showed that the wife had not a good ground for her defence so as to justify an order against her husband to secure her costs. In accordance with an offer made by the petitioner an order was made for security to be given without payment into Court.

On January 15, 1926, the husband filed a petition for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's alleged adultery with a named co-respondent on divers occasions since January, 1923. The petition was amended on December 9, 1926, and further charges were added, and in his particulars the petitioner said that in respect of one charge he would rely upon the fact of the birth of a child to his wife in July, 1926. The respondent by her answer denied the charges of adultery, admitted having given birth to a child in July, 1926, but denied that the co-respondent was the father. The co-respondent by his answer denied the charges. The Registrar on October 19, 1927, made an order that the husband should pay the wife £21 17s. taxed costs up to setting down, and should lodge in Court £30 by way of security for costs of the hearing.

Mr. F. L. C. Hodson, for the husband, said that this was an appeal from the Registrar's order, and it raised a question of principle. It was clear from the pleadings and documents filed in the cause that the respondent was really being made a witness for the co-respondent, who was represented by the solicitors who were acting for her. By inference she had admitted adultery, though not with the co-respondent. Therefore by virtue of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, sections 177 and 178, the petitioner was entitled to relief as against the respondent by way of a decree of divorce.

Lord Merrivale.—Orders for costs in this Division may be very oppressive. Is the petitioner willing to give security for costs ?

Mr. Hodson.—Yes, but not to make a payment into Court.

Mr. H. B. D. Grazebrook, for the respondent, submitted that the answer disclosed a good ground of defence such as justified an order for the usual security for the protection of the respondent's solicitors.

Lord Merrivale.—The authority of the Court to order an aggrieved husband, or a husband alleging himself to be aggrieved, to secure the costs of a wife who is alleged to be guilty, although it is a most valuable power of the Court in the interests of justice, is exceedingly capable of being oppressively used. I do not say that it is being oppressively used in this case, but when I became aware of the circumstances of the case, having in mind what I have said with regard to the possible effects of the jurisdiction, I thought it was desirable that this case should be argued in open Court.

The petitioner alleges adultery of his wife and says that she has given birth to a child whose paternity he denies. That is as far as he can go, in view of the decision some time ago in Russell v. Russell (40 The Times L.R., 713 ; [1924] A.C., 687). It appears now that the wife does not suggest that he is the father. She says that at the hearing of the case she would be ready to inform the Judge who the father is, but she desires, it is said, to defend herself against the charge of adultery with the co-respondent. That may well be so. I do not know, and it is not my business to inquire. The case is a peculiar case. It is not within the class of simple cases out of which the jurisdiction in the Ecclesiastical Courts grew up, and in respect of which the jurisdiction of this Division was intended to be exercised. It is a class of case which arises out of more complex conditions than those to which the jurisdiction of old times and the modern jurisdiction were designed to apply. It has been properly said for the wife, "She is charged with adultery ; she denies adultery with the alleged paramour ; she wishes to defend herself." So be it, but the case is a curious case, and there is something of the nature of a prescriptive right, upon cause shown, to secure to the wife the means of defence.

I propose to do so in this case, knowing as little as I do now about the merits of it, but accepting the offer which was made on behalf of the petitioning husband to give sufficient security for any costs which he may ultimately be ordered to pay. I do not propose to order a payment into Court. A sum in Court is apt to find its way out of Court in some way or other. I propose to order security. The Registrar will fix the proper security and it will be security for such costs as the Judge may order at the trial.

House of Lords.
(Viscount Cave, L.C., Viscount Dunedin, Lord Atkinson, Lord Shaw of Dunfermline, and Lord Carson.)
1927. Nov. 7.

TARN v. SCANLAN. NEILSEN, ANDERSEN, AND CO. v. COLLINS. WILLIAM H. MULLER AND CO. (LONDON), LIMITED v. LETHEM. WILLIAM H. MULLER AND CO. (LONDON), LIMITED v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Excess profits duty—Non-resident—Trade exercised within United Kingdom — Assessability of British agents — Receipts of profits or gains—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict., c. 35), s. 41—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915 (5 and 6 Geo. V., c. 89), s. 31.

The House affirmed three decisions of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax that the several appellants, who acted in this country as agents of foreign shipping companies, were assessable to income-tax on the principal company's profits, and a fourth decision that the appellants in the fourth case were in similar circumstances assessable to excess profits duty.

Decisions of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 704, and [1927] 1 K.B., 780) affirmed.

These appeals (except the last) related to the liability of foreign companies to income-tax in the name of agents resident in the United Kingdom, and the last raised a similar question as regarded excess profits duty. All the appeals were dealt with together by the Lord Chancellor, who sufficiently stated the facts on each appeal. All the appeals were dismissed.

In Tarn v. Scanlan and Neilsen, Andersen and Co. v. Collins (42 The Times L.R., 704) Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Cyril King appeared for the appellants; and the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

In Wm. H. Muller and Co. (London), Limited v. Lethem and Same v. Inland Revenue Commissioners ([1927] 1 K.B., 780) Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Beecroft appeared for the appellants; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Lord Chancellor read the following judgment:—These four appeals raise questions as to the liability of foreign companies to be assessed to income-tax or excess profits duty in the names of certain persons as their agents, and it is convenient to deal with them together.

TARN v. SCANLAN.

In Tarn v. Scanlan the facts, as found by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, are that a Danish shipping company, referred to in the case as Det Forenede, and an English company, referred to as Wilsons, established by agreement between themselves a regular line of steamers between Copenhagen and Hull; that it was a term of the agreement that Wilsons should be the exclusive agents for Det Forenede at Hull during the continuance of the agreement; and that Wilsons, besides acting as forwarding agents for English consignors of goods to be forwarded from Hull to Copenhagen, controlled the freight at this end, quoted rates of freight to the consignors, arranged room on the steamers (either their own or Det Forenede's), and employed stevedores to put the goods on board. No written contract was usually entered into before the signature of the bill of lading, but the bill of lading was signed "for the master" by one of Wilsons' clerks. Wilsons collected the freight for outward-bound goods and any other moneys due from the consignors, and remitted what was due to Det Forenede.

On these facts the questions arising were—(1) whether during the years in question (the tax years 1913 to 1916) Det Forenede exercised a trade within the United Kingdom so as to be chargeable under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts with tax on the profits and gains of such trade; and (2) whether they were so chargeable in the name of Wilsons, who are represented by the appellant Tarn. Mr. Justice Rowlatt and the Court of Appeal have answered both questions in the affirmative, and Tarn appeals to this House. There is no question as to the amounts of the assessments.

As to the first question, I feel no doubt that Det Forenede did carry on a trade here to the extent to which goods were taken on board their ships at Hull for carriage elsewhere. It might be enough to say that the Special Commissioners have so found, and that there was ample material on which they could base that finding. But it may be added that, in my opinion, according to the tests laid down in Erichsen v. Last (8 Q.B.D., 414), and in later cases, including several decisions in this House, they could hardly have arrived at any other conclusion.

The second question depends, as to the first three tax-years involved (namely, the years 1912-1913, 1913-1914, and 1914-1915), on the effect to be given to section 41 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, and as to the fourth tax-year (namely, 1915-1916) on the construction of that section as modified by section 31 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915.

Section 41 of the Act of 1842 provides that any person not resident in Great Britain, whether a British subject or not, shall be chargeable with tax in the name of "any factor agent or receiver having the receipt of any profits or gains arising as herein mentioned and belonging to such person in the like manner and to the like amount as would be charged if such person were resident in Great Britain and in the actual receipt thereof" :

and the agent so described is made answerable for the tax and is authorized (by section 44 of the Act) to retain the amount out of moneys coming to his hands.

Upon these sections it is argued on behalf of the appellant that the agent so to be made liable must be an agent actually carrying on the business in respect of which the charge arises and entering into the contracts incident to such business, and that Wilsons, although they performed certain services in connexion with the business of Det Forenede at Hull, did not actually carry on that business and enter into the contracts. For myself I should be prepared to follow the opinion expressed by Lord Herschell in Grainger v. Gough (12 The Times L.R., 364 ; [1896] A.C., 325, at p. 337) and concurred in by Lord Macnaghten in the same case, and to hold that persons who were agents for some purpose connected with a trader's business and who received the gross proceeds (in which the net proceeds are included) were agents in whose name the trader could be assessed under section 41. But the question hardly arises in the present case ; for, on the facts found by the Special Commissioners, Wilsons were the exclusive agents for Det Forenede at Hull, quoted freights, accepted consignments of goods, and put them on board the steamers of Det Forenede, and I think it clear that they actually carried on the business and entered into the contracts for the carriage of the goods, even though the bills of lading were signed by their clerk for the master of the vessel. In my opinion, Det Forenede were chargeable with tax in their name.

As regards the tax year 1915-1916, section 41 of the Act of 1842 is extended by section 31 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, so as to make a non-resident person chargeable to income-tax in the name of his agent, although the agent may not have the receipt of the profits and gains of the non-resident ; and the section provides (by subsection (2)) that a non-resident person shall be chargeable in respect of any profits or gains arising, whether directly or indirectly, through, or from, any agency, and shall be so chargeable in the name of the agent ; and (by subsection (6)) that nothing in section 41 of the Act of 1842, as amended, shall render a non-resident person chargeable in the name of a broker or general commission agent, or in the name of an agent not being an authorized person carrying on the non-resident's regular agency in respect of profits or gains arising from sales or transactions carried out through such a broker or agent. This section is not a chargeable section, but it modifies the machinery by which a non-resident person carrying on a business here may be reached by enabling the Revenue authorities to assess and charge him in the name of an authorized person carrying on his regular agency, even though such agent may not have the receipt of the profits or gains of the non-resident. To this section, therefore, Lord Herschell's opinion above referred to does not apply, and the only question to be determined is whether Wilsons were authorized persons carrying on the regular agency of Det Forenede. The Special Commissioners held that they were, and upon the facts which they found I see no reason for questioning their decision. On this point, as on the other, I agree entirely with the opinion of Mr. Justice Rowlatt and the Court of Appeal, and I think that the appeal fails.

Both Mr. Justice Rowlatt and Lord Justice Scrutton commented severely on the delay which had occurred between the date in the year 1919, when the case first came before the Commissioners for Special Purposes, and the date in 1926 when it was brought before Mr. Justice Rowlatt for decision ; and no doubt the dates are startling. Neither Mr. Justice Rowlatt nor Lord Justice Scrutton pronounced any opinion as to who was to blame for the delay ; but they said, and said truly, that there must be something wrong in a system under which it took so long to settle the amount of a tax payable to the State. On these comments being brought to my notice I made some inquiries, with results which justify the hope that the procedure will henceforth be expedited. Mr. Justice Rowlatt, with the sanction of the Lord Chief Justice, has directed that "points of argument," which it has for some time been the practice to exchange in these cases and which in some instances have caused delay, need no longer be delivered ; and also that a case may be set down, not by the appellant only, but by either party. With the assistance of these directions, and with greater insistence by the Special Commissioners on the need for expedition, it may be that delay such as that which aroused comment in this case will henceforth be avoided.

NEILSEN, ANDERSEN, AND CO. v. COLLINS.

In Neilsen, Andersen, and Co. v. Collins the facts found by the Special Commissioners are very similar to those found in Tarn v. Scanlan. Det Forenede have a line of steamers running between Copenhagen and Newcastle, and the appellants, Neilsen, Andersen, and Co., are their agents at Newcastle, accept goods for carriage from that port to Copenhagen, put them on board the ships of Det Forenede, collect the outward freights, and remit them to the company. In this case, as in the other, no written contract is entered into before the bill of lading, but a clerk in the employ of the appellants, who is lent to the master of the ship for that purpose, prepares the manifest and signs the bill of lading for the master. The years for which the assessments in this case were made were the years ending April 5, 1914, 1915, and 1916.

In my opinion, the considerations which apply to the appeal in Tarn v. Scanlan apply equally to this appeal, and this appeal also must fail.

In the course of the argument attention was drawn to the circumstance that in respect of each of the years in question the Special Commissioners had made an allowance for wear and tear equal to the assessment in respect of profits, with the result that no tax was payable by the appellants, and there appeared to be no material basis for an appeal. The explanation of counsel for the appellants was that, if no appeal had been lodged, they would have been bound as regards future assessments by the findings of the Special Commissioners in the present case. I am not satisfied that this would be so ; but, as the appeal fails, it is unnecessary to pursue the point.

WILLIAM H. MULLER AND CO. (LONDON), LIMITED v. LETHEM.

The facts of this case differ in one respect from those found in the two cases above referred to.

Two Dutch steamship companies, which are referred to in the case as the Nederland Steamboat Company and the General Shipping Company, were the owners of four steamships known as the Batavier Line and trading regularly between Rotterdam and London. The firm of W. H. Muller and Co., of Rotterdam (referred to as "the Dutch firm"), were the directors of the Nederland Steamboat Company and had the management and control of that company under the supervision of a board, and they were also the shipping agents of the company. The Dutch firm were also the directors of the General Shipping Company, with like powers; and by a deed dated June 29, 1899, they were appointed exclusive shipping agents for that company and were authorized to appoint sub-agents when they might deem it necessary, subject to the approval of the company. In the year 1904 the Dutch firm appointed the appellants, W. H. Muller and Co. (London), Limited (referred to as "the London firm"), to be "agents in London for the Batavier Line"; and since that time the London company have (as the Special Commissioners found) done everything that was required to be done in connexion with the ships of the Batavier Line in London—booking passages, accepting goods and putting them on board, and collecting the freights on goods shipped c.i.f. In this case, too, the bills of lading were signed for the master by one of the clerks of the London company. The assessments appealed against are for the years ending April 5, 1916 and 1917.

Upon these facts there can be no doubt that the two Dutch shipping companies carried on business in London; and the only question is whether the London firm were, within the meaning of section 31 (6) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, authorized persons carrying on the non-residents' regular agency. The contention put forward on behalf of the appellants was that the Dutch company in appointing the appellants agents in London for the Batavier Line made them the agents not of the Dutch shipping companies but of the Dutch firm itself, to which alone they were accountable; and that the London firm, in conducting the business of the line in London, have acted not for the shipping companies but for the Dutch firm as their principals, and have never been agents of the shipping companies. I cannot accept this contention.

The Dutch firm, by their letter of July 4, 1904, appointed the London company "agents in London for the Batavier Line," signing the letter "W. H. Muller and Co., Batavier Line"; and in the subsequent agreement dated March 6, 1916, the Dutch firm treated themselves as owners of the line, and appointed the London firm

"sole agents for the owners in London in respect of the Batavier Line for the transaction of the shipping business of the said line carried on at Custom House and Wool Quays, Lower Thames-street, in the said city, and in particular for the fixing of rates of freight, the embarkation and disembarkation of passengers, and the carriage of passengers and cargo and other business usually carried on by a line of steamships."

I am disposed to think that in signing both these documents the Dutch firm were acting as directors of the shipping companies, and in that capacity appointed the London firm as direct agents of those companies; but even if that be not so, and if the appointments must be held to have been made by the Dutch firm as shipping agents for the Dutch companies and not as directors—still it appears to me that they constituted the London firm direct agents of the two companies. In this connexion reference may be made to the well-known judgment of Lord Justice Thesiger, in De Bussche v. Alt (8 Ch.D., 286, at p. 310), where he pointed out that in certain cases, where the exigencies of business require it, an agent must be deemed to have authority to constitute a direct privity of contract between a substitute appointed by him and his principals. In my opinion, the present case falls within that category, and the appellants were appointed and became the authorized and regular agents of the two Dutch companies in London.

WILLIAM H. MULLER AND CO. (LONDON), LIMITED v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.

The appeal in William Muller and Co. (London), Limited v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue related to the liability of the appellants for excess profits duty in respect of the profits of the business carried on by the two Dutch companies in London. It was admitted that the result of this appeal must follow the result of the appeal in William H. Muller and Co. (London), Limited v. Lethem.

For the above reasons I am of opinion that these appeals fail, and should be severally dismissed, with costs.

The LORD CHANCELLOR stated that LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE concurred in his judgment.

TARN v. SCANLAN. NEILSEN, ANDERSEN, AND CO. v. COLLINS.

VISCOUNT DUNEDIN.—My Lords, I concur. These two cases, which for practical purposes I consider indistinguishable, are, in my opinion, so far as the first question is concerned—i.e., whether there is a business carried on in the United Kingdom—clearly determined by authority. The case of Erichsen v. Last (8 Q.B.D., 414) is not per se binding on this House, but it is practically so. For not only was it approved by Lord Herschell in Grainger's case (12 The Times L.R., 364; [1896] A.C., 325), but in the subsequent and recent case of Maclaine and Co. v. Eccott (42 The Times L.R., 416; [1926] A.C., 424), both the Lord Chancellor (in whose judgment Lord Atkinson and Lord Sumner concurred) and Lord Shaw explicitly adopted Erichsen v. Last (supra) as good law. In applying the law of that case to the facts of this, I agree entirely with the Master of the Rolls, who says: "It appears to me that there was a business, the business of securing freights for their ships, which was carried on in this country."

Then the question whether the tax was rightly levied on the appellants as agents under section 41 of the Act of 1842 is a pure question of fact. The point urged by the learned counsel was that the contract of carriage was really effected by the bills of lading which were made out by the master and not by the appellants. I quote again from the Master of the Rolls, who, I think, correctly states the result of the evidence: "The appellants in both these cases were acting as agents for the foreign company for the purpose of entering into contracts and securing business for the foreign company, the business of filling their vessels with goods and then securing freight to be paid to the shipping company." That is the substance of the transaction, and I do not think it matters if the bills of lading were actually signed by the master, though as a matter of fact they were signed for the master by a clerk lent by the appellants. For the real contract out of which the profits arise is the contract made by the appellants with the person who sends the goods, and that is made on behalf of the shipping company and not by the appellants as principals. The result is that in so far as they received freights out of which profits are earned, they are accountable during the earlier years; and then so far as the year after the Act of 1915 is concerned they do not escape, because they are the regular agents and therefore fall within the rider on the exception provided by section 31 (6) of that Act.

With regard to the other two appeals, I agree with the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

WILLIAM H. MULLER AND CO. (LONDON), LIMITED v. LETHEM. WILLIAM H. MULLER AND CO. (LONDON), LIMITED v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.

LORD ATKINSON, read by LORD CARSON.—My Lords: The facts have been fully stated already. Three companies are involved in this litigation. The first, an English company, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, under the name of Wm. H. Muller and Co. (London), Limited, of 32, Bury-street, London, E.C. The business of this company is found to be:—

"(A) To carry on the business of merchants, shipowners, shipbrokers, insurance brokers, underwriters, managers of shipping property, freight contractors, carriers by land or sea, forwarding agents, commission agents, colonial and produce brokers, corn factors, ore and metal brokers and dealers and any other business which usually is or conveniently can be carried on in conjunction with any of these businesses.

"(B) To do all or any of the matters aforesaid, alone or in conjunction with, or as agents for, foreign firms, companies or persons, and generally for other companies and persons, and to establish, regulate and discontinue agencies for the purposes of the company."

The second is a Dutch company established in Rotterdam in the year 1896, and, for convenience sake, named the Nederland Steamboat Company. Its business is found to be to run a freight and passenger service between Rotterdam and London with the right to run insurance risk on its own vessels and on goods shipped on those vessels. Article 10 of its statutes provided for management of the company by a director under the control of its board, which consisted of not less than three or more than nine members. This director is given the management and control of the company, which he represents "in law and outside the law."

The third company is W. H. Muller and Co.'s Algemeene Scheepvaart-Maatschappij, for convenience styled the General Shipping Company. It is a Dutch company established and incorporated at Rotterdam in the year 1899 for the following purposes, namely, to carry on:—

"(A) A shipowning business; and

"(B) The ownership of shares in companies carrying on shipowners' business.

"(C) The purchasing, building, launching, equipping, managing, chartering, re-chartering, engaging and selling of sea and river craft;

"(D) Transport of passengers, goods and cattle, the establishment of new, the purchase of existing, and the management of places for the building, docking and repairing of, vessels and machinery for the loading and discharging of vessels or for the storage of goods;

"(E) The insurance of all sorts of risks."

By Article 9 of the articles of this company it is provided that the company is to be managed by a director under the control of the company's board, and this director is to represent the company in law and outside the law.

The most intimate relations appear to bind together these three companies. For instance, a preponderating interest in the share capital of the London company was vested in a Mr. Kroller, a Dutchman who was a partner in a registered partnership named W. H. Muller and Co., Rotterdam, having its head office at The Hague, and referred to as the Dutch firm. All the ordinary shares in this Dutch firm were held by this same Mr. Kroller, together with his wife and his brother. But the 6 per cent. preference shares in this firm were held by outsiders.

By the 9th and 10th Articles of this company it is provided that the company is to be managed by a director, under the control of the board, and this director, it is provided, was to represent the company in law and outside the law. By its 41st Article it is provided that the Dutch firm was nominated as the first director of the General Shipping Company, and that the four Dutch gentlemen mentioned were to be nominated as its board. By a deed dated the 29th June, 1899, styled a constitution deed, it is recorded that the Dutch firm had contributed considerable assets, mentioned in detail in the deed, to the General Shipping Company on the following, amongst other, conditions:—

"(1) That the Dutch firm should act as exclusive shipping agents and exclusive cargo superintendents of the company both in Rotterdam and in those places where the Dutch firm was or might thereafter be established or represented by agents.

"(2) That the Dutch firm should, subject to the approval of the company, appoint sub-agents wherever the firm might deem this necessary.

"(3) That the Dutch firm should have the right to charge for its services referred to in Article 1 as shipping agents a commission of 4 per cent. on the gross amounts of freights and passages for cargo and passengers dealt with by them—none excepted—and might, moreover, in cases where the firm acted at the same time as cargo superintendents on behalf of the company, charge for its services as such a further commission of 1 per cent. besides the usual discharging and unloading charges in accordance with the tariff then in force of the Rotterdam Cargo Superintendents whether they are paid separately by the consignees and the shippers or included, or to be included, in the freights. By minute of general meeting dated 29th June, 1899, the salary of the manager was fixed at 3,000 florins per annum.

"The commission payable under this deed was in addition to the commission payable to the Dutch firm as directors."

The Nederland Steamboat Company—i.e., Company No. 2—owned two vessels, named "Batavier 2" and "Batavier 3," and the General Shipping Company owned two vessels, "Batavier 4" and "Batavier 5." During the years to which the assessment of income-tax relates these four vessels, and those vessels alone, constituted the Batavier Line. The evidence and the authorities have been fully dealt with both before Mr. Justice Rowlatt and in the Court of Appeal. It is unnecessary for me to analyse the evidence again or deal with the authorities again. It is sufficient, I think, for me to express the opinion which I entertain: that it is absolutely hopeless to contend that these two companies Nos. 2 and 3 did not by means of their four vessels carry on in England a trade or business of the nature found in the case. As neither of these companies was resident in England they must necessarily have carried on this business through a body or a person or persons resident in England acting on their behalf in the conduct of their business as their agent or agents.

These two companies, being fully alive to the necessity in this respect which their enterprise imposed upon them, wrote to the English company—i.e., Company No. 1—a letter the details of which make it doubly significant:—

"Rotterdam,
"4th July, 1904.
"Messrs. Wm. H. Muller and Co. (London), Limited.
"Bury-street, London, E.C.

"Dear Sirs,—In respect of your having taken over the business hitherto carried on by the Nederland Steamboat Company, at Custom House and Wool Quays, we herewith confirm that we appoint you agents in London for our Batavier Line, and as such you will have to follow our instructions in all matters concerning this line, and especially as to the fixing of any rates of freight, &c., nor will you fix any rates for wharfage, cartage, rent, &c., for the carriage of our goods without our approval. Your remuneration for the agency will be as follows :—

Reporting inward and clearing outward £1 1s. 0d.
Customs Manifest 10s. 6d.
B/L Postage 2s. 6d.
Telegram and Letters 12s.
Stevedore's Charges 1d. per ton outwards.
Quay Charges £10 per steamer.
Embarking and disembarking over wharf passengers.
Bicycles if passenger's luggage 6d. each.

Moreover, we shall have to refund to you the following paid out charges :—

Tonnage Dues.
River Pilotage.
Mooring and Unmooring.
Shifting.
Waterman's Attendance.
Customs Overtime.
Landing Customs Officers at Gravesend.
Pilot Calling.
Noting Protest.
Water Supplied.

"Please let us have an acknowledgment of the present.

"Yours truly,
"W. H. MULLER and CO.
"(Batavier Lijn)."

On the 6th July, 1904, the London company acknowledged the receipt of this letter, as requested, and on the 7th July, next day, the Dutch firm wrote to W. H. Muller and Co. (London), Limited, a letter which runs as follows :—

"In reply to your favour of yesterday we beg to inform you that we can only allow you as agents 4d. per passenger in and outward when passing over the wharf. That is what we understand from Mr. Kroller that he allows under this heading to the wharf.

"We agree with 2½ per cent. commission on freight and passengers inwards and 5 per cent. commission on freight and passengers outwards.

HALF LIGHTERAGE ON HORSES OUTWARDS FROM LONDON.

"The undersigned talked this matter over with Mr. Chambers and it was fully agreed that the lighterage of horses shall be taken as included in the wharfage, this lighterage being an extension of the wharf. This is necessary by the conference under which we are compelled to charge per horse 20s. sea freight and 3s. 6d. wharfage, and if we do anything not included herein we have to charge this separately to the customers. In this case the charge for lighterage would be prohibitive for the knacker trade.

Yours faithfully,
"WM. H. MULLER and CO. (Batavier Lijn),
"(Signed) N. Van de Roemer."

It is plain upon the face of this letter that the Dutch firm treated the London company as the agents of the Batavier Line to manage its London business. There is nothing about a sub-agency.

It is found at p. 7 of the case stated that:—

"10.—The London company are the lessees of the Custom House and Wool Quays Wharf in London, to and from which the four above-mentioned vessels of the Nederland Steamboat Company and the General Shipping Company regularly sail. The name 'Batavier Line' is exhibited outside the office of the London company, their telegraphic address is 'Batavier, Bilgate, London,' and the London Postal Directory contains an entry 'Batavier Line, W. H. Muller and Co., Limited, Office, London Wharf, Wool Quay.' Advertisements of the service carried on by the Batavier Line are inserted in the Press and paid for by the London company, the charges being refunded by the Dutch firm."

On the next page (p. 8) the methods followed in the conduct of their business connected with the vessels constituting the Batavier Line are described in great detail, and at p. 9 it is found that the London company did everything that was required to be done in connexion with the ships in London, obtaining instruction when necessary from the Dutch firm. The London company had no direct communication with either the Nederland Steamboat Company or the General Shipping Company except through the Dutch firm.

It is easy to dub an agent with the name of a sub-agent, but the real position, power, and authority of the man thus dealt with must be determined by his action : What authority he, with the approval of his principal, exercised ; what he did ; what were the nature and reach of his work. The London company was appointed by the Batavier Line to be its, and to act as its, agent to transact in England the business of the line that required to be there transacted. The idea that the Dutch firm, which did not reside in England, should be held to be the agent to transact in England the English business of its non-resident principal, the Batavier Line, is a rather absurd idea, as it would appear to me, and is altogether inconsistent with the terms of the letter appointing the London company as agents, and the evidence in the case. I think, therefore, that the London company is liable to be assessed for the income-tax sought to be recovered as the agent of the Batavier Line who transacted their business in England, and that the appeal fails, and should be dismissed.

As regards the two other appeals I concur.

LORD CARSON.—My Lords : I agree with the judgment delivered by the Lord Chancellor, and I only desire to say that in the case of Muller I felt some difficulty during the argument as to whether the appellants were the "agents" of the General Shipping Company within section 41 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, or section 31 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915. It is very necessary where personal liability to taxation is imposed upon an agent in respect of business carried on for his principal not to extend such liability beyond the exact terms of the Act of Parliament, and I was impressed by the argument that there was no privity of contract between the appellants and the General Shipping Company. Upon consideration, however, I am of opinion that the question whether the tax was rightly levied upon the appellants as "agents" under section 41 is one of fact. In the present case, under the deed of June 29, 1899, authority is reserved to the Dutch firm "subject to the approval of the company" (i.e., the General Shipping Company) "to appoint sub-agents whenever they might deem this necessary," and I think the Special Commissioners were justified in finding that the appointment of the appellants carried with it the knowledge and approval of the company. There is, therefore, evidence to support the finding of the Special Commissioners that the General Shipping Company carried on a trade in the United Kingdom through the appellants as their agents or managers.

Court of Appeal.

1927. Nov. 11.

IN RE HARRINGTON MOTOR COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Companies — Winding-up—Insurance of company against claims—Judgment against company — Subsequent liquidation—Payment by insurers to liquidator—Whether amount payable to judgment creditor — Availability for general creditors.

The applicant obtained judgment against a limited company for damages for personal injuries and costs. Afterwards the company went into liquidation, and the insurance company with which the company in liquidation was insured paid the amount of the damages and costs to the liquidator.

Held, that the applicant was not entitled to have the amount in question paid to him by the liquidator, but it formed part of the assets for distribution among the general creditors, including the applicant.

Decision of Eve, J. (43 The Times L.R., 684), affirmed.

This was an appeal by Mr. Walter Chaplin, of Galleywood, Chelmsford, from a decision of Mr. Justice Eve (43 The Times L.R., 684), on a summons taken out in the liquidation of the Harrington Motor Company, Limited. Mr. Chaplin had recovered £324 damages for personal injuries against the company in an action in the King's Bench Division. He asked for a declaration that that sum, together with the costs—£273—did not form part of the assets of the company available for distribution among its general creditors. The damages which the applicant had recovered had been paid over by the insurance company in which the motor company was insured to the liquidator of the motor company, and the applicant claimed that the whole of that money should be paid to him personally.

Mr. Justice Eve dismissed the application. Mr. Chaplin appealed.

Mr. W. N. Stable appeared for the appellant ; Mr. H. C. Bischoff for the respondent, the liquidator.

Mr. Stable contended that the appellant had an equity entitling him to be paid the money which was paid to the motor company for him. That was established by the principle laid down in Ex parte James (L.R., 9 Ch., 609). On that principle the liquidator would not be allowed to take money which was in fact the property of the appellant. Counsel relied upon In re Richardson ([1911] 2 K.B., 705) as showing that a sum of money in the hands of a trustee in bankruptcy or of a liquidator was not necessarily part of the assets if there were any creditor with an equitable claim against it. The cases of British Union and National Insurance Company, Limited v. Rawson (32 The Times L.R., 665 ; [1916] 2 Ch., 476) ; In re Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 616 ; [1914] 2 Ch., 617) ; In re Thellusson—Ex parte Abdy (35 The Times L.R., 732 ; [1919] 2 K.B., 735) ; and other cases were cited.

Mr. Bischoff was not called upon to argue.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that it was quite clear that most people would think, as a matter of common sense, that Mr. Chaplin should have a right to recover the money paid by the insurance company in respect of the defendants' liability. Yet in spite of the resourceful, able, and helpful argument of Mr. Stable, the Court must dismiss the appeal. When one considered the law as it stood, and when one looked at the question whether Mr. Chaplin had a right to say to the liquidator, "This is my money," it was impossible not to see that that view was untenable.

In the ordinary way, a bankruptcy or winding-up order barred any action by a creditor, and his only remedy was by proving in the bankruptcy or winding-up. Here it was contended that this debt was not the proper subject of a proof in the winding-up, but the question would then arise whether Mr. Chaplin had any right over against the insurance company. In In re Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society, Limited, Mr. Justice Scrutton (as he then was) said (30 The Times L.R., 616 ; [1914] 2 Ch., at p. 647) :—

"There is, however, no direct privity between the debenture-holder or principal debtor, Sands, Wilson, and Co., on the one hand, and the insurance company on the other. The debenture-holder cannot sue the insurance company direct. . . . I am not aware of any way in which an original assured can get at a re-insurer ; his rights are only against the original insurer, the re-insured."

So, in the present case, Mr. Chaplin had a right to prove in the winding-up, but the insurance money belonged to the liquidator. It was not really correct to say that that money was due as a result of the action by Mr. Chaplin, and was therefore his money. It might be said, in a sense, to exist because he had suffered an accident, but the real reason why it came into being was because during a period of time a contract had existed between the defendants and the insurance company. And the defendants had paid their own money to the insurance company so that, in certain eventualities, money should be paid to them. It did not seem possible to establish any privity of contract between the creditor, Mr. Chaplin, and the insurance company. On the contrary, there seemed to be a complete break in the chain sought to be established between them in order to enable Mr. Chaplin to claim that the payment made by the company was really a payment to him.

In section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, there was a provision that where an employer had entered into a contract with insurers, and he subsequently went bankrupt, an injured workman, entitled to compensation, could stand in the shoes of the employer and recover his money direct from the insurance company. That showed that the difficulty attending Mr. Chaplin's claim had, as regarded the case of an injured workman, been considered by the Legislature, and a special provision had been inserted in the Act to deal with it. The appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Justice Atkin said that he thought that the appellant had a real grievance ; but the general rule of law was too strong to allow the Court to make any exception, however the Court might sympathise with the appellant. The position in law was quite clear, and it was that the appellant had no right or claim against the insurance company, or against money paid by the insurance company. The assured had a direct right of recourse against the insurance company, but a third party had no such right, because there was no privity between him and the insurance company, and it was difficult to see how a special right could be said to exist against the insurance company, or any right to claim money paid over by the insurance company, merely because the assured happened to be in financial difficulties. In In re Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 616 ; [1914] 2 Ch., 617, at p. 633), Lord Justice Buckley said : "The equitable doctrine is that the party to be indemnified can call upon the party bound to indemnify him specifically to perform his obligation, and to pay him the full amount which the creditor is entitled to receive, and that whether having received it he applies it in payment of that creditor or not is a matter with which the party giving the indemnity is not concerned. In such a case the party indemnified is entitled to receive 20s. in the £, and, having got it, to deal with it as he thinks proper." Later, referring to Carr v. Roberts (5 B. and Ad., 78), he added : "Both Mr. Justice Littledale and Mr. Justice Patteson at the conclusion of their judgments point out that it is the duty of the defendant to pay the whole amount, and it makes no difference whether it is applied in discharge of the debt, or whether the plaintiff, having recovered it, does not make a proper use of it. . . ." In the same case, Lord Justice Kennedy said (supra, at p. 639) : "How the person who receives payment of a sum of money under a contract of insurance or re-insurance, or, I will add, of indemnity, deals with that sum is, in general and apart from special considerations, no concern of the party who, in fulfilment of his contract, has made the payment to him. Upon what grounds of equity or legal logic can it be argued that, because the law, on grounds of public policy, compels the creditor, the liability to whom is the event upon which the right of a bankrupt or of an insolvent company to payment of the sum covered by the contract arises, to be content with such share of the assets of the bankrupt or the company in liquidation as a pari passu distribution between creditors will give, these assets are not to include the payment due under the contract ? " It seemed, therefore, that the third party was compelled by law to be content with that share of the assets to which, according to the amount of his debt, he was legally entitled.

Mr. Stable had argued that the appellant should, at any rate, have a preference in regard to the amount paid in respect of costs, because, he suggested, that was an asset "created" by the appellant in bringing the action. That seemed to him (the Lord Justice) a fallacy. Costs were an incident of litigation, but it could not be said that the sum paid over was "created" by the incurring of certain costs.

The appeal must be dismissed, the law being perhaps on the whole in an unsatisfactory state on the matter.

Lord Justice Lawrence said that, like the other members of the Court, he sympathised with the appellant, but it was impossible to allow the appeal. What the appellant was doing was to claim the benefit of a contract of insurance which had been made between his debtors and an insurance company, but with which the appellant really had nothing to do. It was not suggested that that contract was in any way assigned to him, and it was difficult to see how he could claim that the insolvency of the debtors gave him any special rights or interest in that special fund, to which by contract the debtors were entitled. The appellant had based his case almost entirely on In re Richardson ([1911] 2 K.B., 705). He (the Lord Justice) found it rather hard to follow the principles laid down in In re Richardson (supra), but he thought that they did not seriously question the general principle that a man could not claim an interest in a contract to which he was not a party.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. YORKSHIRE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.*

Revenue — Income-tax—Charity—Exemption—Agricultural society—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 37 (1) (b).

The appellants, an agricultural society, founded mainly for the purpose of promoting and holding an annual agricultural show, had also among their objects the improvement of live stock and poultry and of machinery and appliances used in agriculture, and agricultural education and scientific research, and they claimed exemption from income-tax upon the dividends from their investments on the ground that they were a society established for charitable purposes only. The Special Commissioners found that the society was established for charitable purposes only, and they held that the claim should be allowed.

Held, that there was evidence on which the Special Commissioners could so find, and their decision must be affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt, who, in reversing a decision of the Special Commissioners, held that the Yorkshire Agricultural Society was not entitled to claim as being a charity exemption from income-tax on the income and dividends of its invested funds for the year ending April 5, 1923.

The society was founded at York in 1837 mainly for the purpose of promoting and holding an annual agricultural show. At present the principal objects of the society, besides the holding of the show, were the improvement of live stock and poultry, of machinery and appliances used in agriculture, and agricultural education and scientific research.

The minimum annual subscription was £1, and there were at present over 3,000 members. A member, as such, was entitled to free admission to the annual show, to reserved tickets at reduced rates, to reduced fees on exhibits sent in by him, and to certain other minor privileges, both in connexion with the annual show and otherwise. There was no provision for the disposal of the funds of the society in the improbable event of its being wound up. The income of the society was derived from entry fees and gate receipts, local subscriptions for prizes, interest on investments, and subscriptions of members. Any excess of income over expenditure, which excess in 1923 amounted to £2,131, was invested, and, in the event of the show resulting in a loss, the loss was met by a sale of investments.

The society contended that it was established for charitable purposes only, and claimed exemption from income-tax in respect of the income from its investments for the year ending April 5, 1923.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue contended, (1) that the advancement of agriculture was not a charitable purpose only; (2) that the society was established for the benefit of its members and not for the benefit of agriculture generally; (3) that in any event one of its objects, added in 1923—namely, watching and advising on legislation affecting the agricultural industry—was not a charitable object; (4) that the society's funds were not established by a trust of a permanent character; and (5) that the society was not established for charitable purposes only, and that the claim for exemption from income-tax ought to be refused.

The Special Commissioners found, with some doubt in view of the wide nature of the stated objects of the society, that the society was established for charitable purposes only, and held that its claim for exemption should be allowed.

The Crown having appealed, Mr. Justice Rowlatt reversed that decision, mainly on the ground that the objects of the society were partly objects for the benefit of the members only.

The society appealed.

Mr. Gavin Simmonds, K.C., and Mr. Raymond Needham appeared for the appellants; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), Mr. J. H. Stamp, and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that the claim to exemption arose under section 37 (1) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, granting exemption from tax under Schedule D "in respect of any yearly interest or other annual payment forming part of the income of any body of persons or trust established for charitable purpose only . . . and so far as the same are applied to charitable purposes only."

It was important to summarize the facts of the case. The society was formed at a meeting at York held on October 10, 1837, and the first resolution passed at that meeting was "That a society be formed called 'The Yorkshire Agricultural Society,' the object of which shall be to hold an annual meeting for the exhibition of farming stock, implements, &c., and for the general promotion of agriculture." By rule 12 it was declared that no subject connected with any legislative enactment should be introduced into the proceedings of the society. All prizes were to be open to competition in the United Kingdom. Incidentally, there were, and had always been, certain privileges attaching to membership of the society, shortly speaking, free admission to the show, reduced prices for reserved seats, reduced rates for exhibits, and the benefit of any special railway facilities that might be in force. He thought that Mr. Justice Rowlatt was quite right in disregarding these privileges as not assisting one way or the other in arriving at his conclusion. Subscribers to other charities, such as hospitals, generally enjoyed privileges, such as that of introducing patients.

In 1923 the society annulled rule 12, and adopted as one of its objects "watching and advising on legislation affecting the agricultural industry." Mr. Justice Rowlatt had also rightly set that aside. It would be fair to describe the society as being one for the promotion of agriculture generally in the ways specified in its objects.

It was said, however, that certain privileges were granted to temporary members, who only joined for the year. That also might be set aside, as it did not alter the general nature and purpose of the society as a whole. To make out its claim for exemption the society must show that it was a body of persons established for charitable purposes only. The definition of "charity" always referred to as authoritative was that of Lord Macnaghten in Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax v. Pemsel (7 The Times L.R., 657; [1891] A.C., 531, at p. 583), where he said:—

"'Charity' in its legal sense comprises four principal divisions: trusts for the relief of poverty; trusts for the advancement of education; trusts for the advancement of religion; and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community, not falling under any of the preceding heads."

The fourth division was of a somewhat wide and indefinite nature. What was a "purpose beneficial to the community"? Examples of what had been held to be charities included the activities of an anti-vivisection society (In re Foveaux—Cross v. London Anti-Vivisection Society, 11 The Times L.R., 540; [1895] 2 Ch., 501). On the other hand, it had been held that where the purpose of an association was for the benefit of the members themselves only, it was not a purpose for the general benefit of the community, as in the case of a friendly society (In re Clark's Trust, 1 Ch. D., 497); or a headmasters' conference (Rex v. Special Commissioners of Income Tax—Ex parte Headmasters' Conference, 41 The Times L.R., 651).

If the society were formed for the general benefit of agriculture, it would, said Mr. Justice Rowlatt, be one for the general benefit of the community.

He thought that the society had been formed for the general improvement of agriculture, and not merely for the special benefit of its members in the county where it was established. It was, therefore, a society for the general benefit of the community. That conclusion having been reached, the next question was whether it had been established for charitable purposes only. No taint affecting the main purpose arose from the criticism that members enjoyed special privileges. The society, as Mr. Justice Rowlatt had held, was an established body of persons. It had existed for three generations, and there was no want of the element of permanency in its fine record of activity. Illustrations of cases where societies had failed in part to show that their objects were really charitable were Morice v. Bishop of Durham (10 Vesey, Jun., 522) and Attorney-General v. National Provincial and Union Bank of England (40 The Times L.R., 191; [1924] A.C., 262).

For these reasons he (the Master of the Rolls) thought that the society was originally established, and had continued to be, a society for the general promotion of agriculture; and agriculture could be, and in this case was, a charitable purpose.

The Income Tax Act, 1918, section 37 (1) (b), clearly contemplated persons who were not incorporated or connected by the bond of a trust deed. Section 237 defined a body of persons as meaning any body politic, corporate, or collegiate, and any company, fraternity, fellowship, and society of persons whether corporate or not corporate. The definition was, therefore, intended to embrace a mobile or shifting body not exactly defined by a trust deed. It was obvious that the facts in each case must be the basis on which one found whether there was a body established, and whether that body was established for a charitable purpose. A question of degree was a question of fact. This Court could not upset a finding of fact arrived at by the Special Commissioners, if there was evidence to support it, and there was evidence in this case upon which they could find that the society was established for charitable purposes only. Mr. Justice Rowlatt had set aside that finding of fact, and had come to the conclusion that the society was mainly intended to promote the taste and pleasure of the members for the time associated together. But that view was not taken by the Special Commissioners, and he (the Master of the Rolls) agreed with their finding.

In Royal Agricultural Society of England v. Wilson (40 The Times L.R., 763) the profits of the society's annual show were held assessable to income-tax because, in holding a show, the society was engaged in carrying on a trade. The effect of that decision was altered by the Finance Act, 1924, which, by section 23 (1), provided that any profits or gains arising to an agricultural society from an exhibition or show held for the purposes of the society should, if they were applied solely to the purposes of the society, be exempt from income-tax. The language of that section was based on the theory that a society for the promotion of agriculture was a charity.

The Court could not reverse the decision of the Special Commissioners on what was really a question of fact, and the appeal must, therefore, be allowed, with costs.

Lord Justice Atkin said that the case raised a question of some importance—namely, whether the society came within the definition in the Act—and this question must be dealt with under three heads. To comply with the test, the society must be (1) a body of persons, (2) established, and (3) established for charitable purposes only. The definition in the Act of a "body of persons" would include a voluntary association such as the present. One need not discuss to what extent permanence was a necessary element. Here the society was formed in 1837, it was intended to continue permanently, and it had existed for 90 years. The next point was whether it was established for charitable purposes. The objects were expressed in the original resolution forming the society, and they had been amplified by the rules without altering the main purpose. Education in agricultural matters and improvement of stock were forms of technical education, and it would be very difficult to say that such a purpose fell short of that which constituted a charitable purpose. Dealing with the cases which had been held to be charitable, one found the National Trust for places of historic interest or natural beauty (In re Verrall; [1916] 1 Ch., 100), trusts for the preservation of natural aspects of plant and animal life, or for the physical training of Army officers and soldiers. If the question had to be considered whether a bequest for the general improvement of agriculture was charitable, he (his Lordship) had no doubt that it would be so held. The next question was—could the society be held to be formed for charitable purposes only? A society formed for the mutual advantage of the members only would not be a society established for a charitable purpose only, but if a benefit were given to members with the ultimate object of improving agriculture, that benefit would not prevent the objects of the society from being purely charitable. In order to get a contribution of 9d., one might have to give the members a benefit worth 4d. He (his Lordship) attached no importance at all to the fact that members were induced to become members by giving them privileges at the annual show. One of the objects of the society was watching and advising on legislation affecting agriculture. If that were the sole purpose, the object of the society would not be charitable, but, as an auxiliary object, it was one well within the main charitable purposes of the society. It was said, however, that the society might at any time devote its funds to a non-charitable purpose. His Lordship thought that that argument involved a non sequitur. It might apply to any charitable society which could dissolve at any time and re-associate itself for other purposes. The society might add or substitute a non-charitable purpose, and if it did so it would cease to be a society established for a charitable purpose, but until it did so it remained a society established for a charitable purpose. The Yorkshire Agricultural Society had never changed its constitution, and its investments and the income thereof were plainly devoted to its main purposes. In his opinion the society fell within the definition in the Act. The question was one largely of fact. It was said that a serious consequence might follow to the Revenue if the appeal were allowed, but he (his Lordship) was not alarmed by that consequence. The General Commissioners themselves in 1924 admitted that the Royal Agricultural Society was a charity. He agreed that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Lord Justice Lawrence, who agreed, said that he would only offer a few observations. Agriculture was not merely beneficial to the community but vital to its welfare. Mr. Justice Chitty, in In re Foveaux—Cross v. London Anti-Vivisection Society (11 The Times L.R., 540; [1895] 2 Ch., 501, at p. 504), said:—"After all, the best that can be done is to consider each case as it arises, upon its own special circumstances. To be a charity there must be some public purpose—something tending to the benefit of the community. The benefit in point of local area need not extend to the public at large; a trust for the benefit of the inhabitants of a particular district will suffice."

The general improvement of agriculture was clearly a charitable purpose within the fourth division of charities laid down by Lord Macnaghten in Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax v. Pemsel (7 The Times L.R., 657; [1891] A.C., 531, at p. 583). He (his Lordship), however, must not be understood as saying that every trust of public general benefit to the community was charitable, for there might be philanthropic purposes which were not charitable, In re Macduff—Macduff v. Macduff (12 The Times L.R., 452; [1896] 2 Ch., 451). The purpose must come within the general spirit and intention of the statute of Elizabeth, as interpreted by many eminent Judges. It would require a bold advocate to assert that a bequest to promote the general purposes of agriculture was void for uncertainty. His Lordship then examined the contention put forward that the society was formed (1) only to promote an annual show, and (2) for the general benefit and pleasure of its members. In his opinion it was plain that the only object for which the society was formed was the general benefit of agriculture, and holding an annual show was a means to that end. The second ground put forward, as to the benefits secured to the members of the society, involved a confusion of thought. A charity might give dinners, dances, and other entertainments to obtain funds for the benefit of the institution, and the privileges of the members did not prevent the society from being a charity. The contention that the society was a members' society, in his opinion, failed. The appeal would be allowed, with costs there and below.

WISBECH RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. WARD.*

Negligence — Architect — Building contract — Interim certificates.

The plaintiffs, a local authority, made a contract with builders under which the defendant was the architect. Clause 29 provided : "No certificate of the architect, except for the final balance, shall be considered conclusive evidence of any works or materials to which it relates nor of the value thereof, nor shall it relieve the contractor from his liability to make good any defects as provided by these conditions, nor shall it in any way prejudice the employers in the final settlement of the accounts in any case where the contractor has been overpaid during the progress of the works." The Ministry of Health had the right to require the use of materials which the Disposals Board had for sale. While the houses were in course of erection the defendant gave interim certificates, and he also gave documents under which the plaintiffs paid the Board for articles supplied by the Board. Under these certificates and documents the plaintiffs had to pay both the builders and the Board for the same material. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover the amount from the defendant on the ground of negligence the defendant contended that he was a quasi-arbitrator and therefore not liable, and that the matter could be rectified under his final certificate which had not yet been given. The trial Judge held that the defendant was not, in giving the interim certificates, acting as an arbitrator or quasi-arbitrator, but was merely acting as agent for the plaintiffs, and was liable to pay the amount claimed.

Held, that as the certificates were only interim certificates, and as the defendant on going into the figures with the plaintiffs had indicated to them that the amount paid to the Disposals Board was to be deducted from the final balance due to the contractors, the defendant had not been guilty of negligence, and the action failed.

Decision of Sankey, J. (43 The Times L.R., 739 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 556) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Sankey (43 The Times L.R., 739 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 556).

The plaintiffs, the Wisbech Rural District Council, sought to recover from Mr. Frank Ward, the architect employed for a housing scheme of the plaintiffs, £221 3s., which they alleged they had been compelled to pay twice through the negligence of the defendant in granting interim certificates.

Shortly, the facts were that after the war the plaintiffs were minded to erect a number of houses under a housing scheme, and for that purpose they made a contract with Messrs. Wright and Wilson on September 30, 1920. The defendant was the architect under that contract. The Ministry of Health had in connexion with the scheme the right to compel the use of war material which the Disposals Board had for sale. The Ministry further had the right of revising the prices and making allowances in the event of the prices of labour or material rising or falling during the continuance of the contract.

In the years 1920-21 the houses were in course of erection, and the defendant gave 12 interim certificates, the first on November 29, 1920, and the last on November 24, 1921, in pursuance of clause 29, which regulated the method of payment and which was as follows :—

"No certificate of the architect, except for the final balance, shall be considered conclusive evidence of any works or materials to which it relates nor of the value thereof, nor shall it relieve the contractor from his liability to make good any defects as provided by these conditions, nor shall it in any way prejudice the employers in the final settlement of the accounts in any case where the contractor has been overpaid during the progress of the works."

The defendant also gave documents by virtue of which the plaintiffs paid the Disposals Board for certain articles, mainly baths. Unfortunately, he gave some interim certificates and documents under which the plaintiffs had to pay both the builders and the Board for the same material. The amount paid twice over was £221 3s. The mistake was discovered when, after considerable delay, which Mr. Justice Sankey declared to be the fault of the defendant, the accounts were gone through in 1923. It was then sought to get a refund from the builders. The latter, however, had dissolved partnership ; one had gone bankrupt, and the money was not recovered. The plaintiffs, therefore, sued the defendant for £221 3s.

The defendant contended :—(1) That he was a quasi-arbitrator, and, therefore, not liable. (2) That the action was premature because there was power to rectify under a final certificate and no final certificate had at present been issued. Should that final certificate be issued it would be found that the builders had not been over-paid, because a sum of £221 11s. 8d. was due to them in respect of sums which they ought to be allowed for paying increased wages, and so, in effect, the plaintiffs had suffered no damage. (3) If the matter could not be rectified there had been a final certificate contained in a document known as Summary No. 4, which was the document gone into between the parties to find what the exact position was, and the defendant had issued his final certificate and could not be sued for negligence. (4) If the defendant were negligent, so, too, were the plaintiffs for not keeping and checking their accounts.

Dealing with the last three points, Mr. Justice Sankey held, as to (2) that there was no power to issue a final certificate; as to (3) Summary No. 4 was not a final certificate; and as to (4) the plaintiffs had in no way been negligent. As to (1), he held that the position of the defendant was not that of an arbitrator or quasi-arbitrator. He was not, when he gave the certificates, deciding any disputes, or settling any final balance; he was, in effect, acting as agent for the plaintiffs. Judgment was, therefore, given for the amount claimed.

The defendant appealed.

Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. Linton Thorp appeared for the appellant; the Hon. Sir Malcolm Macnaghten, K.C., and Mr. Gerald Dodson for the respondents.

The question of law argued before Mr. Justice Sankey, whether the defendant was or was not in the position of an arbitrator, or quasi-arbitrator, and so immune, was not entered into by the Court of Appeal as their judgment was to the effect that the defendant, on the facts, had not been negligent.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that by clause 29 of the contract the architect had to certify for the amount of work done and materials supplied. The payments contemplated were to be no more than interim payments, and the architect was to give his certificate each month. It seemed to him that the mistake made in the Court below was in misunderstanding the effect of the duty imposed on the architect under clause 29, and treating the payments made as if they had been a final adjustment between the parties. There had been no final adjustment, and in that sense the action was premature.

As regarded the document known as Summary No. 4, that document, when produced, had been examined and corrected by the clerk to the council. The effect of Summary No. 4 had been much misunderstood at the trial, but to him it seemed that the evidence of the defendant was justified when he called attention to the fact that, on the face of it, that document showed that a sum of £270 to be paid was less the amount payable to the Disposals Board. The defendant, as architect, was clearly bound to certify for the full amounts, both of labour and material, and he had indicated that a certain amount was to be deducted. The appeal must be allowed, with costs.

RECKITT v. BARNETT, PEMBROKE, AND SLATER, LIMITED.*

Action (Cause of)—Attorney—Cheque drawn on principal's account—Fraud on principal—Knowledge of payees—Right of principal to recover proceeds from payees.

The plaintiff gave a power of attorney to one T. and authorized him, in relation to the plaintiff's affairs, to draw cheques on the plaintiff's account at the bank. T. in fraud of the plaintiff drew a cheque on the plaintiff's account, in favour of the defendants, in part-payment for a motor-car which T. had obtained from them for his own purposes on the hire-purchase system. The defendants knew that the cheque was drawn by T. as agent for the plaintiff.

In an action by the plaintiff to recover from the defendants the proceeds of the cheque,

Held, that as the defendants knew that the cheque was being used to liquidate the private debt of the agent the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

This was an action by Sir Harold James Reckitt, Bt., of 30, Rutland-court, Knightsbridge, S.W., who claimed against the defendants, Barnett, Pembroke, and Slater, Limited, automobile agents, of Alexandra Garage, Old Barrack-yard, Knightsbridge, a declaration that he was entitled to recover from them the proceeds of a cheque for £200 drawn by Lord Terrington, as the plaintiff's attorney, to the order of the defendants upon the plaintiff's banking account with Barclays Bank Limited, at Hull, and wrongfully and fraudulently paid by Lord Terrington to the defendants in respect of a personal transaction between Lord Terrington and the defendants.

Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. R. J. Willis appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Austin Farleigh for the defendants.

Mr. SCHILLER said that the cheque was drawn by Lord Terrington and given to the defendants in part payment of a Rolls-Royce motor-car which Lord Terrington had purchased from them on the hire-purchase system. It was signed "Sir Harold J. Reckitt, Bt., by Terrington his attorney." Lord Terrington had made a first payment of £350, and when a further £175 became due he drew this cheque and paid it to the defendants. When the crash came and Lord Terrington was made bankrupt the defendants retook possession of the motor-car, and, as Lord Terrington had had it so short a time, they returned £100 of what he had paid.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—For £425 he had the use of a Rolls-Royce motor-car from February to July. That sort of thing is not within reach of you and me.

Counsel, continuing, said that the defendants, in addition to denying the conversion, denied that Lord Terrington had not the plaintiff's authority, and that the cheque was drawn without the plaintiff's knowledge. They further denied that Lord Terrington's authority to draw was confined to cheques in relation to the business or affairs of the plaintiff. And they did not admit that he was acting fraudulently or wrongfully. They further set up that the plaintiff was estopped from alleging any want of authority in Lord Terrington to draw the cheque and hand it to the defendants by reason of his own conduct and by reason of his want of reasonable care.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—Estoppel by negligence is calculated to enfeeble the strongest brain.

Mr. SCHILLER said that the power of attorney was originally given at the beginning of 1915, when Sir Harold Reckitt went to France to serve with the French Red Cross. Lord Terrington, or Mr. Woodhouse, as he then was, was a friend of Sir Harold Reckitt's family, and Sir Harold Reckitt had the utmost confidence in him. On its being pointed out by the bank that the power of attorney, though it gave power to indorse cheques payable to the plaintiff, contained no power to draw cheques on the plaintiff's account, the plaintiff wrote a letter to the bank authorizing Lord Terrington to draw cheques.

For some years Lord Terrington had not much to do with the plaintiff's affairs, as the agent continued to manage the estates. But in 1918 the agent died, and, the new agent being less acquainted with the plaintiff's affairs, Lord Terrington took a greater part in the management. The amount that had disappeared through the channel of Lord Terrington was well over £250,000.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—From the plaintiff alone?

Mr. SCHILLER.—Yes. When Lord Terrington was operating he had no small ideas.

The plaintiff, continued counsel, wished his accounts to be audited, but Lord Terrington delayed the delivery of the accounts, and on December 4, 1925, the plaintiff left England for India. Before he left, another power of attorney to Lord Terrington was drawn up in much more specific terms, giving the attorney power "to draw, accept, indorse, &c., any cheque . . . in relation to the business or affairs of the principal." No sooner had the plaintiff left than Lord Terrington bought a Rolls-Royce motor-car. In April, 1926, Sir Harold Reckitt received a telegram, in response to which he came home and had an interview with Lord Terrington, who presented an account showing that he owed the plaintiff £47,800. That was on his own showing—actually, the amount was a great deal more.

The plaintiff made a formal demand for the money, but this demand, of course, was not satisfied. The power of attorney was revoked and Lord Terrington was dismissed from the position of being the plaintiff's solicitor. In May, 1926, the plaintiff issued a writ against Lord Terrington and obtained judgment. Lord Terrington's appeal was dismissed, and in July he was adjudicated bankrupt. Until the plaintiff received the telegram in Ceylon he had no idea that anything was wrong at all. He had not proved in the bankruptcy for this £200, nor had he made any demand upon the bank for it.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—The only question is whether the defendants were bona fide holders for value without notice of any defect.

Mr. SCHILLER.—In my submission it was decided by R. E. Jones, Limited v. Waring and Gillow, Limited (42 The Times L.R., 644; [1926] A.C., 670), that the payee of a cheque is not a holder for value. Anyone who took this cheque was put upon inquiry as to Lord Terrington's authority to draw upon Sir Harold Reckitt's account for the purchase of a motor-car, and, if he had notice, he had no title to retain the money.

The plaintiff gave evidence bearing out Mr. Schiller's opening statement. He proved in the bankruptcy for £213,000 odd. That figure was based on Lord Terrington's books, but there were many cheques that did not appear in the books. In July he received a bundle of paid cheques, and among them a number drawn in favour of persons about whom he knew nothing, including the defendants. He called on all those persons to ask how they came to have had his money.

Cross-examined, the witness said that the bulk of Lord Terrington's work in connexion with his affairs was of an office kind, and would not entail travelling or personal inspection. He did not remember ever seeing any item for travelling expenses. Until he returned from India he did not see any cheques paid to persons whom he did not know. He thought that there should be very few cheques to persons with whom he did not know that there was an account. For instance, when his house was burnt down he naturally knew who was rebuilding it. And his tailor's or bootmaker's bill, &c., would be sent to him personally and passed to Lord Terrington for payment. An examination of the pass-book would have shown cheques drawn in fraud of him, but the bulk of them were drawn after he had left England.

The witness said he could not conceive of the necessity for Lord Terrington to take a taxi on his affairs.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—He could not get a taxi, so he bought a Rolls-Royce.

The witness said that he had been told that if he had made this claim in April instead of July it would have saved the defendants £100.

Mr. FARLEIGH, on behalf of the defendants, cited Bryant, Powis, and Bryant, Limited v. La Banque du Peuple and the Quebec Bank (9 The Times L.R., 322; [1893] A.C., 170), and referred to section 25 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. In Bank of Bengal v. Fagan (7 Moo. P.C., 61, at p. 74) Lord Brougham decided that words such as "in relation to the business or affairs of the principal" were not words of limitation of the power, but words defining the purpose for which it was intended to be used. He submitted that persons in the defendants' position, knowing something of Lord Terrington and something of the wealth of Sir Harold Reckitt, even if they had had the documents before them, might have said: "It is quite likely that a man in this position might need a motor-car, and obviously he is not going to have a Ford."

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—Yes, but the question is whether, if they act on that impression, they may not burn their fingers.

Mr. John Law, a director of the defendant company, gave evidence of the receipt of the cheque for £200, of which £175 was a monthly instalment and the balance was on account of garage charges due to the defendants.

Other evidence having been given,

Mr. FARLEIGH, in addressing the Court, said that he was at a disadvantage in not being able to call Lord Terrington.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—I should have been tremendously impressed! I don't care how many persons of that sort you call, for I should not believe any of them.

Counsel referred also to Westfield Bank v. Cornen (93 Amer. Dec., 573) and Hambro v. Burnand (20 The Times L.R., 398; [1904] 2 K.B., 10) to show that if the act was authorized by the terms of the power a third person was not bound to inquire if it was within the actual authority.

If the defendants had inquired they would have found from the power of attorney and the letter of August, 1915, that the bank was expressly directed to pay cheques drawn in this way without restriction. Even though Lord Terrington was using his actual authority for his own ends, he was still using an actual authority. The defendants were not required to show more.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—It is a question of notice. Were not the facts here such as to give your clients notice of a fraud? Ought they not to have inquired whether Lord Terrington had authority to draw for his private debt?

Mr. FARLEIGH.—From whom could they inquire? The principal was abroad. The second power, which was given in 1925, contained a ratification by the principal of everything which the attorney should do "or purport to do" thereunder. If the defendants had looked at that document they would have found that this cheque purported to be drawn under it.

Counsel also submitted that Sir Harold Reckitt was under a duty to make inquiries about this cheque and others as soon as he returned from India and discovered that Lord Terrington had been defrauding him. But he did nothing till July. Meanwhile, the defendants had parted with £100 to Lord Terrington on the faith that the £200 was good money in their bank. He referred to Holt v. Markham ([1923] 1 K.B., 504).

Mr. SCHILLER said that this case was quite different from Holt v. Markham (supra), where the plaintiffs themselves left the defendant under the impression that he was entitled to the money. The claim based on estoppel here was fantastic.

Powers of attorney given for the principal's affairs were construed with the greatest strictness. The rule was stated by Lord Campbell in Perry v. Holl (2 De G., F. and J., 38, at p. 48). A general power would be limited to the purposes for which the power was given. Here Lord Terrington had power to draw cheques only for his principal's business.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—Do you say that a cheque drawn otherwise was no better than a forgery ?

Mr. SCHILLER.—No one looking at these documents could possibly imagine that Lord Terrington had power to draw for his own purposes. The question of notice was, he submitted, finally decided by John and Others v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (34 The Times L.R., 261 ; [1918] A.C., 563).

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT, in giving judgment, said that the case was in a small compass, but he would have put his judgment in writing if it had not been that he was due to go on circuit, and that it was, therefore, more convenient to dispose of the case. The powers of attorney given by Sir Harold Reckitt to Lord Terrington were of a very wide kind, and were, of course, given for the purpose of conducting Sir Harold Reckitt's affairs. They were not given him that he might exercise them for the purpose of filling his own pocket at the expense of the plaintiff. It was clear from the decision of Lord Brougham in Bank of Bengal v. Fagan (7 Moo. P.C., 61, at p. 74) that, whether they were expressed to be for the purpose of Sir Harold Reckitt's business, or were absolute, it did not affect the point that if Lord Terrington used them for himself it was a fraud.

Lord Terrington, being indebted to the defendants for an instalment of the purchase price of a Rolls-Royce motor-car, gave the defendants the cheque for £200 now in question signed "Sir Harold J. Reckitt, Bt., by Terrington, his attorney." It was remarkable that on the original cheque the part referring to Sir Harold Reckitt was put on with a rubber stamp and was indistinct, but that Lord Terrington's signature was in ink and quite clear. The defendants did not observe the form of signature, but the case had to be argued on the footing that the defendants knew that this was a cheque drawn by Lord Terrington as agent for Sir Harold Reckitt.

The cheque, as a cheque, was good. There was power to draw it, and it did not become bad because it was fraudulent. But everything turned on the fact that the defendants knew that it was being used to liquidate the private debt of the agent. Could they retain it ? Looking at the matter apart from authority, he would have said at once, "Certainly not," but after some hours of argument the precise authority had been produced by Mr. Schiller in the case of John and Others v. Dodwell and Co., Limited (34 The Times L.R., 261 ; [1918] A.C., 563). What happened in that case was precisely what happened here ; he could not see a shred of distinction. That concluded the main point.

There was a subsidiary point. The fraud was committed in February, 1926 ; Sir Harold Reckitt returned in April, 1926, and immediately discovered that he had been grossly defrauded, but not in this respect. He put the matter in the hands of his accountants. While the accounts were being investigated the defendants heard of trouble arising about Lord Terrington, and asked for their motor-car back, and got it on payment of £100. If they had not been paid the £200 they could have confiscated the motor-car. In July, Sir Harold Reckitt received a bundle of cheques, and discovered this one. In those circumstances it was said that the plaintiff was estopped. Holt v. Markham ([1923] 1 K.B., 504) was cited in support of that contention, but in that case the plaintiffs themselves were responsible for the defendant's misapprehension. Here there was no suggestion that Sir Harold Reckitt had done anything to mislead the defendants. There must, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff.

GROEDEL v. ADMINISTRATOR OF HUNGARIAN PROPERTY.*

Aliens — Treaty of Peace — "Nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary" — Charges on British property — Acquiring nationality of Allied or Associated Power—Satisfaction of the Administrator — Jurisdiction of the Court —Treaty of Peace (Hungary) Order, 1921, ss. 1 (ix.), 2.

By s. 1 (ix.) of the Treaty of Peace (Hungary) Order, 1921, it is provided that "All property rights and interests within his Majesty's Dominions or Protectorates belonging to nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary at the date when the treaty came into force," namely, on July 26, 1921, shall be charged as therein mentioned.

Held (following Rothschild v. Administrator of Austrian Property [1923] 2 Ch., 542), that the expression "nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary" meant persons who were Hungarian nationals on October 28, 1918, when the Austrian Empire ceased to exist by the deposition of the Emperor.

Where the Administrator of Hungarian property has determined that he is not satisfied that a national of the former Kingdom of Hungary has acquired ipso facto in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power, the Court cannot go behind the decision of the Administrator and investigate the question anew.

Baron Reizes de Marienwert v. Administrator of Austrian Property (40 The Times L.R., 698 ; [1924] 2 Ch., 282) followed.

* Reported by J. L. DENISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action in which the plaintiff, Baron Albert Groedel, claimed the sum of £22,204 had and received by the Administrator of Hungarian Property. The substantial question before the Court was whether the plaintiff could be said to be an enemy within the meaning of the Treaty of Peace so as to enable the Administrator to treat the above-mentioned sum as subject to the charge created by section 1 (ix.) of the Treaty of Peace (Hungary) Order, 1921.

Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. C. M. Picciotto appeared for the plaintiff; and the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), Mr. Gavin Simonds, K.C., and Mr. Stamp for the Administrator of Hungarian Property.

Mr. Justice Romer delivered the following considered judgment:—On July 26, 1921, when the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Hungary (usually referred to as the Treaty of Trianon) came into force, the plaintiff was possessed of certain property in his Majesty's Dominions to the value of £22,204. The defendant claims that this sum is subject to the charge imposed by section 1 (ix.) of the Treaty of Peace (Hungary) Order, 1921. The object of this action is to establish if possible that this claim of the defendant is without foundation. By the section in question "All property rights and interests within his Majesty's Dominions or Protectorates belonging to nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary at the date when the Treaty came into force" were charged with certain payments.

Now it is admitted by the plaintiff that at the time of the outbreak of the war between this country and the Austro-Hungarian Empire he was of Hungarian nationality. He alleges, however, that on July 26, 1921, or, alternatively, at some date between November, 1918, and July 26, 1921, he ceased to be a "national of the former Kingdom of Hungary." He puts his case in this way. On January 10, 1920, there came into force a treaty made between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, on the one hand, and Poland on the other hand: that is, I am told, usually referred to as the Minorities Treaty. Article 3 of that Treaty, amongst other things, provides as follows: "Poland admits and declares to be Polish nationals ipso facto and without the requirement of any formality German, Austrian, Hungarian or Russian nationals habitually resident at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty in territory which is or may be recognized as forming part of Poland." The plaintiff alleges that when this Treaty came into force he was habitually resident at Skole in Galicia, and that Galicia was at this date recognized as forming part of Poland. He became, therefore, he says, on January 10, 1920, a national of Poland. The plaintiff then relies upon Article 213 of the Treaty of Trianon. That article is as follows: "Hungary undertakes to recognize any new nationality which has been or may be acquired by her nationals under the laws of the Allied and Associated Powers, and in accordance with the decisions of the competent authorities of these Powers pursuant to naturalization laws or under treaty stipulations, and to regard such persons as having, in consequence of the acquisition of such new nationality, in all respects severed their allegiance to their country of origin." By virtue of this article the plaintiff contends that he lost his former Hungarian nationality at the moment when the Treaty came into force. Alternatively, the plaintiff alleges that the territory in which Skole is situated was severed from the Austro-Hungarian Empire and that the independent State of Poland exercised sovereign rights over such territory from November, 1918. In these circumstances he asks me to come to the conclusion that as a matter of international law he thereby became a Polish national and ceased to be a Hungarian national at some date prior to the date of the coming into force of the Treaty of Trianon. It will be observed, therefore, that his claim in the first place is based upon the two treaties to which I have referred, and alternatively upon some effect produced upon his Hungarian nationality by the warlike operations in the territories of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Now, even if I could bring myself to the conclusion that at the time when the Treaty of Trianon came into force the plaintiff had lost his Hungarian nationality for either of the reasons alleged by him, the plaintiff would not have established the proposition that his property is not subjected to the charge in question. For the property charged by the Treaty of Peace Order is not that of Hungarian nationals, but of "nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary." It becomes necessary, therefore, to ascertain the meaning of this expression. The plaintiff contends that it means no more than Hungarian nationals. If by this he means, as I understand he does mean, persons who, when the Treaty comes into force, still remain Hungarian nationals, he is, I think, clearly wrong. For it is provided by section 2 of the Treaty of Peace Order that the expression "nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary" does not include persons who within six months from the coming into force of the Treaty show to the satisfaction of the Administrator that they have acquired ipso facto in accordance with its provisions the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power. This refers (and, it may be, refers exclusively) to the provisions contained in section vii. of Part III. of the Treaty, entitled "Clauses relating to Nationality," and consisting of Articles 61 to 66 inclusive. The first of these articles is as follows: "Every person possessing rights of citizenship (pertinenza) in territory which formed part of the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy shall obtain ipso facto to the exclusion of Hungarian nationality the nationality of the State exercising sovereignty over such territory." It seems evident, therefore, that, but for the express provision in section 2 of the Treaty of Peace Order, such persons, though losing their Hungarian nationality at the moment when the Treaty came into force, were intended to be included in the expression "nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary." The expression is not, however, an easy one to understand. A person who was a Hungarian national in the days when Hungary was a kingdom does not cease to be a Hungarian national merely because Hungary ceases to be a kingdom or merely because she is dispossessed of part of her former territories. A person, for instance, who was residing in South America at the outbreak of the war and was then a Hungarian national has not, in the absence of other circumstances, lost his nationality. It would not be true to say that whereas he was formerly a national of the Kingdom of Hungary he is now a national of the Hungarian Republic. He was, and he remains, a Hungarian national. The expression "nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary" might, therefore, mean "nationals of Hungary which was formerly a kingdom," in which case it would mean no more than Hungarian nationals; or it might mean "nationals of Hungary when it was a kingdom." For the reason already given (if for no other), the former construction must be rejected. Can I then treat it as meaning "nationals of Hungary when it was a kingdom"? Apart from authority I should have felt some little difficulty in doing so. The expression would then prima facie include persons who were formerly Hungarian nationals but who before the war had lost their nationality and acquired the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power. It would also exclude persons who were Hungarian nationals when the Treaty of Trianon came into force but had acquired such nationality after Hungary had ceased to be a kingdom. It is difficult to see any reason for the exclusion of the latter class. The inclusion of the former class is unthinkable. If possible, therefore, I should have endeavoured to adopt a construction that would avoid both the exclusion and the inclusion. But is such a construction possible? For myself, I should have thought that it was. At the date of the Treaty of Trianon the Austro-Hungarian Empire had broken up. Hungary had become a Republic. Hungarian territory had been occupied by the Allied and Associated Powers, and this territory was in the course of being assigned by those Powers to other States. The consequence of all this was that numerous persons who at the outbreak of war had been of Hungarian nationality would, when the Treaty came into force, have been able to contend that they were no longer Hungarian nationals. If, therefore, Article 232 (1) (b) of the Treaty of Trianon had merely referred to Hungarian nationals it might well have been argued that only those persons who remained Hungarian nationals after it came into force were affected. A vast number of persons who had been enemies of the Allied and Associated Powers during the greater part or even the whole of the war might in this way have escaped. In these circumstances it might well have been thought desirable to make it clear that the Hungarian nationals to be brought within the scope of the article were not only those who were to remain Hungarian nationals, but those who were such nationals at the outbreak of the war and would have still remained such nationals after the Treaty, had it not been for the changes in nationality brought about by the war and the various treaties entered into at its conclusion. Until the Treaty of Trianon came into force a state of war between the Allied and Associated Powers and Hungary was still technically in existence. Had the Treaty negotiations broken down the war could have been resumed, and in theory, at any rate, Hungary might have repossessed herself of all her original territory. In that case, those who were Hungarian nationals at the outbreak of the war and had not lost their nationality by the ordinary operation of Hungarian law would have remained Hungarian nationals; and it was as representing all their people that the Republic of Hungary negotiated the Treaty of Trianon. How best could these people be described? It seems to me that they could best be described as "nationals of Hungary, treating Hungary as though it were still the former kingdom of Hungary." This is a meaning which might, I think, be given without impropriety to the expression "nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary," and this is the meaning that I should have been inclined to give to it in the absence of authority.

My attention has, however, been very properly called to the decision of Mr. Justice Eve in Rothschild v. Administrator of Austrian Property ([1923] 2 Ch., 542). That case had to do with the provisions of the Treaty of Peace (Austria) Order, 1920, whereby the property of nationals of the former Austrian Empire were charged, and the learned Judge held that this expression meant those who were nationals of the Austrian Empire on October 28, 1918, when that Empire ceased to exist by the deposition of the Emperor. This construction avoids, of course, an unlimited retrospective operation. Such an operation, the learned Judge pointed out, would be absurd. It does, however, include within the expression persons who by Austrian law would have lost their Austrian nationality quite independently of the war before the Treaty of Peace with Austria came into effect; and this may or may not have been the intention of the Allied and Associated Powers. But it excludes persons who became of Austrian nationality by birth or marriage or otherwise after October 28, 1918, and before the Treaty came into force, and it does not seem probable that those Powers really intended this. So far as the present case is concerned, the plaintiff would not be excluded whether I give to the expression "nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary" a meaning corresponding to the one given by Mr. Justice Eve to the expression "nationals of the former Austrian Empire" or the meaning which, unaided by his decision, I should probably have given it myself. But I am told that since Mr. Justice Eve's decision both the Administrator of Austrian and the Administrator of Hungarian property have, in pursuance of that decision, treated as not being subjected to the charge the property of persons who became Austrian or Hungarian nationals, as the case may be, after October 28, 1918. Between the Austrian and the Hungarian Orders I can see no difference that would enable me to distinguish the present case from that with which Mr. Justice Eve had to deal. In these circumstances I think that I ought to follow his decision and to hold that "nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary" means persons who were Hungarian nationals on October 28, 1918.

The plaintiff is therefore within the category of "nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary" referred to in section 1 (ix.) of the Treaty of Peace Order unless he be excluded from that category by reason of the provision in section 2, to which I have already referred.

Now the plaintiff at the trial adduced a considerable body of evidence which, he contends, shows that he acquired ipso facto in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power, namely, Poland. But, unfortunately for him, this is not enough. In order to escape from the category it was necessary for him to show this to the satisfaction of the Administrator. He attempted to do so, and failed. This is admitted. In these circumstances, the defendant contends that it is not open to this Court to go behind the decision of the Administrator and investigate the question anew. Upon this contention the defendant in my opinion is entitled to succeed. A similar question arose upon the Treaty of Peace (Austria) Order, 1920, in Baron Reizes de Marienwert v. Administrator of Austrian Property (40 The Times L.R., 698; [1924] 2 Ch., 282), and was decided by the Court of Appeal in the Administrator's favour. It is not suggested that the Administrator in the present case did not arrive at his conclusion in good faith, or that there are any other grounds upon which the plaintiff, by appropriate proceedings before the proper Court, could compel a reconsideration of the matter.

In these circumstances I have, I fear, no option but to dismiss the plaintiff's action.

REX v. LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE OF THE CHURCH ASSEMBLY AND THE CHURCH ASSEMBLY—EX PARTE HAYNES SMITH.*

Ecclesiastical Law—Church Assembly—Legislative Committee — Prohibition—Certiorari—Whether writs will lie.

Neither the Legislative Committee of the Church Assembly nor the Church Assembly itself is a body to which a writ of certiorari or of prohibition will issue, as neither of them is a body which is under a duty to act in a judicial capacity.

On October 28 the Court granted, at the instance of Sir William Frederick Haynes Smith, K.C.M.G., of Turleigh, Bradford-on-Avon, Wilts, a rule nisi for a prohibition, directed to the Legislative Committee of the National Assembly of the Church of England, to prohibit them from proceeding further with "The Prayer-book Measure, 1927"; and also rules nisi for a certiorari, directed both to the Legislative Committee and to the Church Assembly, to bring up and quash the Measure and the "deposited Book" annexed to it, upon the grounds, (1) that the Measure had not been passed by the Church Assembly within the meaning of section 3 (1) of the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act, 1919, and (2) that the Measure was not passed by the Church Assembly in accordance with the requirements of article 14 (1) of the Constitution in that it was never debated by each House sitting separately.

The Hon. Sir Malcolm Macnaghten, K.C., and Mr. Storry Deans moved for the rules.

Sir Malcolm Macnaghten said that Sir William Haynes Smith was a member of the Church of England. To understand the present application it was necessary to refer to the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act, 1919, and to the constitution and powers of the bodies created thereby. That Act began by defining the Church Assembly by reference to a Constitution set forth in an appendix to addresses presented to his Majesty by the Convocations of Canterbury and York on May 10, 1919. Article 11 of the Constitution provided:—

"The Assembly shall appoint a Legislative Committee, including members of all three Houses, to whom all measures which it is desired to pass into law shall be referred. The Legislative Committee shall thereupon take such action as may be authorized by statute in order that such measure may become law."

Section 2 of the Act provided:—

"(1) There shall be a committee of members of both Houses of Parliament styled 'The Ecclesiastical Committee.'

"(2) The Ecclesiastical Committee shall consist of 15 members of the House of Lords nominated by the Lord Chancellor and 15 members of the House of Commons nominated by the Speaker. . . ."

Section 3 provided:—

"(1) Every measure passed by the Church Assembly shall be submitted by the Legislative Committee to the Ecclesiastical Committee, together with such comments and explanations as the Legislative Committee may deem it expedient or be directed by the Church Assembly to add.

"(2) The Ecclesiastical Committee shall thereupon consider the measure so submitted to it, and may at any time during such consideration, either of its own motion or at the request of the Legislative Committee, invite the Legislative Committee to a conference to discuss the provisions thereof, and thereupon a conference of the two committees shall be held accordingly.

"(3) After considering the measure, the Ecclesiastical Committee shall draft a report thereon to Parliament, stating the nature and legal effect of the measure and its views as to the expediency thereof, especially with relation to the constitutional rights of all his Majesty's subjects.

"(4) The Ecclesiastical Committee shall communicate its report in draft to the Legislative Committee, but shall not present it to Parliament until the Legislative Committee signify its desire that it should be so presented.

"(5) At any time before the presentation of the report to Parliament the Legislative Committee may, either on its own motion or by direction of the Church Assembly, withdraw a measure from further consideration by the Ecclesiastical Committee; but the Legislative Committee shall have no power to vary a measure of the Church Assembly either before or after conference with the Ecclesiastical Committee.

"(6) A measure may relate to any matter concerning the Church of England and may extend to the amendment or repeal in whole or in part of any Act of Parliament, including this Act. . . ."

Their Lordships would see, said counsel, that the scheme was, that after a measure was passed by the Church Assembly it came under the control of the Legislative Committee, to carry it forward in connexion with the Ecclesiastical Committee.

Mr. Justice Salter.—The Ecclesiastical Committee may be described as the "tasters" for Parliament?—Yes.

The Lord Chief Justice.—You are asking for prohibition. Is either the Legislative Committee or the Church Assembly an inferior court?

Sir Malcolm Macnaghten submitted that they were so within the principles laid down in the Electricity Commissioners' case (39 The Times L.R., 715; [1924] 1 K.B., 171). The point which he wished to emphasize was that, even after the Ecclesiastical Committee began consideration of a measure, the Legislative Committee kept its hand on it and could at any time prevent the Ecclesiastical Committee from proceeding on it until the report was presented to Parliament. Unless, therefore, an irregularity were restrained while the matter was still under the control of the Legislative Committee, it would be too late, for the Ecclesiastical Committee was a Parliamentary Committee, not subject to the Court's jurisdiction.

But the powers of the Legislative Committee did not arise, except upon a measure "passed" by the Church Assembly, whose powers in this behalf were contained in article 14 of the Constitution, which provided:—

"The Assembly shall be free to discuss any proposal concerning the Church of England and to make provision in respect thereof, and where such provision requires Parliamentary sanction the authority of Parliament shall be sought in such manner as may be prescribed by statute:

"Provided that any measure touching doctrinal formulæ or the services or ceremonies of the Church of England or the administration of the Sacraments or sacred rites thereof shall be debated and voted upon by each of the three Houses sitting separately, and shall then be either accepted or rejected by the Assembly in the terms in which it is finally proposed by the House of Bishops."

The submission of the applicant was that the Measure submitted for final approval to the Church Assembly on July 4, 1927, was a different Measure from "the Revised Prayer-book Permissive Use Measure, 1923," to which general approval was accorded by the three Houses in that year and which was debated and amended by the Houses of Clergy and Laity in the ensuing two years.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Are you not too late? Ought not this objection to have been raised when the Measure was brought forward at the Church Assembly?

SIR MALCOLM MACNAGHTEN.—It was taken, both in writing to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and orally when the resolution was proposed, but it was overruled by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Without going into controversial matters, their Lordships would realize that many members of the Church of England looked with reverence and devotion upon the Book of Common Prayer and were unwilling that it should be altered, though they might accept the need for allowing some additions or permissive omissions. The Measure of 1923 recognized that feeling, and was expressed to have for its object "to authorize the alternative use of certain omissions from, additions to, and deviations from the Book of Common Prayer." The Prayer-book was left intact, but permission was given to use certain alternative forms.

The "Prayer Book Measure, 1927," brought forward by the Bishops for approval, was expressed to be "to authorize the use of the Prayer-book referred to in this Measure and deposited with the Clerk of the Parliaments." Curiously enough, said counsel, a letter addressed to the Clerk of the Parliaments on the day after the passing of the resolution in the Church Assembly elicited a reply that no Book had been deposited in fact. There must have been some confusion over the matter, but the important point was that, as the applicant submitted, the deposited Book had no place in the 1923 Measure, and that the new Measure altered the Book of Common Prayer in important and controversial respects. This new Measure had never been debated by the Houses separately, and therefore it was contended that it was not passed by the Church Assembly within the meaning of section 3 (1) of the Act.

After some discussion of the question whether the Legislative Committee or the Church Assembly were the proper respondents to the rules, the applicant was granted, "at his peril," a rule for a prohibition to the Legislative Committee and for a certiorari against both.

When the rules came on for argument Sir John Simon, K.C., and Mr. Wilfrid Lewis showed cause for the Legislative Committee; Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., and Mr. F. H. L. Errington for the Church Assembly; the Hon. Sir Malcolm Macnaghten, K.C., and Mr. Storry Deans supported the rules.

SIR JOHN SIMON recalled that the rules were obtained on October 28. Something might be thought to turn on the fact that no application had been made to the Court before that date.

He would take three points, any one of which, he submitted, was sufficient to show that the rules should be discharged. First, he submitted that the rules of certiorari and prohibition were not, according to the law and practice of the Court, available or permissible in the circumstances of the present case. They were not dealing with that class of proceeding which, on a proper occasion, had been the subject of correction by the King's Bench Division by means of those prerogative writs. They were not dealing with the decision of a Court in the strict sense, nor were they dealing with the decision of any administrative body which, although not a Court in the strict sense, was engaged in exercising functions for which a judicial quality was very properly required. They were dealing with a subject-matter which could be more properly classed as in the nature of deliberation and legislation rather than of anything judicial or administrative.

Secondly, he submitted that the procedure which had been followed by the Legislative Committee and by the Church Assembly was entirely regular and was within the Constitution according to which they ought to operate.

Thirdly, if it became necessary to enter on a close comparison and examination of the conclusions reached in the course of that long matter by the Church Assembly and its component parts, it would be found that there was no ground for saying, as the rules suggested, that the Measure which was now before the Parliamentary Committee was not the same Measure as was considered by the Church Assembly at an earlier stage. The identity of the Prayer-book Measure had not been changed. It was the same Measure although, in the course of the elaborate deliberations on it, its terms had been altered in various ways.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—On your third submission, if I follow Sir Malcolm Macnaghten's argument, the point seems to be that "must" is not the same thing as "may."

SIR JOHN SIMON.—I think that that puts in a phrase the sort of view which my learned friend may wish to urge.

Counsel then read the affidavit of Sir Philip Wilbraham Baker-Wilbraham, secretary of the Church Assembly since its institution.

The affidavit stated that Sir William Haynes Smith had already addressed complaints to the Ecclesiastical Committee. In a letter dated July 20, 1927, but apparently not sent till October 22, 1927, he fully stated the grounds of his objection.

SIR MALCOLM MACNAGHTEN.—The applicant first wrote to the secretary of the Ecclesiastical Committee asking to be heard, but was informed that they were not hearing oral evidence. He then sent copies of the letter of July 20 to all the members of the Ecclesiastical Committee.

SIR JOHN SIMON.—My point is that by July 20 the applicant was fully aware of his position, but took no step to bring the matter before the Court till October 28.

The Church Assembly, continued counsel, was a voluntary unincorporated body. It was not a statutory body, though certain of its functions were regulated by statute. It was constituted in accordance with an address to his Majesty by both Houses of Convocation. Counsel proceeded to read the following material parts of the Constitution. The purpose of the Assembly was defined in Article 1 as being "to deliberate on all matters concerning the Church of England and to make provision in respect thereof."

Provisions were made for the Houses of Bishops and Clergy, which were to consist respectively of the members of the Upper and Lower Houses of Convocation, and for an elective House of Laity. The Assembly was to meet at least once a year under the chairmanship of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and provision was made for sittings of the Houses to be held separately or together.

By Article 10 :—

"Nothing (except what relates only to the conduct of business) shall be deemed to be finally passed by the Assembly which has not received the assent of a majority of the members present and voting of each of the three Houses sitting together or separately, and accordingly at sittings of the Assembly, or of any two Houses—(1) Any motion relating solely to the course of business or procedure shall be determined by a show of hands; (2) any other motion may be similarly determined unless any ten members present demand a division by Houses, in which case the motion shall be lost unless it is carried by a majority of the members of each House present and voting."

By Article 11 :—

"The Assembly shall appoint a Legislative Committee, including members of all three Houses, to whom all measures which it is desired to pass into law shall be referred. The Legislative Committee shall thereupon take such action as may be authorized by statute in order that such measure may become law."

By Article 12 :—

"The Assembly may make, revoke, or alter standing orders, consistent with this constitution, for the conduct of elections, and for the meetings, procedure and business of the Assembly, and for the joint sittings of any two Houses."

It was clear from these provisions, said SIR JOHN SIMON, that for many functions of the Assembly no Parliamentary sanction or control was required. For instance, the Assembly could determine a matter relating to foreign missions without any Parliamentary sanction at all. But Article 14 provided that :—

"The Assembly shall be free to discuss any proposal concerning the Church of England and to make provision in respect thereof, and where such provision requires Parliamentary sanction the authority of Parliament shall be sought in such manner as may be prescribed by statute :

"Provided that any measure touching doctrinal formulæ or the services or ceremonies of the Church of England or the administration of the Sacraments or sacred rites thereof shall be debated and voted upon by each of the three Houses sitting separately, and shall then be either accepted or rejected by the Assembly in the terms in which it is finally proposed by the House of Bishops."

The language of that proviso made it clear that the identity of a measure was not necessarily changed because the terms of the measure were changed. Otherwise the alteration of a single word might make it a new measure.

Counsel next dealt with the procedure where Parliamentary sanction was required. That procedure was provided for under the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act, 1919, section 2 of which provided :—

"(1) There shall be a committee of members of both Houses of Parliament styled 'The Ecclesiastical Committee.'

"(2) The Ecclesiastical Committee shall consist of 15 members of the House of Lords nominated by the Lord Chancellor and 15 members of the House of Commons nominated by the Speaker. . . ."

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE pointed out that the Ecclesiastical Committee was not a Committee of Parliament. It was only a committee which consisted of members of Parliament. So might the committee of a golf club.

Counsel then read section 3 set out above.

Continuing, he said that Sir Philip Baker-Wilbraham's affidavit stated that the Measure entitled "The Revised Prayer-book (Permissive Use) Measure, 1923," was introduced by order of the House of Bishops on October 25, 1922, and was dealt with by the Church Assembly throughout all its stages in accordance with the Standing Orders. It was expressed to have for its object the authorization of not only "the alternative use of certain omissions from, additions to, and deviations from the Book of Common Prayer," as had been stated in Sir William Haynes Smith's affidavit, but also "the issue of supplementary forms of service in public worship in the Church of England and for purposes connected therewith." On the stage of general approval it was considered by the House of Clergy, sitting separately, on January 31, 1923, and was approved by a large majority. It was considered by the House of Bishops, sitting separately, on April 16 and 17, 1923, and was approved by a large majority. It was considered by the House of Laity, sitting separately, on April 25 and 26, 1923, and was approved by a majority of 175 to 46.

The Measure was next considered for revision by the Houses of Clergy and Laity, again sitting separately, this stage occupying about 22 days in the House of Clergy and 15 days in the House of Laity. It was then returned to the House of Bishops with the amendments which had been proposed. The House of Laity were opposed to the principle of an alternative Prayer-book, and they adhered to the plan of printing the permissible variations with the text of the existing Prayer-book, so that every worshipper might have "at least the services for Morning and Evening Prayer, the Litany, and the Holy Communion, with the permissible variations relevant to those services, in a single volume."

The House of Bishops took up the work of revision in the autumn of 1925. Between October, 1925, and March, 1927, six special sessions, occupying nearly 50 days in all, were held, practically all the diocesan Bishops, unless prevented by illness or other unavoidable cause, being present. During the course of those sessions conferences were held in committees of the Houses of Clergy and Laity. In February, 1927, before the revision was finally completed, the proposals of the Bishops were communicated in a provisional form to the Lower Houses of the two Convocations, who were thus given the opportunity to make further suggestions in detail before their consent was asked to the Measure being laid before the Assembly for final approval.

The revision by the House of Bishops made a considerable change in the form of the Measure, but it was submitted that such alterations in form and adjustments in detail did not, for this purpose, constitute the substitution of one Measure for another.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—If you convert something voluntary into something compulsory, is that a change of form or an adjustment of detail? If there are profound changes can they be called adjustments in detail?

SIR JOHN SIMON.—I submit that no profound change has been made at all.

The original Measure, the affidavit continued, had consisted of a few enacting clauses referring to a long schedule of amendments to the Book of Common Prayer. As time went on it became increasingly difficult to state the proposed alterations in the form of a schedule of amendments, and increasingly necessary and more convenient to embody those amendments in a complete consecutive book. Consequently the Measure, as revised by the House of Bishops, consisted of enacting clauses referring to a completed Book, to be deposited with the Clerk of the Parliaments for purposes of identification. That was merely a change of form and not of substance.

Whereas the Book resulting from the amendments proposed in the original Measure would have been an alternative book, the deposited Book was, as desired by the House of Laity, a composite book, containing not only the proposed alternative uses, but also (with a few slight exceptions) the whole of the existing Book of Common Prayer. The deposited Book could be used equally in churches where the old forms of service were retained as in those where the new ones were desired.

After the revision in the House of Bishops had been completed, the Archbishops consulted their respective Convocations, and obtained their consent to the Measure being laid before the Assembly for final approval, and on July 5 and 6, 1927, it was finally considered by the Church Assembly for acceptance or rejection.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—In your view is this analogous to a Bill before Parliament which is referred to a committee and returns to the House of Commons after having been amended ?

SIR JOHN SIMON.—Yes, my Lord.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—It would be a strange thing if a Bill for local option became in committee a Bill for local coercion.

SIR JOHN SIMON.—Stranger things than that have happened.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—I think that, if it did occur, it might lead to a troublesome debate on the third reading.

SIR JOHN SIMON, continuing his argument against the rules, referred to Order XXXII. of the Standing Orders of the Church Assembly, which provided procedure for the introduction into, and consideration and approval by, the three Houses of the Assembly sitting separately, and by both Houses of Convocation, of a measure touching doctrinal formulæ, the services and ceremonies of the Church of England, or the administration of the Sacraments or their sacred rites. There could be no doubt, he said, that the carefully framed provisions of that Order had been strictly complied with, and the question on that part of the case was, therefore, in substance, whether that Standing Order could be impeached as being in conflict with the Constitution of the Church Assembly under which it was made.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that the Measure of 1923 was entitled the "Revised Prayer-book (Permissive Use) Measure," and was proposed to be passed to authorize certain alternative uses. Was it an amendment of that to say, with regard to certain vital matters :—"We are no longer speaking of alternative use. This new form shall be obligatory" ? Did it come within the sphere of the alternative to announce a new and obligatory course ? Was not one the exact antithesis of the other ?

SIR JOHN SIMON.—That question may be a very grave one if your Lordships, after examination, consider that any such grave change has taken place. I think that I shall be able to satisfy your Lordships that, as a matter of fact, the changes in their final form really remain of a permissive character. It is rather a greater latitude that may be found than a mandatory change from one established use to another.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—Do you agree that the Book of Common Prayer survived the 1923 Measure untouched, but that it did not survive this Measure [i.e., the Measure of 1927] untouched ? In other words, after 1923 anyone could follow the Book of Common Prayer in every respect if he wished. Now that would be wrong.

SIR JOHN SIMON.—We have to see to what extent that is so.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Is it not true to say that, if you draw a line at 1923, what was offered then was in all respects an alternative ? Although, no doubt, there is now a considerable area within which what is offered is permissive or alternative, there are certain respects in which a new thing is imposed.

SIR JOHN SIMON.—I think that your Lordships will find that, so far as regards the services of the Church, that is not so. The extent to which it might plausibly be said to be so is really that there was implicit in the proposals, in the shape in which they were first put forward and were generally approved, certain very minor modifications which, when one comes to consider the matter in detail, involve minute adjustments. They are not adjustments which say that in the future the services which are authorized shall be in a certain form, whereas previously they had been in another form.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Is your answer to the question that there is no sense in which the Measure of 1927 does more than offer an alternative ?

SIR JOHN SIMON.—I think so, my Lord.

SIR JOHN SIMON, continuing to read the affidavit of Sir Philip Baker-Wilbraham, the secretary of the Church Assembly, said that when the Measure was brought forward for final approval on July 5 and 6, 1927, the three Houses sat together, under the chairmanship of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Mr. Patrick White's protest was made and overruled publicly by the Archbishop, who then put the motion to the Assembly that the Measure be approved. After a two days' debate, in which a number of members of each House took part, the motion for approval was carried. The total voting was 517 for the Measure, and 133 against.

On July 13, 1927, the Book referred to in the Measure was deposited and the Legislative Committee of the Assembly, in pursuance of Article 11 of the Constitution and section 3 (1) of the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act, 1919, submitted the Measure to the Ecclesiastical Committee, together with comments and explanations in the shape of a report.

SIR JOHN SIMON was reading the shorthand note of Mr. Patrick White's objection and submitting that the Archbishop acted in accordance with the Standing Orders and the Constitution, when SIR MALCOLM MACNAGHTEN said :—If this Measure of 1927 is the same as the Measure of 1923, I do not complain of Order XXXII. or the way in which it was applied.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—You say that this Measure never reached the point at which that Standing Order could be applied to it. If it did, then I understand that you agree that the procedure of the Standing Orders and the Constitution was correctly applied to it ?

SIR MALCOLM MACNAGHTEN.—Yes ; I say that the Archbishop ought to have ruled that the Measure was a new Measure.

SIR JOHN SIMON.—This must surely be one of those matters of procedure which are essentially for the decision of the presiding authority. It is as though, on the third reading of a Bill which has been away from the House of Commons to a Select Committee, a member objected that the amendments made by the Committee were of such a character that it was not the same Bill. Would it not be the right and duty of the Speaker to rule on that question ?

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Would there not be a way of dealing with that matter at an earlier stage ?

SIR JOHN SIMON.—No doubt the Chairman of Committees would refuse to accept amendments which were clearly outside the scope of the Bill, but I am assuming the case of a member who thought that the amendments which were in fact made still went too far. I do not wish to press the analogy unduly, especially for this reason : that in Parliament one body at a time considers a Measure and passes it on, with the amendments, to the next stage until the conclusion is reached. At no stage do the House of Lords or the House of Commons consider a Measure at the same time. But the Church Assembly (Powers) Act, 1919, seems to contemplate a simultaneous consideration of a Measure by the three Houses, and the final vote is taken, not upon a precise text agreed on by each House after consideration of the amendments made by the others, but upon a revised text proposed by the House of Bishops.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—But their revision must not go so far that it ceases to be the Measure.

SIR JOHN SIMON.—I should contend for greater latitude for the Bishops than merely to reconcile or combine things suggested by the other Houses.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Your contention is that the raw materials in the shape of the suggestions made by the House of Laity and the House of Clergy are to be collected and laid before the House of Bishops, who may add any suggestions of their own and bring forward the result for final approval so long as it is in some sense the same.

SIR JOHN SIMON.—Yes. It is not a case of one House amending the Measure and the Measure going forward, plus amendments, to the next House.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—Are the amendments of one House binding on the others ?

SIR JOHN SIMON.—Not in the least.

SIR JOHN SIMON, continuing, said that when the House of Bishops began its consideration of a Measure it had before it the suggestions of the Houses of Laity and Clergy. The method was that those two Houses completed their suggestions and the House of Bishops then had the duty of considering, with the help of those suggestions, what were the terms in which the House of Bishops would propose that the Measure would be finally expressed.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—The Bishops have the matter entirely in their hands because, if the point is raised that the amendments amount to such transformation that the Measure before the Assembly is no longer the Measure, the determining voice on the question is that of the Archbishop ?

SIR JOHN SIMON.—Certainly.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—If your contention is right about the meaning of the Constitution, the position is really that the decisions of the House of Laity have no binding effect on the House of Clergy ; that those of the House of Clergy have no binding effect on the House of Laity ; and that the decisions of neither House have any binding effect on the House of Bishops. The Bishops may do as they please subject to the provision that the question may be raised whether the Measure is the original Measure and, if that is raised, the Bishops decide it.

SIR JOHN SIMON.—Your Lordship has omitted some overwhelming considerations. Before any change can be effected the affirmative approval must be obtained of the Church Assembly, a body of some 500 persons, about 40 of whom are Bishops.

Continuing, SIR JOHN SIMON said that, with regard to matters of doctrinal formulæ, services, ceremonies, and the administration of the Sacraments, the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishops had a veto. They could prevent proposals of that kind from coming before the Church Assembly for approval, except in such terms as the House of Bishops thought to be right. It was incorrect to say that the Bishops could do what they liked. They could prevent what they did not like.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—The Bishops can do what they like on the matter with which we are dealing, the question being whether what is to be put to the National Assembly is the original Measure. In exercising their veto the Bishops may transform the Measure into something else, subject to the peril that it may be rejected. Subject to that, vis inertiae may carry it, or the liking for some clauses may cause some people to put up with others.

SIR JOHN SIMON.—I certainly should consider that to be so. The Bishops had the responsibility of determining in what terms a proposal should come before the Assembly for final approval. If one could imagine that power being used improperly, there was the check that the Archbishop of Canterbury acted as chairman of the Assembly as the head of the whole Church and not as the head of the Bishops. Another security was that a proposal which commended itself to the Bishops came before an Assembly in which the Bishops numbered only 40 out of 500. Lastly, a bare majority of one of the Houses would hold up the whole matter.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Are there not two sufficient answers which avoid the suggestion that it will be necessary to examine in detail whether the Measure of 1923 was the same as the Measure of 1927 —(1) that it was for the Archbishop of Canterbury to determine whether it was the same Measure, and he has decided it ; (2) the Measure of 1927 was submitted, as being the Measure of 1923, to the Assembly for acceptance, and the Assembly has accepted it ? What has this Court to do with the domestic question whether the ruling can be supported ? It has been supported in the only two quarters which matter. Where has there been any usurpation of jurisdiction by anything which can be called a Court ?

SIR JOHN SIMON.—I outlined yesterday that my first point would be that the writs did not lie ; my second that what was done was done within the terms of the Constitution. The ruling of the president of a deliberative assembly, whether right or wrong, if given in good faith, is final. A man may often have it thrust upon him that he has to determine the ambit of his own jurisdiction.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I have been waiting to hear how a writ of prohibition can go to a Legislative Committee.

SIR JOHN SIMON.—The difficulties appear to me still greater in the case of certiorari, which brings up a record—a particular document—to be quashed.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—We are asked to quash the record of the Measure and the record of the Book. Where is the "record" of the Measure ?

SIR JOHN SIMON.—I have not the faintest idea. There is no "record" of the Measure. The Book is in the hands of 30 members of the two Houses of Parliament, and, presumably, the writ would have to go to them.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—What are the judicial functions of the Church Assembly or of the Legislative Committee ?

Sir John Simon.—Where you have a body whose functions are deliberative, it is as absurd to talk of certiorari as to ask for certiorari to Convocation. That application would have short shrift.

He submitted that the language of the proviso to Article 14 of the Constitution abundantly justified what had been done.

The Lord Chief Justice.—The Measure has yet to run the gauntlet of a Parliamentary Committee, and either House of Parliament, or both, may reject it.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I appreciate, Sir John, what you say as to certiorari; but as to prohibition, suppose that the Constitution says that a Measure shall not be put forward by the Legislative Committee, except after a certain procedure. If a Measure is put forward without going through that procedure, may not a person aggrieved say: "If this were an ordinary Bill, Parliament might amend it; but Parliament cannot amend a Measure, and is hardly likely to reject it if it gets there"?

Sir John Simon.—The Ecclesiastical Committee have under the Act (section 3 (3)), the express duty of guarding "the constitutional rights of all his Majesty's subjects."

The Lord Chief Justice.—If you had the incredible position of the Church Assembly sending up to the Ecclesiastical Committee a Measure without observing any formalities, the Ecclesiastical Committee would report to Parliament: "We have had a piece of paper put before us purporting to be a Measure, but upon investigation we find that the required formalities were not complied with, and we think it is not expedient that it should be proceeded with."

Mr. Justice Avory.—Even if they did not so report, neither House of Parliament is under any obligation to send the matter forward to his Majesty for approval.

The Lord Chief Justice at this point intimated that the Court need not trouble Sir John Simon any further. His Lordship asked Sir Malcolm Macnaghten how he overcame the difficulties (a) that the matter complained of was one of procedure, which had been decided by the chairman of the Assembly, the Archbishop of Canterbury; and (b) that, in any event, neither the Church Assembly nor the Legislative Committee was of the nature of a Court to which a writ of prohibition or a writ of certiorari could be directed.

Sir Malcolm Macnaghten said that his answer to the first question was that what he complained of was not a matter of procedure, but a matter of jurisdiction. Assuming that the Measure of 1927 was not the Measure of 1923, and had never been debated separately by the Houses of Clergy and Laity, he submitted that, according to the practice of that Court, any subject of his Majesty, who was a member of the Church of England, was entitled as of right to writs of prohibition and certiorari.

It had been suggested that there was nothing to quash. What he wished to quash was the order of the Church Assembly directing that the Measure of 1927 be passed. There must also be a similar order of the Legislative Committee directing that the Measure be submitted to the Ecclesiastical Committee. If he could establish that the Church Assembly and the Legislative Committee had exceeded their jurisdiction in submitting to the Ecclesiastical Committee a Measure which had not been passed by the Church Assembly according to its Constitution, then, by the practice of the Court, the writs would issue.

A voluntary, unincorporated body was obliged to keep within the powers conferred on it by law, and if it failed to do so the Court would compel it to do so. Both the Church Assembly and the Legislative Committee were Courts within the meaning of the phrase when used in connexion with writs of prohibition and certiorari, and their orders were orders in the same sense.

The Church Assembly derived its powers solely under the Act of 1919. The extent of those powers depended on the true construction of that Act. If matters were dealt with in a way which exceeded those powers, this Court was the only place to which an aggrieved person could go.

Sir Malcolm Macnaghten submitted that the Ecclesiastical Committee had no power to investigate whether a Measure was duly passed, any more than the House of Commons or the House of Lords. The question might depend on the construction of rules. There was no tribunal but this, and if there was no jurisdiction in this Court there was no redress, although something would have the force of law which ought not to have the force of law if right were done.

Mr. Justice Salter.—You are arguing, I presume, on the footing that the Archbishop's ruling was wrong?

Sir Malcolm Macnaghten.—More than that. Not only that his ruling was wrong, but that he failed to appreciate the point.

Counsel read from the shorthand note of the objection by Mr. Patrick White and the Archbishop's ruling upon it.

The Lord Chief Justice.—The Archbishop there states what the objection is, and rules that the new Measure is the same as the original Measure within the meaning of the Standing Orders. How can you possibly say that the Archbishop did not apply his mind to the question?

Sir Malcolm Macnaghten.—Because the question was not whether the amendments were within the Standing Orders, but whether they were within Article 14 (1) of the Constitution.

Mr. Justice Salter.—While you are arguing on the footing that the ruling is wrong, can you deny that it is a ruling?

Sir Malcolm Macnaghten.—If the Archbishop's ruling on the question whether white is black is conclusive, I am out of Court. But I submit that it is the duty of the Court to ascertain whether the complaint of the subject is correct that the Archbishop has decided wrongly.

The Lord Chief Justice.—If you are right, it cannot end here. We may be called on whenever the question arises whether amendments are within the Constitution or Standing Orders, and, whatever the decision of his Grace may be, to review that decision.

Sir Malcolm Macnaghten.—Why not?

The Lord Chief Justice.—I should have thought the question was rather "Why?"

Sir Malcolm Macnaghten referred to the decision in Rex v. Electricity Commissioners (39 The Times L.R., 715; [1924] 1 K.B., 171).

The Lord Chief Justice.—We are very familiar with that case, which is a very long way from this case.

Sir Malcolm Macnaghten said that the Measure of 1923 was to provide a Book of Common Prayer alternative to the Book annexed to the Act of Uniformity, 1662. That Measure did not touch the Book annexed to the Act of 1662. In matters of that sort the importance of alterations depended on what persons considered to be important, and some people thought that the alterations contained in the Measure of 1927 were of vital importance. Sir John Simon had said that all that was done was to extend the permission given to use various services. The parishioner, however, was deprived of the right which he had at present to have the service which he attended performed in accordance with the Act of 1662. Therefore the Measure of 1927 was outside and inconsistent with the Measure of 1923. What had been done was to tack on to a Measure for an alternative Prayer-book a Measure for the alteration of the existing Book.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE pointed out that the Archbishop of Canterbury did not say that the Measure had not been changed. On the contrary, he said that there had been great and undeniable changes in it. He held, however, that the Measure in its final form was not a new Measure.

SIR MALCOLM MACNAGHTEN said that, to arrive at that decision, the Archbishop must have formed an opinion regarding what Article 14 of the Constitution meant. But the interpretation of an Act of Parliament was for the Court and not for any other tribunal. The Archbishop could not give to the Assembly a jurisdiction which it did not possess by deciding wrongly a question of fact.

Sir Malcolm Macnaghten was about to conclude his argument with the observation that, if their Lordships were against him on the question of the finality of the Archbishop's ruling, it would be waste of time to deal with the question whether the writs of prohibition and certiorari would lie. If the Archbishop's ruling was infallible and could not be questioned, he had no more to say. But if the case went further he relied on all the matters in the applicant's affidavit.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—To say that it is infallible is one thing ; to say that it cannot be questioned is quite another ; and you ought even to that to add the words "in this Court." But you should not assume that we are going to decide against you on this point.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—You spoke of the possibility of the matter going further. It would be inconvenient if in the House of Lords it were found that this question had not been argued.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Is it not the great merit of a case in the Court above that it should be so different from the case in the Court below that every one can recognize it as a new Measure ?

MR. JUSTICE SALTER asked how a writ of certiorari or prohibition could be enforced.

SIR MALCOLM MACNAGHTEN referred to Rex v. Electricity Commissioners (supra) ; Rex v. Inhabitants of Glamorgan (1 Lord Raym., 580).

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—Do you say that the obligation to listen in church to something which is not in the Prayer-book of 1662 is analogous to the making of rates to repair bridges ?

SIR MALCOLM MACNAGHTEN.—The Church is the Church established by law, and every one has the right to go to a church and hear the services laid down by the Prayer-book of 1662. There is also the point of view of the ministers who had declared their adherence to the Book of Common Prayer.

Counsel also cited In re Constables of Hipperholme cum Brighouse (5 Dowling and Lowndes, 79), and dealt fully with Rex v. Electricity Commissioners (supra).

Mr. STORRY DEANS, dealing with the question whether the ruling by the Archbishop of Canterbury, as chairman of the Church Assembly, was conclusive on the point that the Measure of 1927 was the same as the Measure of 1923, and therefore had been properly debated, said that whether or not the ruling of the chairman of any meeting or assembly was absolute and unchallengeable depended on the nature and constitution of the meeting or assembly. Convocation was sui generis and an old body that once was part of the Legislature. It had no written constitution. It had unlimited powers and was master of its own procedure. Its chairman, like the Speaker of the House of Commons, was responsible only to the Assembly itself. Where, however, a body was constituted by statute with a strictly limited constitution one had to consider whether the act of the chairman was within the Constitution. The Courts ought to restrain such a body from acting in a manner outside its powers.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, as chairman of the Church Assembly, had no special, absolute authority. He had only the limited class of powers that a chairman of, for instance, a limited company possessed, and there was nothing to prevent his rulings from being impeached in the King's Bench Division (Henderson v. Bank of Australasia (6 The Times L.R., 424 ; 45 Ch. D., 330)). Those rulings affected not a class of persons, not only members of the Church of England, but the public generally, and, if the Archbishop failed to comply with the Constitution, it was important that any member of the public should be able to come to the Court and challenge his ruling by prohibition.

There was a great distinction between cases where a tribunal had to decide whether a certain state of facts which gave it jurisdiction existed and cases where a collateral matter had to be found before the tribunal had jurisdiction. In the latter case the tribunal, by a wrong adjudication on that collateral matter, could not give itself jurisdiction. In the present case the Assembly had met to discuss the merits of the Measure, and then the collateral point arose of the identity of the Measure. If that was wrongly decided the Court would interfere (per Mr. Justice Coleridge, in Bunbury v. Fuller (9 Ex., 111, at p. 140)). Counsel also referred to Reg. v. Nunnelley (E. B. and E., 852).

It would be absurd to contend that either the Archbishop of Canterbury or anyone else was allowed to say that something was that which it plainly was not. If a Measure had been debated and subsequently so changed that it ceased to be the original Measure, and the Archbishop ruled that it was the original Measure, that was not a matter of mere business and procedure.

Mr. STORRY DEANS was entering upon the question whether the writ of prohibition would lie, when

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said :—On prohibition, have you any case which helps you more than that which Sir Malcolm Macnaghten cited yesterday of Rex v. Electricity Commissioners (39 The Times L.R., 715 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 171) ? That is a very modern authority.

Mr. STORRY DEANS.—I have a very ancient authority. In the third edition, 1687, of Williams's Registrum Brevium——

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I did not catch the reference.

Mr. STORRY DEANS.—The title is "Registrum Brevium Tam Originalium Quam Judicialium——

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—That's enough of the title ; what is the point ?

Mr. STORRY DEANS.—At folio 40 is an example of a writ prohibiting a person from visiting a hospital under the jurisdiction of the Crown.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in giving judgment, said that various questions which were doubtless of interest and importance in their proper place had been suggested in the course of the argument, but they did not seem really to arise on the rules under consideration. The Court were not concerned with such questions as (1) what were the merits or demerits of the Constitution recognized by the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act, 1919; (2) whether the true effect of the statute and the Constitution taken together was to subtract large powers from Parliament and to confer on the Bishops far-reaching powers of veto and initiative; (3) whether it was a paradox or a commonplace to say that the offer of an optional alternative was the same thing as the imposition of a compulsory change; (4) whether a Measure which left the Prayer-book intact was the same as one which insisted on fundamental changes in it; or (5) whether the Church Assembly had accepted a Measure which ought never to have been proposed to it, or whether there had been referred to the Legislative Committee a Measure which ought never to be passed into law.

Such questions, whatever their difficulty or importance, were not for this Court. They had not been developed in argument because it had not appeared to be necessary to develop them. If they were to be examined it would be necessary to ascertain not only whether the conclusion of the argument flowed from the premises, but also whether the premises themselves were well founded. In his opinion there was a preliminary question which was of a decisive character. It was whether either the Legislative Committee or the Church Assembly was a body of the kind to which a writ of certiorari or prohibition ought to issue. The circumstances in which those discretionary writs were issued had often been considered. They were restated in concise and clear terms by Lord Justice Atkin in Rex v. Electricity Commissioners (39 The Times L.R., 715; [1924] 1 K.B., 171, at p. 204). Speaking of the matter which was then before the Court of Appeal the Lord Justice said:—

"The matter comes before us on rules for writs of prohibition and certiorari which have been discharged by the Divisional Court. Both writs are of great antiquity, forming part of the process by which the King's Courts restrained Courts of inferior jurisdiction from exceeding their powers. Prohibition restrains the tribunal from proceeding further in excess of jurisdiction; certiorari requires the record or the order of the Court to be sent up to the King's Bench Division, to have its legality inquired into, and, if necessary, to have the order quashed. It is to be noted that both writs deal with questions of excessive jurisdiction, and doubtless in their origin dealt almost exclusively with the jurisdiction of what is described in ordinary parlance as a Court of Justice. But the operation of the writs has extended to control the proceedings of bodies which do not claim to be, and would not be recognized as, Courts of Justice. Wherever any body of persons having legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of subjects, and having the duty to act judicially, act in excess of their legal authority, they are subject to the controlling jurisdiction of the King's Bench Division exercised in these writs."

There followed in the judgment of Lord Justice Atkin references to a series of cases on very different subject-matters in illustration of that cardinal proposition. The question, therefore, which the Court had to ask themselves in the present case was whether either the Church Assembly or the Legislative Committee of the Assembly was a "body of persons having legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of subjects, and having the duty to act judicially." It was to be observed that in that phrase Lord Justice Atkin used "and," not "or." That a body might, therefore, satisfy the test, it was not enough that it should have legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of subjects. There must be added to that characteristic the characteristic that the body had the duty to act judicially. That ingredient in such cases must never be absent. As, in earlier days, those writs were issued only to bodies which, without any harshness of construction, could be called Courts, so to-day they did not issue except to bodies which were under the duty to act in a judicial capacity.

It was neither necessary nor useful to inquire whether the Church Assembly or the Legislative Committee could properly be said to have legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of subjects. That question might well give rise to much controversy. Speaking for himself, he was disposed to take the view that the position of those bodies was rather to set in motion, in a preliminary way, proposals for legislation which might or might not mature into legislation. However that might be, he was satisfied that it was not true to say that either of those bodies had the duty to act judicially.

The opening words of the Constitution, recognized and given the force of law by the statute, were: "There shall be a National Assembly of the Church of England to deliberate on all matters concerning the Church of England and to make provision in respect thereof." As part of the appropriate machinery the Assembly was required to appoint a "'Legislative Committee' including members of all three Houses, to whom all measures which it is desired should pass into law shall be referred." It was further provided that "the Legislative Committee shall thereupon take such action as may be authorized by statute in order that such measure may become law."

In other words, they were dealing with the machinery and internal economy of a deliberative assembly the function of which, so far as the present matter was concerned, was to deal with the earlier stages of that which, if the whole programme were carried out to the end, might become a statute. That did not seem to be a judicial body. It seemed to be a deliberative or legislative body. Neither the Assembly nor its Legislative Committee was a body of the kind to which it would be appropriate to issue either a writ of prohibition or a writ of certiorari. In those circumstances he was of opinion that the rules should be discharged.

Mr. Justice Avory agreed that the rules should be discharged on the ground that neither writ would lie, either to the Church Assembly or to the Legislative Committee in the circumstances of this case. There seemed no ground for distinguishing between the writ of prohibition and that of certiorari. The practical difficulties of enforcing them might not be the same, but the same principle applied to both, the principle laid down in Rex v. Electricity Commissioners (39 The Times L.R., 715; [1924] 1 K.B., 171). He would only add to the passage already read these words from the judgment of Lord Justice Bankes at page 194:—

"These authorities are, I think, conclusive to show that the Court will issue the writ to a body exercising judicial functions, though that body cannot be described as being in any ordinary sense a Court."

Adopting that principle, he was of opinion that neither of these bodies was a body exercising judicial functions, or determining judicially questions affecting the rights of subjects.

The appellation "Legislative Committee" appeared repugnant to the idea that they were exercising judicial functions. In his view the purpose of the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act, 1919, was to authorize the Church Assembly, through its Legislative Committee, to promote legislation subject to certain safeguards. That seemed clear from the preamble to the Act :—

"Whereas the Convocations of Canterbury and York have recommended in Addresses presented to his Majesty on the tenth day of May, 1919, that, subject to the control and authority of his Majesty and of the two Houses of Parliament, powers in regard to legislation touching matters concerning the Church of England shall be conferred on the National Assembly of the Church of England. . . . And whereas it is expedient subject to such control and authority as aforesaid that such powers should be conferred on the Church Assembly, &c."

It was suggested that what had been done in this case had invaded, or purposed to invade, the right of members of the Church to have the Book of Common Prayer used without amendment of any kind. Even if that were so, no right had been judicially determined by either of those bodies.

Standing Order XXXII. (d) provided that, when the House of Bishops had concluded all the stages of a Measure, except the stage of final approval, they were to submit it for the consent of the Convocations of Canterbury and York to its presentation to the Assembly for final approval. If the Convocation of either Province withheld its consent, the Measure could not be proceeded with. It was admitted that no writ of prohibition or certiorari would lie to the Convocation of Canterbury or York, yet, if the applicant were right, the curious result would follow that prohibition might lie to the Assembly after the Measure had been approved by Convocation.

It had been suggested that Reg. v. Archbishop of York (4 The Times L.R., 483 ; 20 Q.B.D., 740) was a decision based only on the antiquity of Convocation, but the true ground of the decision was to be found in the concluding words of the judgment of Lord Coleridge, at page 748 :—

"Such an interference would not only be without a shadow of precedent, but would be inconsistent with the character and constitution of the body with which we are asked to interfere."

Those words seemed just as applicable to the Legislative Committee and to the Church Assembly as they were to the Convocation of York then, and as they would be to Convocation to-day.

That ground being sufficient to dispose of the rules, it was unnecessary to express any opinion upon the other question—namely, whether the decision of the Archbishop of Canterbury was final and conclusive or whether this Court could go behind it. It was sufficient to quote from Reg. v. Archbishop of York (supra), at p. 745 :—

"Whether the decision of the Archbishop was correct in point of law is a matter on which we offer no opinion, an expression which must not be taken as suggesting anything in any way unfavourable to it."

For those reasons he agreed that these rules should be discharged.

Mr. Justice Salter also agreed that the rules should be discharged. The powers conferred on the Church Assembly were powers to initiate legislation. No doubt the Measures which the Church Assembly put forward might affect the rights of the subject, but Parliament had not conferred on it any power to determine judicially any question affecting the rights of subjects. He thought that the Church Assembly had no such power and, therefore, no such duty. Their powers were purely deliberative and legislative, and they had no judicial functions.

The widest statement of the rule with regard to the issue of the writs of prohibition and certiorari was to be found in Rex v. Inhabitants of Glamorgan (1 Ld. Raym., 580) :—"This Court will examine the proceedings of all jurisdictions erected by Act of Parliament." It was to be noted that the word used was "jurisdictions." Chief Justice Holt did not say "the proceedings of all persons or bodies entrusted with powers by Act of Parliament." The meaning to be attached to "jurisdiction" was found in another part of that judgment. Counsel in that case had been arguing that no writ of certiorari lay to remove orders made by commissioners of bankrupts. In the judgment the reason given was : "And as to the commissioners of bankrupts, . . . they had only an authority and not a jurisdiction." He thought that that was the precise point here.

Those observations applied a fortiori to the Legislative Committee. He could not understand how it could be argued that it had judicial functions. It seemed to be no more than the machinery through which the Church Assembly carried out its legislative functions.

The rules were discharged with costs.

Nov. 7.

J. C. HOUGHTON AND CO. v. NOTHARD, LOWE AND WILLS, LIMITED.*

Company—Agreement by director confirmed by secretary—Ostensible authority—Estoppel.

Two rival companies, the P. Company and the W. Company, formed a new company, the respondent company, to take over certain branches of their business of fruit importers, the shares in the new company being held in equal proportion by the old companies, and the board of the new company consisting of two directors of the P. Company, namely, M.L. and his brother, and two directors of the W. Company. By an agreement embodied in a letter of July 22, 1924, between M.L. and the appellants, a firm of fruit brokers, it was arranged that the appellants should make certain advances to the P. Company and should receive all fruit consigned either to the P. Company or to the respondent company and keep back 70 per cent. of the net proceeds in reduction of the advances, and it was stipulated that the respondent company should subscribe to this arrangement. This arrangement was followed by a formal agreement under the seal of the P. Company, but there was no corresponding agreement by the respondent company. The secretary of the respondent company, however, wrote to the appellants purporting to confirm the arrangement. This arrangement was not known to the directors of the respondent company, other than the L. brothers, until some months after it had been put in operation, and, as soon as they became aware of it, it was put an end to. The appellants obtained certain fruit consigned to the respondent company without production of the bills of lading on giving an indemnity to the ship, and they sued the respondents for delivery of the bills of lading. The respondents counterclaimed for the proceeds of fruit belonging to the respondents and not accounted for.

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held (Lord Shaw of Dunfermline dissenting), (1) that there was not in fact any agreement binding on the respondents ; (2) that the respondents were not estopped from denying the existence of the agreement by the knowledge of the two directors who were participators in the wrong done to the respondents, or on the ground that an inspection of the books of the company would have disclosed the arrangement.

In re Hampshire Land Company (12 The Times L.R., 517 ; [1896] 2 Ch., 743) applied.

Decision of the Court of Appeal ([1927] 1 K.B., 246) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal ([1927] 1 K.B., 246) reversing a judgment of Mr. Justice Wright.

The action was brought by the appellants against the respondents for a declaration that the appellants were entitled to certain bills of lading in respect of fruit consigned to the respondents at Liverpool on board certain ships named in the statement of claim during the month of November, 1924, and other consequential relief.

The respondents counterclaimed for the total sum retained by the appellants out of the proceeds of the respondents' fruit.

The facts are fully stated by Lord Dunedin in his judgment.

Mr. Justice Wright gave judgment for the appellants on the claim and counterclaim.

The Court of Appeal (Lords Justices Bankes, Atkin, and Sargant) reversed the decision of the learned Judge.

Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. A. T. Miller, K.C., and Mr. Porter, K.C., appeared for the appellants ; and Mr. Upjohn, K.C., and Mr. R. Fortune for the respondents.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords : The appellants in this case are fruit brokers and the respondents are a fruit importing company. The action which was raised by the appellants was for delivery of certain bills of lading. This was met by denial of the right to ask for them and by a counterclaim for a sum of money which has eventually been settled at £19,757 8s. 7d., being the proceeds of fruit, belonging to the respondents and sold by the appellants, for which they had not accounted. The learned trial Judge gave judgment in favour of the appellants on both points, the Court of Appeal reversed his decision on both points, hence this appeal.

To make the case intelligible, it is necessary to detail the history of the parties. As regards the appellants little need be said ; they are an ordinary firm of well-established fruit brokers. The business of a fruit broker is to sell fruit for the importer to the various retail dealers in the United Kingdom. The fruit is bought abroad by the importer and consigned to him, bills of lading being made out in his name as consignee. In many cases the fruit actually arrives before the bills of lading, and as fruit is a perishable commodity it is common practice for the broker, who has been advised of the consignment expected on a certain ship, to go to the ship and get immediate delivery, giving an obligation to the ship to present the bills of lading when received and giving an indemnity against any possible claim if the bills of lading are not forthcoming. It is also a common practice for an agreement to be come to between the broker and the importer by which the broker finances the importer by making advances and recoups himself by being allowed to retain the proceeds of the fruit when sold.

The position of the respondents needs more explanation and history. There was a firm of fruit importers known as George Wills and Company, which had been formed into a company called Wills and Co., Limited. There was another firm of fruit importers called Nothard and Lowe, which had been formed into a company called Nothard and Lowe Fruit Preserving Company, Limited. Although this was the proper title of the company, the company was generally known and spoken of as Nothard and Lowe. The two companies, finding that they were apt to be in competition, agreed to eliminate this competition in certain branches of the fruit trade. To effect this object they formed another company called Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited, who are the respondents in this case. This company had within its memorandum very wide powers, but practically it was to be a fruit importing company. The shares were practically all held in substantially equal proportions by the two companies which had arranged for its formation. Two of the directors, namely, Messrs. Walker and Braund, were taken from the George Wills Company, they being directors of it, and the other two directors were taken from the Preserving Company, being directors of it.

Contemporaneously with the formation of the company, a tripartite agreement was entered into between the two old companies and the new. By this agreement the nomination of the directors as aforesaid and the equal contribution to the capital was provided for. Fresh fruit was defined as all fruit except tomatoes, in all parts of the world except Italy, Spain, Portugal, Nova Scotia, the Canary Islands, and France. Then each of the two older companies undertook to leave the trade in fruit, as defined, exclusively to the new company, they being free to continue their own trade in all other classes of fruit.

For the purposes of this case it may therefore be stated that American apples were the province of the new company, Nova Scotian apples the province of the other companies, and, in particular, of the Preserving Company which I shall hereafter designate by its trade soubriquet of Nothard and Lowe. It was also provided that the new company should have the benefit of Nothard and Lowe's premises and the use of its personnel. A certain payment was to be made in return for these services. The date of the registration of the new company was April, 1920.

The new company started business. By arrangement Maurice Lowe was the director to whom were entrusted the arrangements as to brokerage. In this matter George Lowe was associated with him. Walker looked after the shipping arrangements and the buying of fruit for importation. For some time brokers other than the appellants were employed, but in May, 1924, Maurice Lowe approached Mr. Dart, who represented the appellants, with a view to making a brokerage arrangement as to apples. The apples he wished dealt with were American apples, the property of the respondents, and Nova Scotian apples, the property of Nothard and Lowe. As Nothard and Lowe were throughout acting for the respondent company, Maurice Lowe was in the habit of dealing with the two sets of apples together. Now at this time the Nothard and Lowe Company was hard pressed for money. This was, of course, known to the two Lowes but was not known to the other two directors, Walker and Braund. Maurice Lowe and Dart had several meetings which were spoken to by Dart before the trial Judge. Maurice Lowe was not examined. It is, however, unnecessary to consider the exact terms of Dart's evidence because undoubtedly the result of all the preliminary arrangements was reduced to writing in a letter which passed between the two contracting parties. The final position was expressed in a letter of July 16, 1924, written by Dart to Maurice Lowe. It is in the following terms :—

"Dear Mr. Lowe,—I think it well to confirm the conversation we had on Monday in writing, to see if we understand each other correctly. I wish to commence by thanking you for the offer of the business and feel that if we once start working together we shall neither of us have anything to regret.

"I understand that you wish my firm to advance to Messrs. Nothard and Lowe £10,000 now, and another £5,000 on 25th August and a final £5,000 some time in September, making a total of £20,000, and that you would give us the deeds of your packing houses as security, which are worth some £13,000. Presumably, these documents you will have recorded at the Registry of Deeds in the usual way. You will guarantee a minimum of 50,000 barrels of Nova Scotian apples. Besides your Nova Scotian fruit, we will receive free of advance all the goods consigned to Messrs. Nothard, Lowe and Wills at Liverpool, and the total of the two firms would amount to about 150,000 packages. We would keep back 70 per cent. of the net proceeds whether the goods belonged to your firm or to Messrs. Nothard, Lowe and Wills. I should presume the arrangement with respect to Messrs. Nothard, Lowe and Wills would have to be subscribed to by them.

"As regards your Marine Insurance Policy, presumably you have something better than the ordinary F.P.A. clause, and that you are covered against breakdown of steamer or delay in arriving at its destination.

"The interest would be ½ per cent. over Bank rate with the minimum of 5 per cent. from the date of advance to the time of making up account sales.

"I sincerely hope that you have made rapid progress and are now feeling better.

"With my very kindest regards,

"Yours very truly,

"J. W. Dart.

Following upon this an agreement was made and executed by Nothard and Lowe, as the Preserving Company, to which agreement Maurice Lowe, George Lowe, and a Mr. Prescott who was also secretary of the respondent company, as individuals, were associated as guarantors. The material parts of the agreement were as follows. By Clause 1, the plaintiffs were to advance to the Preserving Company, at various dates, sums amounting in all to £20,000 ; by Clause 2, the Preserving Company were, in security of these advances, to deliver to the plaintiffs the title deeds of certain premises in Nova Scotia belonging to them ; by Clause 3, the individual guarantors guaranteed the loan to the extent of £10,000 ; by Clause 4, the Preserving Company appointed the appellants sole brokers for its fruit during the season 1924-25 and guaranteed 50,000 barrels of Nova Scotian apples. Then Clauses 5 and 6 must be quoted in full :—

"Clause 5.—Seventy per cent. of the net proceeds which shall arise from the sale of fruit so consigned to the agents after deducting the usual brokers' commission and sale expenses shall be retained by them and applied in or towards repayment of the said advances and the balance of 30 per cent. of such net proceeds shall be payable by the agents to the company forthwith on the making up of the account of any and every such sale.

"Clause 6.—For the consideration aforesaid the company and the guarantors hereby jointly and severally undertake that the agents shall be entitled to retain and apply in or towards repayment of the said advances 70 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sale of goods sold by the agents on behalf of or as agents for Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited."

This agreement was executed under the seal of the Preserving Company and by the signatures of the individual guarantors ; a counterpart of the agreement was executed by the appellants.

Finally, on the same day, the following letter was despatched and it was received by the appellants.

"For Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited.
"A. V. Prescott, Secretary."

The initial advance of £10,000 was made and shipment then began both of American and Nova Scotian apples. The whole was treated by Maurice Lowe as in one account. The appellants first retained 70 per cent. of all the sales which were effected ; eventually further advances were made and by agreement with Maurice Lowe the appellants retained the whole proceeds of the sales of the fruit in respect of which these advances were made. The whole of the advances were applied by Maurice Lowe or George Lowe to meeting the necessities of the Preserving Company and were not put, to any extent, to the credit of the respondent company.

It will have been observed from the whole recital that there was no meeting of directors or minute of the respondent company sanctioning these arrangements and no agreement under seal of the company, agreeing to, or ratifying them.

I shall now turn to the movements of the directors. Walker was absent up till August 9. By that time Maurice Lowe had left the country and he did not return till October. Braund had been in London in early August and then was away till the third week of September. During the whole time, therefore, there had been no meeting of directors and neither Walker nor Braund had met Maurice Lowe. After Walker got back in August, early in September he had a conversation with George Lowe as he found that the advances from George Wills and Company, his company, to the Preserving Company, were rather large. George Lowe explained that owing to a strike in Covent Garden there had been great difficulty in recovering accounts and Walker was satisfied with the explanation. There was no conversation as to the position of the respondent company and the Preserving Company. Maurice Lowe having returned in the middle of October, a few days after this his accountant, whose name was Nash, applied for a further advance from George Wills and Company to the Preserving Company. Walker refused the request and it was renewed by Maurice Lowe. Maurice Lowe not being able to give satisfactory explanations why the money was wanted, Walker reported the matter to the board of George Wills and Company and they then instructed their own accountant, Curtis, to look into the books of the two companies. This was about October 10. As a result of the investigation, Walker and Braund became aware, for the first time, that the advances by the plaintiffs had been entirely applied to the needs of the Preserving Company and that the Preserving Company was hopelessly insolvent. As a result, a directors' meeting of the respondent company was held on November 7, and on that day the following minute was passed :—

"It was resolved—No further loans by Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited, to any other company to be made and no proceeds of any of Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited's, fruit to be diverted from the company's funds and no further payments of any sort to be made to the Nothard and Lowe Fruit Preserving Company, Limited, or their subsidiary companies.

"Present : Messrs. M. A. Lowe (chairman), F. W. Braund, H. W. Walker, G. N. Lowe, and the Secretary."

After this Curtis called Walker's attention to the retention by the plaintiffs of the proceeds of the respondents' apples and said that he had been given to understand that there was some sort of agreement under which this had been done. Upon that Walker had a meeting with Maurice Lowe, who then produced the agreement of July 22. He did not then make any mention of the letter of the same date. Walker, looking at Clause 6 of the agreement, said that it purported to make the company a third party to the agreement without their seal and that as it stood it was not binding on the company. A few days afterwards the letter of July 22 was produced for the first time. Walker then repudiated the idea of the company being bound ; a directors' meeting was held on November 14 and George Lowe was removed from the board.

At this time there had been a delivery of apples to the plaintiffs of which, as explained above, the bills of lading had not arrived. The plaintiffs applied for the bills of lading and were refused, whereupon, on November 21, the plaintiffs raised the present action. This was met by a counterclaim for the sums due in respect of the company's apples which had been sold by the plaintiffs and of which the proceeds had been retained, either to the extent of 70 per cent. or altogether, as set forth above.

The real question in the case is, therefore, whether the arrangement contained in the agreement of July 22 and the letter of the same date bind the company. Viewed as documents it is clear that neither the one nor the other can have that effect. The company is not a party to the agreement and the arrangement is of such a character as to be quite beyond the power of a secretary to impose on the company, there having admittedly been no meeting of directors to authorize the despatch of the letter.

The case of the plaintiffs is rested on quite different grounds and may be stated thus. It is a well-known custom of the fruit trade that the importers should make arrangements with brokers for advances, the latter being allowed to retain from the sales the amount of such advances. With the sanction of the whole of the directors of the company, Nothard and Lowe, or the Preserving Company, of which Maurice Lowe was the acting director in such matters, were empowered to make brokerage arrangements for the company. True it is that such an authority to conclude brokerage arrangements would not authorize the impledging of the company's apples for another person's debt. But then, to the knowledge of the directors, Nothard and Lowe acted not only for the company but also for themselves in the sale of Nova Scotian apples. Accordingly the authorization would include any arrangement which Nothard and Lowe made as to advances to them as managers of the pooled apples of the company and of the preserving company. It is said that that was the arrangement made and that it binds the company.

Now various arguments may be directed against this contention, but without stating them it is obvious that the keystone of the arch is the fact that the advances in respect of which retention is said to be authorized were made to Nothard and Lowe, as managers of the pooled apples. If the advance was not made to them in that capacity, but simply in their capacity of the Preserving Company, the whole argument breaks down.

My Lords, I am of opinion that the Court of Appeal was right in holding that the advances made by the plaintiffs in respect of their agreement with Maurice Lowe were knowingly made to the Preserving Company as the Preserving Company ; and they looked to Maurice Lowe to obtain additionally the sanction of the respondent company to allow their apples to be subject to retention for these advances. This is clear from the first. In the letter of July 16, Dart says, in specifying the arrangements, "I should presume the arrangement with respect to Messrs. Nothard, Lowe and Wills will have to be subscribed by them." Then came the formal agreement to which the Preserving Company was a party and the defendant company was not. The advances are to be made to the party of the first part, i.e., the Preserving Company, and that they are not made to them as managers of a combined stock is made quite clear by Clause 6, which treats the binding of the defendant company as a separate arrangement which the Preserving Company is to secure. It is perfectly plain from this that the appellants were still in the same mind that they were in when they wrote the letter of July 16. They knew they were making the advances to the Preserving Company and that therefore in order to pledge the property of the defendant company for that debt they would need special authorization. They believed that Nothard and Lowe could get them that authorization and they bound the Preserving Company to get it for them. They, in the sequel, rested content with the letter signed by the secretary. In doing so they took a risk which they must have known—namely, the risk that the letter was unauthorized. They took care to bind the Preserving Company by the seal of the company ; they neglected that precaution with the defendant company and they must suffer for it. Unfortunately not only Maurice Lowe but Prescott was interested in procuring the arrangement, for Prescott was one of the individual guarantors under the agreement. I do not wish to use unnecessarily strong language or to sit in moral judgment on the persons concerned, but all that happened is but another instance of how perilous a thing it is for persons who are in a fiduciary position to entangle themselves with absolutely conflicting interests. The interests of the two Lowes and Prescott were bound up with the Preserving Company and their duty to the defendant company suffered in consequence.

The plaintiffs, for whom one cannot help feeling sympathy, for they were betrayed by their confidence, have, however, another ground of action—namely, estoppel. The class of estoppel is estoppel by conduct amounting to acquiescence. They say that the agreement was known to the company through the Lowes, two of the directors, and was allowed to continue, and that if it had been disclosed after the initial advance that the arrangement, so far as the defendant company was concerned, was unauthorized, they would have made no further advances. They say further that apart from the knowledge of the Lowes an inspection of the books would have disclosed the arrangement, and that the company were guilty of negligence in not having examined their own books.

The state of knowledge of the various directors has already been set forth. It is quite clear that the only directors who did know were the Lowes, who were active agents in leading the plaintiffs to advances on an arrangement which they knew had not been authorized by the company.

My Lords, there can obviously be no acquiescence without knowledge of the fact as to which acquiescence is said to have taken place. The person who is sought to be estopped is here a company, an abstract conception, not a being who has eyes and ears. The knowledge of the company can only be the knowledge of persons who are entitled to represent the company. It may be assumed that the knowledge of directors is in ordinary circumstances the knowledge of the company. The knowledge of a mere official like the secretary would only be the knowledge of the company if the thing of which knowledge is predicated was a thing within the ordinary domain of the secretary's duties. But what if the knowledge of the director is the knowledge of a director who is himself particeps criminis, that is, if the knowledge of an infringement of the right of the company is only brought home to the man who himself was the artificer of such infringement? Common sense suggests the answer but authority is not wanting.

In In re Hampshire Land Company (12 The Times L.R., 517; [1896] 2 Ch., 743, at p. 749) Lord Justice Vaughan Williams expresses himself thus: "If Wills had been guilty of a fraud, the personal knowledge of Wills of the fraud that he had committed upon the company would not have been knowledge of the society of the facts constituting that fraud; because common sense at once leads one to the conclusion that it would be impossible to infer that the duty, either of giving or receiving notice, will be fulfilled where the common agent is himself guilty of fraud. It seems to me that if you assume here that Mr. Wills was guilty of irregularity—a breach of duty in respect of these transactions—the same inference is to be drawn as if he had been guilty of fraud. I do not know, I am sure, whether he was guilty of actual fraud; but whether his conduct amounted to fraud or to breach of duty, I decline to hold that his knowledge of his own fraud or of his own breach of duty is, under the circumstances, the knowledge of the company."

The same view is to be found in the case of Lacey v. Hill (4 Ch. D., 537). This law, in my view, applies to the present case. The only knowledge brought home to the company is through the Lowes and the secretary. They were all parties to the arrangement which was a fraud on the true interests of the company.

It only remains to consider whether negligence on the part of the unincriminated directors can found an estoppel against the company. I am of opinion that it cannot. It is no part of a director's duty to inspect accounts every day. There was nothing in the circumstances to arouse the suspicions of the two directors as to the existence of any such agreement. As soon as they were all at home the whole thing was found out and the arrangement stopped, and to hold that there was estoppel because Walker, during the month of August, near the end of it, did not inspect the accounts and find out the arrangement would be, in my opinion, going much beyond what has ever been decided against a company. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right and that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs, and I move accordingly.

Viscount Sumner (read by Lord Blanesburgh).—My Lords: I agree in the motion proposed by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack.

The appellants' claim to retain as against the respondents part of the sale proceeds of their fruit rests on express contract or, in the alternative, on estoppel. The claim in contract really depends on the effect of the appellants' letter of July 16, 1924, to Mr. Maurice Lowe.

This person, who was at the same time a director of the respondent company and managing director of the company which has been spoken of as Nothard and Lowe, had been the intermediary who discussed with Mr. Dart, the appellants' representative, the terms on which the appellants would act as brokers for fruit imported by the respondent company and by Nothard and Lowe respectively. The terms, which the appellants were willing to agree upon as the result of this discussion, were reduced by them into writing in this letter and were, in accordance with its terms, accepted in writing respectively by Nothard and Lowe and by the respondent company under the signature of Mr. A. V. Prescott, their secretary, on July 22, 1924.

There is in my view no evidence on which it could be held that the appellants dealt with Nothard and Lowe and the respondents as clients, who were co-contractors, or agreeing with them to regard the whole business as done on their joint account. Had it been so, the appellants would have lent money to them as joint borrowers, against whom they could equally exercise a right of set-off without any special and inconsistent stipulation, such as they introduced. Had the two companies been engaged in a joint account, a loss on the respondents' apples might have been made good out of profits made on Nothard and Lowe's imports and they must both have taken their share of the money advanced by the appellants. On Mr. Dart's letter it is quite plain (1) that the consignments to be dealt with were known to be the several property of Nothard and Lowe and of the respondent company, as the case might be; (2) that the sales were to be made for the respective owners severally and not on any joint account ; (3) that all the money to be lent by the appellants was to be lent to Nothard and Lowe and to be secured by them and none of it was to be lent to the respondent company ; and (4) that the appellants were not willing to take and did not ask for or get the acceptance of their terms from Nothard and Lowe or from Maurice Lowe on behalf of and as agents for the respondent company. They were not prepared to give credit to him, but required the latter company's independent written assent in their own names. We need not, therefore, consider the extent of the authority, if any, which Nothard and Lowe may have had to act for the respondent company generally and to bind them in other matters, for it was not exercised on this occasion. When the nature of the bargain under discussion is considered, it becomes obvious that such an authority could not be inferred or implied, but would be credible only if expressed plainly and in writing. It is plain, too, that Mr. Dart saw, as any business man would see, that nothing but the respondent company's own written acceptance could be relied on and hence it was stipulated for. The bargain proposed was that the appellants, instead of paying over to the respondents their full sale proceeds, less commission, should be at liberty to retain them up to 70 per cent. to satisfy any unpaid balance of the loans they had made to the other company. They were to apply the money of their creditors and clients, the respondent company, to satisfy claims on their other debtors, if they should be in default. No wonder Mr. Dart asked for something signed in the name of the respondent company itself. No wonder Maurice Lowe did not put his name to this bargain on the respondent company's behalf. He left that to the secretary.

In the result, however, the letter that the appellants got, signed only by their secretary, could not bind the respondents, nor has it been contended that it did. The secretary had not, as such, any power to bind the respondent company by his signature to such an arrangement. Who had that authority, was a question which depended on their Articles, and it was the appellants' business to ascertain from them where the power resided and to see that it purported to have been exercised. Under their Articles only the Board of Directors could have bound the respondent company in this matter.

My Lords, I think Mr. Dart must at the time have had his doubts whether Mr. Prescott had any authority to bind his company at all. Why else should clauses 5 and 6 of the agreement of July 22, 1924, have been entered into ? Why should the appellant company take the guarantee of Mr. Prescott himself, among others, that the appellants should be entitled to retain and apply the moneys in question ? If Mr. Prescott's signature bound the respondent company, his guarantee was superfluous. I think this obvious intimation to the appellants, that the respondents were not contractually bound, may be material on the question of estoppel, for I doubt if the appellants, knowing so much, can be said to have changed their position on the faith of any standing by on the respondent company's part. I think they acted throughout in the hope that Prescott and the Lowes would be able to see them safely through.

The appellants' case on the estoppel point is, that the respondent company, knowing that they were acting on the faith of the contract which purported to have been concluded between them, stood by and, apparently with assent and at any rate without objection, allowed them to change their position for the worse, upon the footing that the purported contract was valid. Of course, if this is made out, the respondents are beyond question estopped from disputing the contract.

How do the appellants essay to prove that the respondent company knew that the alleged agreement purported to have been made and had been acted on accordingly ; a fact which they must establish or fail ? They rely on two circumstances. One is, that the parties to the guarantee, Maurice Lowe and George Lowe, directors, and Prescott, secretary, of the respondent company, knew all about it. The other is that account sales were rendered to the respondent company, in which 70 per cent. of the proceeds of their goods were treated as attributable to the extinction of the loans to Nothard and Lowe and were retained accordingly, of which corresponding entries to the like effect were then made by their clerks in the respondent company's books. About the first there is no doubt. Of course the persons who gave the guarantee knew of the transaction which was its subject, and, as the respondent company's fruit department was managed by Maurice Lowe with the concurrence of the other two, we may assume their knowledge of the fact that the business was proceeding as arranged, and that the respondent company's books contained entries in accordance with it. The question is whether either of these things or both carry the appellants any farther.

When the case is clearly understood I think these entries in the respondent company's books become a mere matter of prejudice. Of course they are evidence against the respondent company, but evidence of what ? Not of the company's knowledge of the 70 per cent. arrangement nor of the system on which the account sales were being prepared. Neither did they constitute any representation to the appellants, for they were never communicated to them. At any time they might have been corrected or cancelled without affecting the appellants' rights, nor was it on the faith of these entries, of which they were unaware, that the appellants acted or changed their position at all. The documents that really matter are the account sales. They did convey to those affected with knowledge of their contents what the appellants were doing and claimed to be entitled to do, but a company is not, without more, deemed to know what every letter received by it contains, so as to be estopped from asserting its rights unless those contents are promptly challenged.

There is a further circumstance that I think can be put aside as immaterial. The appellants, it is said, handed to Maurice Lowe the advances that they made and such sale proceeds as they received and did not themselves retain, and must be deemed to have done so treating him as the agent not only for Nothard and Lowe but for the respondent company. They certainly did not pay to him the money lent otherwise than as the official of Nothard and Lowe, and I do not know to whom else they were to hand sale proceeds intended for the respondent company, whose fruit business he managed, but what then ? This, if it is to amount to anything, must be equivalent to a plea of payment. I cannot see that this is sound in fact. How could anything done by the appellants alter or enlarge Maurice Lowe's duty towards or his authority from the respondent company ? How could they relieve themselves from their own liability by leaving Maurice Lowe to "adjust" matters, as it is called, between the two companies with which he was connected ? The point is that they have sold the respondent company's goods for them and have kept back part of the money, and this they have to justify.

They were brokers for the respondent company and they must settle with the respondent company themselves and not with other people. If the result is that they have to pay over again moneys that they have paid already, this is no answer. Those who pay the wrong persons always have to pay over again when the right ones come forward and get justice. Let the appellants sue their guarantors, Prescott and the Lowes, if they are worth proceeding against. In truth this contention is a mere phrase. The appellants are not asked to pay over again. They have not already paid the proceeds of the respondent company's apples to others. The fact is that they have never paid over the sale proceeds in question at all. They lent their own money to others and they kept the respondent company's money themselves. It is plain law and there are no hardships and no equities about it.

Has knowledge then been brought home to the respondent company on which to found the alleged standing-by? In the case of a natural person, if information is intelligibly conveyed to and received by him, its source, whether a servant or a stranger, whether he is high or low, matters little, if at all. With an artificial incorporated person it must necessarily be otherwise, for an impersonal corporation cannot read or hear except by the eyes and ears of others. Who are to be the organs, by which it receives knowledge so as to affect its rights, may be specially determined by the articles of its constitution, but otherwise, in a matter where knowledge may lead to a modification of the company's rights according as it is or is not followed by action, the knowledge which is relevant is that of directors themselves, since it is their board that deals with the company's rights. The mind, so to speak, of a company is not reached or affected by information merely possessed by its clerks, nor is it deemed automatically to know everything that appears in its ledgers. What a director knows or ought in the course of his duty to know may be the knowledge of the company, for it may be deemed to have been duly used so as to lead to the action which a fully informed corporation would proceed to take on the strength of it.

There are two exceptions, however, to this rule, which are now material. The directors, other than the Lowes, did not in fact know till a late date what the Lowes had been doing, and when they found out they took prompt and proper action. The circumstances have been detailed by my noble and learned friend. It is plain, and I think uncontested, that they could not have been made personally liable for any neglect or misfeasance, and, if so, the company cannot be affected as if it had known from them what it neither knew nor could have been expected to know under the system of domestic management established by the company. On the other hand, the Lowes knew everything all along, and if, by their keeping the matter to themselves, their company could be estopped from denying that it was bound by the 70 per cent. arrangement, they would have relieved themselves and Mr. Prescott from personal liability under their guarantee at the sacrifice of their company's interests. Their silence was accordingly a notable breach of duty. It has long been recognized that it would be contrary to justice and common sense to treat the knowledge of such persons as that of their company as if one were to assume that they would make a clean breast of their delinquency. Hence, for the purpose of estopping the company, some knowledge other than theirs has to be brought home to other directors, who can be presumed not to be concerned to suppress it. This was laid down, following earlier cases, in In re Hampshire Land Company (12 The Times L.R., 517 ; [1896] 2 Ch., 743, at p. 749) and was even then treated as incontestable. So far as I know it has never been doubted since. If so, there was in this case no standing by and no estoppel. The cases on which the above propositions are based were not contested by Sir John Simon in his reply, nor were any authorities cited which conflicted with them. It is not for us to dispute settled law, and accordingly the appeal fails.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—My Lords : A company of the name of George Wills and Sons, Limited, and another company of the name of the Nothard and Lowe Fruit Preserving Company, Limited, had for some time traded in fresh fruit in Great Britain and other parts of the world in competition with each other. In the year 1920 they were minded to form a new company, "being desirous of promoting and protecting their trade and of facilitating and economizing the working of such trade." These words are taken from the preamble of an agreement of date July 14 of that year, and the preamble states, and states accurately, that they, the two companies mentioned, "have been instrumental in forming a new company of which they are the sole shareholders." The new company was in short a combine and will be so called in this judgment.

Certain business, however, and this is a matter which has caused some confusion, was, so to speak, reserved for the Preserving Company. For the purposes of this case the trade in apples purchased in Nova Scotia was trade reserved for Nothard, Lowe and Company, that is to say, for the Preserving Company. Other trade, including the large American trade, was to be the business of the combine.

In the practical working out of this scheme, it was expedient and advantageous that various other things should be done. In the first place, the combine should be really a combine in the sense of belonging to the same body of shareholders as those of the former companies. This was accomplished. Next, the interests of the two companies in the combine were practically halved. Thirdly, the purchases coming, say, from the other side of the Atlantic should be slumped so far as carriage was concerned, and from the first this also was done, the goods from Nova Scotia and those from other parts being shipped in the same vessels and dealt with on arrival under the same agency.

Fourthly, as to management, the directors appointed were—two from the Wills company, namely, Messrs. Walker and Braund, and two from the Preserving Company, namely, Messrs. Maurice Lowe and George Lowe. As will be afterwards seen, Mr. Maurice Lowe and Mr. George Lowe were directors, the former being the chairman of the Preserving Company, and Mr. Maurice Lowe became also chairman and George Lowe a director of the combine. Fifthly, when the apples arrived in this country they were, according to the practice of the trade, sold through brokers. Lastly, according to the ordinary practice of this trade, advances were made by brokers on the security of the goods to be sold and accounts were sent forward.

The new company or combine occupies the same office as the Preserving Company. Mr. Maurice Lowe being, as already stated, chairman of both companies and Mr. George Lowe a director. When the accounts arrived it was the duty of Mr. Maurice Lowe and his brother to segregate the business done and the receipts therefor according to the rights of the respective companies. With all that the brokers had no concern.

I have no doubt whatsoever that in this distribution of the payments transmitted to London the defendant company treated, and were justified in treating, the Preserving Company as its agent not only for the receipt of the advances of their brokers but for the distribution as against the appropriate cargoes of the moneys received from those brokers for the respective cargoes. It is not unnatural that the letters should pass to and from the same office sometimes in the name of the one company and sometimes in the name of the other.

The defence and counterclaim by the defendants, however, set up the case that there was no such agency for the combine and they contend that the plaintiff brokers, who unquestionably made the advances as against the total cargoes as already described, must strike such advances out as against the combine and account to the combine for the proceeds of the apples realized in this country belonging to it and make payments therefor. The result would be, of course, that so far as the plaintiffs, the brokers, were concerned they would be in a position of making double payment in respect of the same goods. And so far as the combine is concerned, the result would be still more startling. It did not act as its own brokers, it required brokers not only to obtain delivery and realize the goods, but to make the advances necessary to release them. All this was done, and the combine now claims that it shall be credited with the goods and not debited with the advances made against them (without which they would not have been delivered).

In my opinion this demand of the combine is a mere juggle to defeat the plain equities of the case, and Mr. Justice Wright properly declined to sanction it.

The Preserving Company, being in embarrassed circumstances, has for some time past been putting the advances from the plaintiffs (unknown to them) to their own, the Nothard, Lowe, account and not passing the payments, so it is alleged, into the combine, or Nothard, Lowe and Wills, account. In the view which I take of the case, it is accordingly most necessary to see what were the actual arrangements when the advances from the plaintiffs were got.

I hold that the circumstances cannot be explained on any other footing than that these advances were made to both companies under the combined agency, that the responsibility for distribution inter se of the proceeds of cargoes lay with Nothard, Lowe and Co. and, particularly, with Maurice Lowe, the director of both companies, who, so far as the combine was concerned, was the agent for receipt and distribution as already mentioned.

So far as the outside markets were concerned, this is how their advertisements represented them :—

"Nothard and Lowe and Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited, Cotton's Wharf, Tooley-street, S.E.1 ; green fruit importers. We specialize in apples from all parts of the world, especially from Nova Scotia and then from various other parts, namely, Ontario, British Columbia, &c."

It is clear that a combination in the closest sense is thus intimated to traders.

The evidence and correspondence are voluminous, but after hearing the full argument I am of opinion that the judgment reached by Mr. Justice Wright, upon both the facts and the law of the case, is sound.

I see no reason for doubting the evidence of Mr. Dart, the senior partner in the plaintiff firm ; it was uncontradicted, neither of the Messrs. Lowe giving evidence in the case ; and what was said by Mr. Dart is confirmed both by the correspondence and by the acts of the parties. There being a desire to transfer the brokerage business to the plaintiff firm, Mr. Dart in December, 1923, met Mr. Walker, one of the directors who had formerly been a director of the Wills Company, and, as Mr. Walker himself states in his evidence, "I told him (Mr. Dart) that Mr. Maurice Lowe was looking after the selling end of the business." Without any doubt Mr. Maurice Lowe was doing, and continued to do, this. Mr. Dart's account of the interview is that he, Walker, said, "You do not sell any of our apples and Maurice Lowe has the control of our apples and I will talk to him." It does not appear to me to be reasonable to say that Mr. Maurice Lowe was represented to be acting merely for his own firm, of which Mr. Walker was not a partner. The view taken was that which was reasonable, namely, that Mr. Maurice Lowe was representing the new company and all the business done, whether by the old or by the new.

It may now be mentioned that this manner of trading with brokers and of pooling and adjustment of accounts was by no means new, but had continued for years. One of the agents of the combine concerned was the Manchester Fruit Brokers, Limited, who, on December 19, 1922, wrote to Nothard and Lowe, "As we have only the one account in our ledger, namely, in the name of Nothard and Lowe, we shall feel much obliged if you will kindly endorse the bills of lading accordingly in order to regularize matters." To this Messrs. Nothard and Lowe replied :—

"We are afraid we cannot do this as the bills of lading are made out to Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited, and if we were to endorse them as Nothard and Lowe we would not be able to take delivery of same.

"With reference to this, it will not matter in any way if you place it to Nothard and Lowe's account ; we will adjust and place to the proper account when we receive same from you."

Similarly, in October, 1923, Messrs. James Adams, Sons and Co., of Liverpool, wrote to Mr. Maurice Lowe :—

"As arranged, we send you herewith cheque for £5,000 and perhaps you will be good enough to let me know if it is your wish that we should keep all your consignments under one account. So far the account in our books appears as Nothard and Lowe, and it would perhaps be more convenient if we continued in this way."

The answer to this on the following day was, "Many thanks for yours enclosing £5,000 to hand, and I shall be glad if you will kindly keep this under one account, as it makes things easier and we can do the adjusting this end." This was signed, "per pro Nothard and Lowe, B. Metcalfe for Maurice A. Lowe." It may be noticed that the one account which is here referred to is an account headed "Messrs. Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited."

These instances are only given to show the completeness of what may be called the combination of the new firm, and the duty which it, through its chairman, undertook of adjusting the accounts as between the new and the old firm. I decline to believe that this course of business, including the dealings with large quantities of goods and the receipt of large remittances from brokers, which remittances were adjusted by the new firm in accordance with the rights of each constituent part, was not perfectly well known to all engaged in managing the affairs of the combined company, including its directors. The case, accordingly, is not one in which it can be alleged that there was any novelty in brokers' making these advances upon the goods of both companies and dealing on joint account.

This being the ordinary course of business, the transactions with which the present case has to do may be said to have begun by the following letter, written by Mr. Dart to Mr. Maurice Lowe :—

"I understand that you wish my firm to advance to Messrs. Nothard and Lowe £10,000 now, and another £5,000 on August 25, and a final £5,000 some time in September, making a total of £20,000, and that you would give us the deeds of your packing houses as security, which are worth some £13,000. Presumably, these documents you will have recorded at the Registry of Deeds in the usual way. You will guarantee a minimum of 15,000 barrels of Nova Scotian apples. Besides your Nova Scotian fruit, we will receive free of advance all the goods consigned to Messrs. Nothard, Lowe and Wills at Liverpool and the total of the two firms would amount to about 150,000 packages. We would keep back 70 per cent. of the net proceeds whether the goods belonged to your firm or to Messrs. Nothard, Lowe and Wills. I should presume the arrangement with respect to Messrs. Nothard, Lowe and Wills would have to be subscribed to by them."

On the 17th, Mr. Maurice Lowe replied :—

"We agree that we will give you all goods consigned to the firm of Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited, at Liverpool. . . . You could keep back 70 per cent. of the goods whether they belonged to our firm or to Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited."

And, on July 22, Messrs. Nothard, Lowe and Wills wrote by their secretary to the appellants as follows:—

"Dear Sirs,—We confirm the arrangement made with you to the effect that the proceeds of any shipments of fruit sold by you on our behalf are to be placed by you in reduction of advances made by Messrs. Nothard and Lowe in the same proportion and on the same basis as the proceeds of shipments handled by you on behalf of Messrs. Nothard and Lowe. We shall, in accordance, credit the proceeds of such sales against the advances above referred to."

It seems to me that the three things, the pooling of the cargoes, the making of advances by the plaintiffs in respect of the cargoes so pooled, and the doing so on one account are proved to have been matters of agreement as to the manner in which this business should be conducted. Had the plaintiffs not conformed to that agreement and had they declined to make the advances, a question might have arisen as to the respective powers of those signing these letters for the respective companies, and the companies might have declined to have been bound. But when the advances were made, all such defects of authorization appear to me to have been cleared away ; the assumedly inchoate arrangements became an agreement which was complete. The principle of such completion is the familiar one both in England and in Scotland, as approved and explained by Lord Selborne in Maddison v. Alderson (8 App. Cas., 467).

I shall show in a few moments that the large sums mentioned in these letters, amounting in all to £20,000, were actually advanced. The payments were accepted and goods were realized on one account and the entire transactions were carried out on this one joint account. To these circumstances it appears to me that the words of Lord Chancellor Campbell in Cairncross v. Lorimer (3 Macq., 827) are applicable :—

"The doctrine will apply which is to be found, I believe, in the laws of all civilized nations, that, if a man, either by words or by conduct, has intimated that he consents to an act which has been done, and that he will offer no opposition to it, although it could not have been lawfully done without his consent, and he thereby induces others to do that from which they otherwise might have abstained,—he cannot question the legality of the act he had so sanctioned,—to the prejudice of those who have so given faith to his words or to the fair inference to be drawn from his conduct."

A difficulty in deciding this case upon this ground is said to arise in consequence of the fact that subsequently to the letters above quoted a written agreement was entered into of date July 22, 1924. That was an agreement between the Nothard and Lowe Preserving Company and the two Messrs. Lowe and Prescott, the secretary, as so-called guarantors, on the one part, and the appellants, the brokers, on the other part. It confirms the arrangement in the letters, adds to it the guarantee and undertakes to consign not less than 50,000 barrels of Nova Scotian apples, making provision for the retention, after the advance of £10,000, of 70 per cent. of the net proceeds that would arise from the sale of those apples. It does not specifically mention the 120,000 tons of apples consigned to Liverpool to the combined company of Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited, but clause 6 of the agreement is in these terms :—

"For the consideration aforesaid, the company and the guarantors hereby jointly and severally undertake that the agents shall be entitled to retain and apply in or towards repayment of the said advances 70 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sale of goods sold on behalf of, or as agents for, Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited."

There is, however, no separate agreement between this combined company and the appellants, as brokers. Had there been, the question would have been at an end ; but clause 6 quoted seems undoubtedly not to go one step farther than the arrangement embodied in the letters, because these letters covered goods from the combine and, in point of fact, the apples to be dealt with by the brokers included, along with the 50,000, 120,000 tons belonging to the combine. The reference in clause 6 of Nothard and Lowe's agreement is a reference to an actual fact, an arrangement made, and it was upon the footing of that arrangement, which included the combine and its apples, that the advances were made.

I should incline to the opinion that the letters in themselves form a complete and effective contract. Personally, I do not think it required to be followed by a formal agreement. I think it was in re mercatoria operative and effective.

But for the reason about to be stated, I think this question, in the circumstances of this case, need not be so viewed in the abstract, for the actions of all parties, the combine and the preserving company and the brokers, proceeded from day to day and from consignment to consignment upon the important footing that, on the one hand, large advances were made in cash and, on the other, they were so made as against goods pooled in the manner described. I can hardly bring myself to believe that the law can sanction resiling from a contract so acted upon, to the brokers' great loss. It is an admitted fact that there is no element of fraud in the case ; the advances were honestly made and, in my opinion, the demand of the combine, which embraces a claim for payment again to them of the price of all their goods so realized, cannot be justified in law.

The testing point of fact is that, upon the realization of the apples received, the appellants, as brokers, having previously made advances, were to retain 70 per cent. of the price and remit 30 per cent. to the companies. Was the allocation of that 30 per cent. and 70 per cent. respectively made ? The answer is that it was made in repeated transactions following, say, in the months of August, September, and October, 1924, and the further answer is that it was made to the knowledge of all parties.

To give one instance from the accounts : On September 5 apples ex the Celtic and the Cythia, amounting in net value to two sums of £429 and £423, in all £852, were sold. How was this sum disposed of ? In point of fact, these two sums appear on the credit side of the account in order, but upon September 6 not £825 but £255, being 30 per cent. thereof, is debited to the defendants. That is to say, on the very face of the accounts it appears clear that 70 per cent. has been retained and 30 per cent. paid, all as per the arrangement in the letters described. Other instances might be given appearing from the accounts, and it is beyond all question clear that the brokers were carrying out, on their part, the three things which they had to do—namely, make advances, realize the goods and remit 30 per cent. thereof to the vendors.

This is admitted to be in no way an unusual transaction and large masses of business appear to be carried out on the same footing. It may be said, however, that this was done behind the backs and without the assent of the combine. The fact is the other way ; the entries showing the distribution of the realizations in 30 and 70 per cent. appear from Messrs. Houghton's, the appellants', account in the defendants', the combine's, own ledger. That is to say, that the combine stands committed in its own books to the 30 plus 70 per cent. arrangement. When it is noted that the demand of the combine now is that, notwithstanding this, they shall now have that 70 per cent. and refuse to give credit for the advances which the brokers were making, it will be seen how important in mercantile circles the case comes to be.

As to the advances themselves, the first £10,000 was, in fact, advanced by the plaintiffs on July 28. The cheque was made payable to Nothard and Lowe, but the receipt was in the following terms :—

"30th July, 1924.

"Messrs. Nothard and Lowe received from Messrs. J. Houghton and Co. cheque value £10,000, ten thousand pounds.

"Received with thanks.

"£10,000.

"30th July, 1924.

"Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited.

"George H. Key."

This was the very first of the advances made which are now challenged as having been paid under any agreement with which the combine had nothing to do. I do not think it is open for the combine, whose receipt has just been quoted, to deny the receipt of that money either for itself or as a payment made into the joint account.

Turning again to the combine's own books and to the account appearing in its own ledger, the first item of the allocation into 30 per cent. and 70 per cent. appears therein as on August 22 and 25, 1924. Such a transaction was not repudiated ; the accounts show that it was accepted, and a further instalment was advanced on the very next day, August 26, £2,000. The advances of September 5 and 6 giving the same allocation of 30 per cent. to the owner and 70 per cent. to the advancing broker were preceded by one day by an advance of £3,000. At the end of September, on the 26th, similar transactions of considerable amount took place as to the allocation of the 30 and 70 per cent. and £5,000 was advanced on October 7 following by the appellants. It appears to me impossible either in law or in equity for the defendants to repudiate a transaction so followed up in important particulars from month to month. In my humble judgment estoppel has been established, even on the assumption, which I myself could not make, that there was no concluded contract under the documents. It appears to me to be well established in this case that the combine is not entitled to put forward such a claim, having been committed to the course of dealing which I have described by illustrative instances. Of one thing there is no doubt, that had it been indicated to the appellants that they were to make these advances without the security of the retention of the 70 per cent. of the proceeds of the cargoes, such advances would not have been made. The case has arisen solely because the combine and the companies constituting it have not sufficiently attended to the correct distribution of the moneys transmitted ; the distribution inter se has been negligent. With such things, it does not appear to me that the appellants, the brokers, who acted and advanced their money honestly throughout, have anything to do. They can, in my view, have no bearing as against an innocent third party, upon the plea of estoppel.

After much consideration I am of opinion that the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright should be restored and that the appellants should succeed.

Lord Carson.—My Lords : I agree with the noble Viscount on the Woolsack that this appeal fails. Looking at the contract of July 22, 1924, I think it is clear that the appellants were contracting with the Nothard and Lowe Fruit Preserving Company, Limited, alone and not with the defendant company, which in no way is made a party. It is formally executed on behalf of the said company by Maurice Lowe and another director, and also by the secretary (Mr. Prescott) of the said Preserving Company, and, in addition, it is executed by Maurice Lowe, George Nothard Lowe, and the said Prescott as guarantors in their personal capacity up to the extent of £10,000. It is not suggested on the face of the contract, nor is it a fact, that the moneys to be advanced were in whole or in part for the benefit of the defendant company—on the contrary, the advance is truly stated to be made to the Preserving Company. The agreement, it is to be observed, is strictly in accordance with the terms of the letter of July 16, 1924, written by Dart to Maurice Lowe (already quoted), which upon the face of it states that the advance is to Nothard and Lowe, and that the goods which were to be received by them for sale on behalf of the defendants were to be free of advance. The question, therefore, of authority in Maurice Lowe to render the defendant company liable for the repayment of a loan made to another company does not, in my opinion, arise, as on the face of the documents it appears clear that he never purported to do any such thing, nor did the appellants even require that the defendant company should be made a party to the agreement. This is made still clearer by the terms of the letter referred to of July 16, 1924, in which Mr. Dart, as agent for the appellants, himself states : "I should presume the arrangement with respect to Messrs. Nothard, Lowe and Wills would have to be subscribed by them." It is said, however, that the letter of July 22, 1924, purporting to be signed on behalf of the defendant company by Mr. Prescott as secretary, is binding upon the defendant company. My Lords, I cannot find a particle of evidence that Mr. Prescott had any authority, actual or ostensible, to write such a letter on behalf of the defendant company, or to create any such obligation as it purports to create on the part of the defendant company; and I find it difficult to understand how the appellants could have been satisfied that Prescott had any such authority to enter into an agreement by which the proceeds of sale of the defendants' apples was to be made liable for a debt of another company and from which they derived no benefit. In addition, the appellants knew that Prescott was a director and secretary of the Preserving Company and was himself one of the guarantors of the advances proposed to be made to that company.

Finally, the appellants raised, by an amendment of their original statement of claim, the point that the defendants were estopped from denying the agreement by reason of the method adopted for carrying on the business. The appellants mainly relied upon the fact that it appeared from the defendants' books that in the case of apples, the subject-matter of the agreement, at first only 30 per cent. and ultimately no part of the proceeds, was remitted to the defendant company, and this they alleged would be apparent at once to anyone looking at the books. My Lords, of course if it was shown that the defendant company had notice of the course of dealings disclosed by the books there would be great force in their contention. But the only persons who had notice were the Lowes and the staff of the Preserving Company by whom, under the arrangements entered into, the books were kept. It is, in my opinion, impossible to hold that the knowledge of the Lowes or of the Preserving Company, who were the very persons who were obtaining a loan for themselves, which, as the Lowes knew, was not authorized by the defendant company, was notice to the defendant company. Apart from such knowledge there is no evidence that the defendant company through their other directors had any notice whatever, and in my opinion this contention also fails. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

VISCOUNT DUNEDIN stated that Lord Atkinson concurred in the judgment which he had read.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Sargant and Lawrence, L.JJ.)
1927. Nov. 14.

PALMOLIVE COMPANY (OF ENGLAND), LIMITED v. FREEDMAN.*

Restraint of Trade—Price maintenance agreement—Validity.

The defendant, who was a wholesale and retail dealer, purchased from the plaintiffs 12 gross of Palmolive soap tablets and signed an agreement that he would not sell the plaintiffs' soap at less than 6d. a tablet. The defendant then sold the soap at 5d. a tablet, and, in an action to restrain him from breaking the agreement, he contended that it would be robbing the public to sell at 6d. a tablet and that the agreement was in restraint of trade and illegal.

Held (Sargant, L.J., dissenting), that the agreement was valid and enforceable and the plaintiffs were entitled to the injunction claimed.

Decision of Astbury, J. ([1927] 2 Ch., 333) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendant, Mr. Morris Freedman, trading as Economical Bazaars, of Rye-lane, S.E., from a judgment of Mr. Justice Astbury ([1927] 2 Ch., 333), given on May 27, 1927, granting an injunction to restrain him from breaking a price maintenance agreement which he had entered into with the plaintiffs, the Palmolive Company (of England), Limited, not to sell Palmolive Soap under 6d. a tablet.

The defendant, who carried on business at a wholesale warehouse and at a number of retail branch shops, purchased from the plaintiffs on August 24, 1926, 12 gross of Palmolive soap tablets, and signed an agreement in the form usually required by the plaintiffs that he would not sell their soap to retailers and customers below the price specified in the agreement. The price fixed by the agreement for Palmolive soap was 6d. a tablet. He subsequently purchased another 12 gross and signed a similar agreement. The plaintiffs discovered that the defendant was selling the soap at 5d. a tablet.

The defendant claimed that he was not bound by the agreement, and said that he did not propose to abide by it, because if he did he would be guilty of profiteering. He said that the profits which he would make would be so exorbitant that it would amount to robbing the public. He later challenged the plaintiffs to bring an action. The plaintiffs issued a writ and asked for an injunction.

The defendant submitted that the agreement was one in restraint of trade, contrary to public policy, and illegal.

Mr. Justice Astbury held that the defences failed and granted an injunction.

The defendant appealed.

Mr. Archer, K.C., and Mr. P. B. Morle appeared for the appellant; Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. Courtney Terrell for the respondents.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in giving judgment, stated the facts and said that it was plain that the system of the plaintiffs for maintaining prices had not proved perfect; for it took time to eliminate sellers at the undervalue and to stop supplies from reaching them. The defendant's attitude was to test the validity of the agreement, and the real question was whether that agreement was valid and enforceable.

Agreements to maintain prices had been upheld in a number of cases, as in North-Western Salt Company, Limited v. Electrolytic Alkali Company, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 313; [1914] A.C., 461), where Lord Moulton said that it was a hopeless task to argue that such a contract was, ex facie, against public policy. In Attorney-General of Australia v. Adelaide Steamship Company, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 743; [1913] A.C., 781) Lord Parker delivered the judgment of the Privy Council. He said that the Crown could not rely upon the mere intention to raise prices as proving an intention to injure the public. He also gave expression to the wider considerations which applied, even from the public point of view, as, for instance, the obtaining of fair remuneration for capital and labour so as to prevent business from being carried on at a loss and wages from being reduced to a minimum. Lord Parker further said that their Lordships knew of no case in which a restraint, reasonable in the interest of the parties, had been held unenforceable because it involved some injury to the public.

Concluding his judgment in the famous case of Mitchel v. Reynolds (1 P. Wms., 181 ; 1 Smith's L.C., 458, at p. 469), Lord Macclesfield said :—

"In all restraints of trade, where nothing more appears, the law presumes them bad ; but, if the circumstances are set forth, the presumption is excluded, and the Court is to judge of those circumstances, and determine accordingly ; and if upon them it appears to be a just and honest contract, it ought to be maintained."

That statement gave a wider range and greater flexibility to the considerations to be weighed than appeared in some of the later decisions. It was clear that a contract involving restraint of trade, and in particular the maintenance of prices, was not necessarily bad. There must be consideration for the contract, even though its adequacy would not be inquired into, and the restraint must be reasonable. As Lord Macnaghten said in Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Company, Limited (10 The Times L.R., 636 ; [1894] A.C., 535, at p. 565), the restraint must be reasonable both

"in reference to the interests of the parties concerned and reasonable in reference to the interests of the public, so framed and so guarded as to afford adequate protection to the party in whose favour it is imposed, while at the same time it is in no way injurious to the public."

As Lord Parker said in the Adelaide Steamship case (supra, at p. 797) :—

"It is really a question of public policy and not a question of fact upon which evidence of the actual or probable consequences, if the contract be carried into effect, is admissible."

To him (the Master of the Rolls) it seemed from those authorities that slight evidence only was needed to justify an agreement to maintain prices, the Court regarding the parties as the best judges of what was reasonable as between themselves (see per Lord Haldane in the North-Western Salt case, supra, at p. 471). The real question was whether the scope and terms of the present agreement were reasonable, and the defendant, who had entered into it, must justify his changed attitude. He (the Master of the Rolls) attached no significance to the point that it covered, in respect of those particular goods, all sources of supply ; to make the agreement effective it must necessarily do that.

It was important, however, to bear in mind the subject-matter of the agreement. It was not a case of services rendered by a servant to an employer, a relation which the Courts had safeguarded and not allowed to be the basis of unfair terms. Further, it did not cover the whole trade of the defendant, as in Joseph Evans and Co., Limited v. Heathcote (34 The Times L.R., 247 ; [1918] 1 K.B., 418). It did not enforce a general restraint. It related only to a few proprietary articles. There was no definite evidence as to the quantum of the plaintiffs' articles sold by the defendant, nor as to the percentage of those articles in the defendant's turnover. But it would seem that not much inconvenience would be caused to the defendant if he never sold any more of the plaintiffs' goods.

In the Maxim Nordenfelt case (supra) a covenant not to manufacture articles, though unlimited as to space, was held not unreasonable. In Joseph Evans and Co., Limited v. Heathcote (supra) the covenant was held unreasonable, but in that case there was a restriction on the sale of the plaintiffs' goods to any but five purchasers, who entered into no corresponding obligation to buy the plaintiffs' output, and the plaintiffs had no power of withdrawal from the agreement.

These considerations did not apply here. If the plaintiffs fixed a price so high as to preclude a sale of their goods, that would be their loss. There was no restriction upon the defendant's selling other people's soap. Different considerations might well apply if the defendant was bound by contract to buy definite amounts of the plaintiffs' goods and was precluded from buying the goods of others. He (the Master of the Rolls) was unable to find that the contract was unreasonable, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Sargant, in the course of a dissenting judgment, said that it was well settled that the Court ought first to ascertain the special circumstances in which the contract impugned was executed, and then consider whether its terms were reasonable in the interests both of the parties and of the general public. If the contract failed in either test the defence succeeded (Attorney-General of Australia v. Adelaide Steamship Company, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 743 ; [1913] A.C., 781) ; Herbert Morris, Limited v. Saxelby (32 The Times L.R., 297 ; [1916] 1 A.C., 688) ; Joseph Evans and Co., Limited v. Heathcote (34 The Times L.R., 247 ; [1918] 1 K.B., 418)).

The plaintiffs were the sole recognized distributors of Palmolive soap and other toilet preparations made by the manufacturers in Canada, and at the date of the contracts in question were anxious to secure that the Palmolive preparations should be sold to the public at fixed, uniform prices, and the price in the case of the soap was to be 6d. a cake, and for that purpose they drew up and caused to be printed certain forms of contract. At the date in question, however, the plaintiffs were unable from various causes to secure any such uniformity of price in the wholesale trade, and still less in the retail market, particularly owing to the extraordinary depreciation in the French exchange, which reached its maximum in the summer of 1926 and made it profitable to obtain Palmolive soap from other sources of supply and sell it at 5½d., 5d., and even as low as 4½d. It was admitted by the plaintiffs, and proved by the defendant, that at that date there were scores of places where the soap could be bought retail for less than 6d. a cake. The plaintiffs' scheme was not then a success, and they had been forced to meet the French and other competition, first, by a bonus scheme, and afterwards by a coupon scheme. It was clear from the evidence that the plaintiffs had failed to bind a large number of retailers, who could sell at less than 6d. without committing any breach of contract.

Was the contract here reasonable, both in the interests of the contracting parties and in the interests of the public ? The defendant had affected to pose as a champion of the public, and had protested on their behalf with regard to the enormous percentage of profit evidenced by the difference in price between the price paid to the plaintiffs by wholesalers and that paid to retailers by the public buying at 6d. a cake. He had, in effect, said, "res ipsa loquitur ; there is here a clear case of extortion from the public." To his (his Lordship's) mind, the defendant was not successful in that part of the case, having made no trustworthy estimate of the necessary expenses either of the wholesaler or of the retailer. The soap was, after all, only one of many proprietary soaps and must necessarily find its level both in value and in price. To speak of extortion from the public in regard to it was little better than an absurdity. The observations of Lord Parker in the Adelaide Steamship Company's case (supra) were very relevant and practically conclusive.

The real point of the present case was as to the reasonableness of the contract between the two parties to it. There was no reciprocity in the agreement ; the wholesaler had no definite right to a continued supply of the soap. Again, the obligations imposed on the defendant did not merely relate to soap (which was what he bought), but to all the other preparations of the plaintiffs. Those obligations were not dependent on the success of the scheme propounded by the plaintiffs, but were unlimited in point of time. Their result, as enforced, was that the defendant, as the consequence of a single purchase, was precluded for the rest of his life from selling any of the plaintiffs' preparations except at prices which were at present considerably higher than the current market price in other retail shops. The prices were those to be fixed from time to time by the plaintiffs, and the sale was only to be to customers approved by the plaintiffs.

The defendant probably did not grasp at first the sweeping and permanent nature of the restrictions to be imposed upon him. The form of agreement as drafted by the plaintiffs was entirely in their own interests, and without any regard to the interests of those who were asked to sign it. The terms of the contract devised by the plaintiffs went, in his (his Lordship's) opinion, far beyond what was required for their reasonable protection, and imposed unreasonable obligations on the defendant, particularly as regarded duration. With great respect, he thought that the appeal should be allowed.

Lord Justice Lawrence said that it was well established that an agreement in restraint of trade could be enforced if it were reasonable in reference to the interests of the parties and also of the public. That was the principle laid down by the House of Lords in the Nordenfelt case (10 The Times L.R., 636 ; [1894] A.C., 535) and treated ever since as the governing principle in cases of the sort. Different considerations would apply in cases where the agreement operated to prevent altogether a person's carrying on his accustomed trade from those applying where, as in the present case, the trader was left free not only to sell the same kind of articles made by other manufacturers, but also numerous other articles, in fact to carry on his business as theretofore.

He (the Lord Justice) thought that the agreement now in question did not differ materially from the price maintenance agreements considered in Elliman, Sons and Co. v. Carrington and Son, Limited ([1901] 2 Ch., 275), or in the two Dunlop cases, Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company Limited v. New Garage and Motor Company, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 625 ; [1915] A.C., 79), and Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company, Limited v. Selfridge and Co., Limited (31 The Times L.R., 399 ; [1915] A.C., 847). Mr. Justice Phillimore in the second Dunlop case (29 The Times L.R., 270) stated that such agreements were then in almost universal commercial use, and at the present day they were exceedingly common. He (Lord Justice Lawrence) could not see how the agreement in the present case could be injurious to the public. Without wishing to cast any reflection upon the plaintiffs' goods, he did not think that the English public would have serious grounds of complaint if none of them were sold in this country. They were not essential to the community. It was not as if the plaintiffs were controlling the output of an indispensable commodity such as coal or salt. As was pointed out in the Adelaide Steamship Company's case (29 The Times L.R., 743 ; [1913] A.C., 781), it was improbable that the vendor would want to fix unreasonable prices, and it was worthy of notice that in that case their Lordships said that they knew of no case in which a restraint reasonable in the interest of the parties had been held unenforceable because it involved some injury to the public. In his (Lord Justice Lawrence's) view the suggestion that this agreement was unreasonable in the interest of the public was ill-founded.

Reviewing the terms of the agreement as affecting the parties themselves, his Lordship agreed with the view of those terms which was set out in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. The provisions to which the defendant took exception were part of the machinery for effectively working an admittedly lawful object and did not seem to go beyond what was reasonably required for that purpose. The real burden of the defendant's complaint was that these provisions were too stringent, because they operated to prevent him, for all time and in all circumstances, from cutting the prices of the plaintiffs' goods. His contention really amounted to this, that the Court ought to uphold an agreement for the maintenance of the price of a proprietary article only if the machinery for working out that object afforded an opportunity of escape. If there were no such opportunity, then, so the defendant contended, the Court ought to hold that there was an unreasonable restraint of trade. He (the Lord Justice) agreed with the Master of the Rolls that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

MANCHESTER CORPORATION v. AUDENSHAW URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL AND OTHERS.*

Highways—Road maintenance—Obligation imposed by private Act—Increase of traffic—Extent of obligation—Manchester Corporation and Waterworks Improvement Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict., c. clxi.), s. 14 (ii.).

A road was constructed by the plaintiff corporation under powers conferred by a private Act of 1875, which enacted that the road should be constructed according to a certain specification and that it should thereafter be maintained at the plaintiffs' expense. The road was completed by the plaintiffs in 1878 as a water-bound macadamized road in accordance with the statutory requirements and was duly maintained by them for many years, but ultimately it deteriorated owing to the increase of traffic of a kind unknown in 1878, and the position was that unless resort was had to tar-spraying or to some similar modern expedient the existing traffic would rapidly destroy the road.

* Reported by A. W. Chaster, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that on the construction of the Act the plaintiffs were liable only to maintain the road in the condition in which it was completed in 1878 and they were not liable for the cost of providing for all modern means of locomotion by reconstructing the fabric of the road so as to be entirely different in formation from the road which was the subject-matter of the obligation imposed by the Act.

The Sharpness case (31 The Times L.R., 254 ; [1915] A.C., 654) followed and applied.

The plaintiffs in this action claimed a declaration that with regard to a road constructed in the areas of the defendants, the Audenshaw Urban District Council and the Denton Urban District Council, under the Manchester Corporation Waterworks and Improvement Act, 1875, the extent of the plaintiffs' liability as to the maintenance thereof was determined by that Act and that they were not required to make or maintain a better road. The defendants pleaded that the plaintiffs' obligation was to maintain the road in a state adequate for the traffic of the present day, and in the alternative they counterclaimed that the plaintiffs were at any rate liable to maintain a macadamized carriage-way as specified in the Act, whatever might be the nature of the present-day traffic.

Sir Herbert Cunliffe, K.C., and Mr. John Bennett appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Scholefield, K.C., and Mr. H. A. Hill for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Eve delivered the following considered judgment :—This action has been brought to determine the liability of the plaintiff corporation in respect of the maintenance of a road, known as Corporation-road, situate partly in each of the districts of the defendant councils.

The road was constructed by the plaintiffs in 1878 under powers conferred by the Manchester Corporation Waterworks and Improvement Act, 1875, whereby the plaintiffs were authorized to make, construct, lay down, and maintain the reservoirs and roads (including the road in question) therein enumerated, and, when and so soon as the same were completed and opened to the public, to stop up and appropriate to the purposes of the new reservoirs (inter alia) a portion of Taylor-lane therein defined, and by section 14 (ii.) of the Act it was enacted that the road in question in this action should be at all times thereafter maintained by and at the expense of the plaintiffs, and should be of the width of 14 yards, inclusive of a stone boundary wall to be erected by the plaintiffs on each side, fencing off the road from the adjoining lands, and should have a footway not less than 7½ feet wide on each side, to be made with a rubble or cinder foundation and gravel cover not less than 12 inches in depth altogether, and with curb-stones, and that the carriage-way of the road should be macadamized, and the foundation thereof was to be rubble 6 inches in depth, covered with hard macadam to the depth of at least 12 inches. And it was thereby further provided that the road should not be deemed to be completed until it should have been made and sewered in accordance with the provisions of the Act and to the reasonable satisfaction of the defendants' predecessors, the Audenshaw and the Denton Local Boards respectively.

In April, 1878, the road was completed in accordance with the statutory requirements and to the satisfaction of the two Local Boards. It served a district which, at the time of its construction and for many years thereafter, was mainly of an agricultural character. In the early years of the present century a foundry and some dwelling-houses were erected on land abutting on the road. Down to that time it had remained fenced off from the adjoining lands by the walls mentioned in the Act. Some other works fronting on the road have since been erected and the neighbourhood has now become of a distinctly industrial character. In the absence of any complaints on the part of the defendants, who are the highway authorities of their respective districts, it may, I think, be assumed that down to a date shortly after the conclusion of the war the plaintiffs had duly discharged their statutory obligations to maintain the road.

But from a date somewhere about the commencement of the war it had become apparent that the road, an ordinary water-bound macadamized structure, would not be adequate to carry the increasing traffic of the district or to sustain the disintegrating shocks inseparable from the passage along it of the heavy and fast motor traffic which was rapidly supplanting the slow-moving traffic of the seventies. The rapid deterioration of the road and the increasing costs thereby imposed on the plaintiffs brought matters to a head, and for some considerable period before the commencement of this action discussions were carried on between the plaintiffs and the defendants, both oral and written, as to the proper party to be charged with the expense necessary for restoring the road to a condition suitable for accommodating present-day traffic. A divergence of opinion on the construction of the statute, and the failure to arrive at any compromise acceptable to both sides, resulted in the institution of this action.

The conclusions to be drawn from the evidence adduced at the trial can, I think, be summarized thus : (1) By a macadamized road in 1875, and for a quarter of a century afterwards, was meant a road of water-bound macadam. Tar-spraying and the use of tar macadam did not exist before the commencement of the present century. (2) Such a road was adequate for the traffic over this road in 1878 and the next 40 years. (3) During such last-mentioned period, the road was maintained by the plaintiffs in accordance with their statutory obligations. (4) The road at the commencement of this action was, and it still remains, in a condition of serious disrepair. This condition is in the main due to traffic of a character unknown in 1878 and for many years afterwards. (5) The road is not incapable of being repaired as a water-bound macadamized road, but unless such repair is supplemented by the introduction of some binding material and by tar-spraying, or some other expedient unknown before 1900, the already existing traffic over it will inevitably bring about rapid destruction. (6) The result is that, from the economic standpoint, the road constructed in accordance with the statutory requirements of 1875 cannot be maintained in a condition adequate for present-day traffic without expenditure of a nature unknown, and work never contemplated, until the road had been completed and in use for a quarter of a century and more. (7) The traffic over the road when repaired is more likely to increase than to remain stationary.

It is in these circumstances that the plaintiffs seek to have the measure of their obligation judicially determined. Is it limited to the expense attendant on the maintenance of the road as completed in 1878, or does it extend to the already substantially increased, and to the unknown future, cost of providing for all modern means of locomotion? Questions of a similar nature have arisen not infrequently of late and the answer in each case depends on the construction of the Act by which the obligation is imposed.

In the present case, the primary obligation was to construct to the reasonable satisfaction of the defendants' predecessors a particular length of road in accordance with the specification contained in the Act, and to open it to the public as a substituted highway for so much of the old thoroughfare known as Taylor-lane as the undertakers were thereby authorized to stop up and appropriate to the purposes of the new reservoirs. This primary obligation was duly carried out, and on the evidence it is quite clear that the substituted road was a more convenient and more substantial thoroughfare than the closed one. The obligation to maintain is coupled in section 14 (ii.) of the Act with the provision specifying the actual mode of construction, and I come to the conclusion that the true intent and effect of the language are to impose on the undertakers the burden of maintaining the road so constructed and not to create a liability so to supplement, alter, or replace the construction thereby specified, as to make it available for the passage of traffic wholly dissimilar from that for which the specification was framed. The case, in my opinion, is covered by the decisions in the cases cited in argument on behalf of the plaintiffs. Applying what Lord Parker says in his speech in the Sharpness case (31 The Times L.R., 254; [1915] A.C., 654, at p. 668) to the facts of this case, I should say that what the plaintiffs have to maintain is the fabric of the particular road of which the size, character, and formation were determined by the Act and that there is no principle of interpretation by which an obligation to maintain a particular structure can be enlarged into an obligation to reconstruct the fabric in such a way that it is materially different in size, character, or formation from the particular fabric the subject of the obligation. Lord Parker adds, at page 669: "The standard by which the obligation is to be judged is neither the ordinary traffic when the canal was constructed nor the ordinary traffic of to-day, but the bridge itself as determined by the commissioners under the Act." From this, it would appear that if the plaintiffs are entitled to a declaration it ought to be one in the terms of paragraph 1 of their original claim—a declaration that they are only liable to maintain the road in the condition in which it was completed in April, 1878, and on this the defendants raise the argument that, inasmuch as the road is not so deformed as to be incapable of repair without actual reconstructive work, the plaintiffs ought to be held liable to effect such repairs as will restore the road to its original condition, and that it is no answer to such a claim to assert and prove that when so repaired the road will again be destroyed within a space of time altogether out of proportion to the expenditure incurred. There are, I think, two answers to this contention, first, that no Court would compel an expenditure, proved—if not indeed admitted—to be of a most extravagant and wasteful nature, and, secondly, that on the evidence, although, as I have already stated, the road has not yet so thoroughly deteriorated as to be incapable of repair without fundamental reconstruction, I am satisfied that some reconstruction work to the surface and the foundations alike would be called for. But on the other hand the facts that the road has been, and is still being, so used, and that present-day conditions are such as to render an obligation to maintain it as in 1878 of no practical use, do not, in my opinion, operate to free the plaintiffs from all liability to contribute to the cost of repair, and, if in fact it can be established that any default on the part of the plaintiffs, in the years during which they have suspended work on the road, has increased the expenditure which will now have to be incurred in restoring the road, the plaintiffs are, in my opinion, liable to contribute to the extent of such increase. I propose to make a declaration in the terms of paragraph 1 of the prayer and to dismiss the counterclaim. I will give leave to the defendants to apply for an inquiry as to any contribution which they may allege ought to be made by the plaintiffs to the cost of reconditioning the road and generally. The defendants must pay the costs of the action and counterclaim.

WATSON v. HAGGITT AND OTHERS.*

Partnership — Dissolution by death of partner —Provision in articles for salaries—Share of net profits payable to executors — Whether survivor entitled to deduct salary for himself.

The appellant and one H. entered into a partnership as barristers and solicitors, the articles providing that each partner was entitled to a salary and half the "net profits" during the term of the partnership, and that if either partner died the surviving partner was for five years to pay to the executors a third of the "net annual profits." H. died and the partnership was thereby dissolved.

Held, that the expression "net profits" was not necessarily to be interpreted as having the same meaning in every part of the articles, and that the appellant, in calculating the share of the net profits payable to the executors, was not entitled to deduct any salary for himself.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand relating to the interpretation of a deed of partnership.

Mr. F. H. Maugham, K.C., and Mr. J. H. Stamp appeared for the appellant; Mr. G. B. Hurst, K.C., and Mr. H. Brasch (of the New Zealand Bar) for the respondents.

Lord Warrington of Clyffe, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said that the appeal raised a question of construction upon articles of partnership between the appellant, Mr. John Lachlan McGillivray Watson, and Mr. Arthur Bryan Haggitt. The business of the partnership was that of barristers and solicitors. The articles were dated May 18, 1905, and the term of the partnership was 15 years from that date. The term expired on May 18, 1920, but the partners continued the business as partners at will without fresh articles, and, therefore, upon the old terms so far as they were applicable to a partnership at will. Mr. Haggitt died on January 3, 1926, and the partnership was thereby dissolved. The respondents were his executors.

The articles contained the following clause (No. 21) :—

"If at any time during the term of the said partnership either of the said partners shall die or become permanently incapacitated for work or shall become insane or of unsound mind to such an extent as to render him unable or unfit to carry on the business of the partnership then and in any such case the surviving or remaining partner shall during the period of five years from the occurrence or happening of such event or contingency pay to the executors and administrators of such partner so dying as aforesaid or as the case may be to the committee or representatives of such partner so incapacitated as aforesaid a sum equivalent to a one-third part or share of the net annual profits of the said partnership business for each year of the said term of five years."

Taken by itself that clause presented no difficulty of construction. The net annual profits, by which the amount of the sum to be paid by the surviving partner in each of the five years was to be measured, would be ascertained by deducting from the receipts and earnings of the business such outgoings and expenses as were, under the articles or by the use and wont of the partners, so deducted during the partnership, the business being for that purpose treated as a continuation of the partnership business (Ex parte Harper, 1 De G. and J., 180). A payment, however, which under the articles ceased with the dissolution of the partnership would not be properly deducted.

The appellant, however, contended that he was entitled to deduct, in addition to the ordinary business expenses and outgoings, an annual sum payable to him by way of "salary" during the partnership. Whether that contention was correct was the question for decision.

The clause of the articles providing for payment of "salaries" to the partners was clause 3, which was in the following terms :—

"The said Arthur Bryan Haggitt shall receive a salary of £600 for the first year of the said partnership term, a salary of £750 for the second year of the said partnership term, and the said John Lachlan McGillivray Watson shall draw all the net profits of the said business during the first two years aforesaid. During each of the third, fourth, and fifth years of the said partnership term the said J. L. M. Watson shall draw a salary of £1,500 per annum and also one-half of the net profits for each such year, and the said A. B. Haggitt shall draw a salary of £750 per annum for each of the said third, fourth, and fifth years and also one-half of the net profits for each such year. Thereafter during the continuance of the said partnership term the said J. L. M. Watson shall draw a salary of £1,500 per annum and one-half of the net profits each year, and the said A. B. Haggitt a salary of £1,000 per annum and one-half of the net profits for each year during the term of the said partnership, and the said partners shall be allowed to draw the aforesaid amounts by monthly instalments in anticipation of their respective shares or profits in the said partnership business."

Clause 5 was a common form of provision for the payment of expenses, outgoings, and losses out of the receipts and earnings of the business :—

"And in case of deficiency thereof then by the said partners in the shares in which they shall for the time being be entitled to the net profits of the said business."

The contention of the appellant was based upon a supposed rule of construction that the same meaning ought to be given to an expression in every part of the document in which it appeared.

Applying that supposed rule it was said that "net profits" in clause 3 and in clause 5 meant what was left after the deduction of salaries, and, therefore, it must have the same meaning in clause 21. If that conclusion were logically applied the "salary" of Mr. A. B. Haggitt should also be deducted and paid to his executors, but the absurdity of paying a "salary" to the executors of a dead partner who could not give any assistance in the business was recognized, and those of the Judges who were in the appellant's favour stopped short of the logical application of their conclusion by deciding that the "salary" of the appellant alone ought to be deducted.

The truth was that there was no rule of such general application as was contended for by the appellant. A difficulty or ambiguity might be solved by resorting to such a device, but it was only in such cases that it was necessary or permissible so to do.

In the opinion of their LORDSHIPS, it was in the present case quite clear that in clause 21 the expression "net profits" had a different application from that which it had in clause 3 and clause 5. Clause 21 was dealing with a state of things wholly different from that dealt with in clause 3. The partnership was dissolved, the "salaries" which were payable "during the continuance of the partnership term" had ceased, and the business was being carried on by the appellant on his own sole account and for his own benefit, the annual sum payable to his deceased partner's executors being, in substance, purchase money for his interest in the assets of the business. In those circumstances it was impossible to hold, without an express provision to that effect, that the partners intended to allow a salary to the surviving partner.

Their LORDSHIPS were of opinion that the appeal failed and ought to be dismissed, with costs, and they would humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

Court of Appeal. (Scrutton, Sargant, and Greer, L.JJ.) 1927. Nov. 11.

KONSKIER v. B. GOODMAN, LIMITED.*

Trespass—Building contractor—Demolition of party wall—Limited licence by adjoining owner—Undertaking to make good damage to adjoining premises—Debris dropped on adjoining premises—Omission to clear away debris after completion of demolition operations—Duty to new occupier—Continuing trespass.

In March, 1926, the defendants carried out demolition work on premises adjoining other premises (described here as X) under a limited licence given by the owner of premises X. One of the conditions of the licence was that the defendants should make good all damage done to the premises X by reason of the demolition operations. In the course of these operations the defendants allowed debris to drop on an inaccessible part of the roof of premises X and did not remove all the debris therefrom when the demolition work was completed. In July, 1926, the plaintiff became the occupier of premises X under a lease and carried on business there as a ladies' blouse and robe maker. In September, 1926, a heavy storm of rain washed the debris, which had been left by the defendants on the roof of premises X in the previous March, into the gutters on the roof, and a gulley was choked and the basement of premises X was flooded and some ladies' gowns which the plaintiff kept there were damaged. In an action by the plaintiff claiming damages for the defendants' negligence Mr. Justice Salter gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the act of the defendants in not removing the debris was an act of continuing negligence for which they were liable to the plaintiff.

Held, that there could be no negligence as there was no duty on the part of the defendants towards the plaintiff, but that the act of the defendants in leaving the debris where they left it after the completion of the demolition work was a continuing trespass which gave the plaintiff a right of action.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Salter in an action tried by him without a jury.

The plaintiff, Mr. Moss Konskier, was a ladies' blouse and robe maker and he carried on business at 87 and 88, Houndsditch. The defendants were a firm of contractors. The plaintiff claimed that the defendants, in doing demolition work on premises adjoining the plaintiff's premises, No. 87, Houndsditch, failed to take proper care to clear up all the debris after the completion of the demolition work, so that a quantity of debris from the demolition work was allowed by the defendants to remain on the plaintiff's roof after the demolition work had been completed.

In March, 1926, the plaintiff's father, Mr. Max Konskier, who then owned the premises, No. 87, Houndsditch, had given the adjoining owners permission to carry out this demolition work on the terms of a letter dated March 4 signed by the owners of the adjoining property and addressed to the plaintiff's father. The letter was as follows: "In consideration of your giving us permission to pull down at our own expense the chimney-stack of your premises, No. 87, Houndsditch, to within three feet of the existing roof of your building, No. 87, Houndsditch, aforesaid, we . . . hereby undertake at our own expense (a) to restore the said chimney-stack to its present height at any future period, or when the adjoining property is rebuilt, on receiving a written request from you to that effect, and (b) to make good any damage which may be caused to No. 87, Houndsditch, by all or any of the before-mentioned works."

In the course of the demolition operations which were carried out by the defendants debris was dropped on an inaccessible part of the roof of the premises, No. 87, Houndsditch, occupied at the time of the action by the plaintiff, and was not all cleared away when the demolition operations came to an end. The work of demolition was completed before April 1, 1926. In July, 1926, the plaintiff became tenant of No. 87 under a lease from his father. On September 1, 1926, a heavy rainstorm washed the debris into the pipe which drained the back gutter of the roof of No. 87 and caused a choke of the gulley of the drain in the basement into which the pipe discharged, with the result that the basement was flooded and some blouses and robes which the plaintiff kept in the basement were damaged.

The plaintiff brought the action claiming from the defendants damages for injury to his premises and to his goods by reason of the defendants' negligence.

Mr. Justice Salter held that the damage to the plaintiff's premises and goods was caused by the defendants' negligence and that the act of the defendants in leaving the debris on the roof of the plaintiff's premises was an act of continuing negligence and that they were liable to the plaintiff for the damage caused to his goods and premises by the flooding of his basement, and his Lordship entered judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Malcolm Hilbery appeared for the appellants; and Mr. G. R. Blanco White for the respondents.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in the course of his judgment, said that the plaintiff was the occupier of No. 87, Houndsditch. In March, 1926, the owners of the adjoining premises obtained a licence from the plaintiff's father, the owner of No. 87, Houndsditch, to pull down the party wall, which consisted of a chimney-stack. The licence was given on the terms of a document dated March 4, 1926, signed by the adjoining owners and addressed to Mr. Konskier, the plaintiff's father, as follows:—"In consideration of your giving us permission to pull down at our own expense the chimney-stack of your premises, No. 87, Houndsditch, to within three feet of the existing roof of your building, No. 87, Houndsditch, aforesaid, we . . . hereby undertake at our own expense, (a) to restore the said chimney-stack to its present height at any future period, or when the adjoining property is rebuilt, on receiving a written request from you to that effect, and (b) to make good any damage which may be caused to No. 87, Houndsditch, by all or any of the before-mentioned works."

Under that licence the defendants started pulling down the chimney-stack, and in the course of that pulling down they deposited debris on an inaccessible part of Mr. Konskier's roof (No. 87, Houndsditch) and did not make good the damage by removing all the debris from Mr. Konskier's roof when the demolition operations were completed, which was before April 1, 1926. In July, 1926, Mr. Konskier let the premises No. 87, Houndsditch, to his son, the plaintiff. On September 1, 1926, a heavy storm of rain washed the debris which had been left on the roof of No. 87 by the defendants, into the guttering so that it choked the gulley and caused a flood in the basement of No. 87 and the plaintiff's goods were damaged.

The plaintiff brought this action claiming damages for injury to the plaintiff's premises and to the plaintiff's goods by the negligence of the defendants' servants in the pulling down of premises adjoining thereto and of part of the plaintiff's premises and for damages for injury caused by mortar and debris from the housebreaking operations of the defendants and their servants.

By paragraph 2 of the statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that the defendants in executing the said demolition negligently and wrongfully caused and permitted debris to fall and remain upon the roof of the plaintiff's premises, Nos. 87 and 88, Houndsditch, so that much debris fell and was washed down by rain into the gutters of the plaintiff's said premises and completely choked the gulley in the basement thereof, and by paragraph 3 he alleged that in consequence of the foregoing, on the morning of September 1, 1926, when a heavy rainstorm occurred the basement of the said premises was flooded with dirty water and great damage was done to the plaintiff's stock of gowns therein and the plaintiff lost the use of the said basement while the same was being cleared out, whereby the plaintiff suffered great loss amounting to £119 11s. 6d.

It appears that the plaintiff's case was based on negligence, and the learned Judge (Mr. Justice Salter) deals with the negligence in this way. He says in his judgment : "Was it negligent, assuming a duty, to leave this roof with a quantity of debris on it ? I cannot entertain a moment's doubt about that. It cannot have been the exercise of proper care and skill to leave the roof in such a condition as that. In asking myself how the flood was caused, I have the evidence of Mr. Coles, which was very plain and feasible, and, on the other hand, I only get the evidence of workmen who were on the roof, and people who say that they cannot imagine how this can have happened. Then I have assumed a duty and I am not able to accept the contention of Mr. Hilbery that there is no evidence here of a duty owed by the defendants to the plaintiff. When they did the work and finished it there was a duty upon them to all persons who were using or had property on the premises of No. 87. The plaintiff was not at that time a person who had property, so far as I know, in that house. But this was an act of continuing negligence, and that negligence was continuing at a time when the plaintiff became lessee and brought property to that house."

Mr. Hilbery has argued that there was here no continuing negligence because there was no continuing duty by the defendants to the plaintiff in respect of acts committed before the plaintiff became the occupier of the premises. That contention is sound, but it does not dispose of the cause of action about which there is a dispute ; for, if there was a trespass by the defendants when the debris was allowed to remain on the roof of the plaintiff's premises, it was a continuing trespass. It was argued by Mr. Hilbery that there could not be a trespass because the defendants had a right to put the debris where they did put it in the first instance. But the right to drop it there was a limited right, and when the defendants had put the debris on the roof of the premises for a limited purpose, the failure to remove it at the completion of the demolition operations or within a reasonable time thereafter was a trespass. And it was a continuing trespass which entitled the new owner or occupier of the premises to sue. The point was discussed in Hudson v. Nicholson (5 M. and W., 437), where the declaration stated that the plaintiff was lawfully possessed of a certain close, and the defendants were possessed of a certain building and premises near to and adjoining thereto. The declaration continued : "Yet the defendants, well knowing the premises, but contriving and wrongfully and unjustly intending to injure the plaintiff and deprive him of the use, benefit, and enjoyment of the said close, and to annoy and incommode him in the use, possession, and enjoyment of the same—to wit, on, &c., and on divers other days and times afterwards and before the commencement of this suit, wrongfully and injuriously kept and continued, and caused to be kept and continued, for a long and unreasonable time, to wit, from thence hitherto, in and upon and over the said close of the plaintiff, divers, to wit, nine shores and nine timbers, before then, and before the plaintiff became possessed of the said close as aforesaid, by the defendants and others whose names to the plaintiff are unknown, wrongfully and injuriously put, placed, fixed, and erected in, upon, and over the said close of the said plaintiff, and the defendants so kept and continued the said shores and timbers in, upon, and over the said close, although they were, to wit, on the day and year first aforesaid, requested by the plaintiff to remove, take, and carry away the same from and off the said close. By means of which premises, and by reason also of the plaintiff being unable to remove and take away the said shores and timbers without causing the said building and premises of the defendants to tumble and fall, the plaintiff has been deprived of the use and enjoyment of his said close, and also thereby the plaintiff hath been and still is hindered and prevented from building and erecting a certain dwelling-house, buildings, and premises on the said close, which he intended to do and otherwise would have done, and thereby the plaintiff hath lost and been deprived of all the benefits, rents, profits, and advantages he would have derived and acquired from the said dwelling-house and premises, had the same been built and erected," &c.

It was held that notwithstanding the omission of the words vi et armis, which was of no importance after verdict, the declaration stated a continuing act of trespass by the defendants.

The case of Hudson v. Nicholson (supra) is an authority for the proposition that if the present case had been argued on trespass there would have been no answer to the claim and there would be no injustice done to the parties in this case if the Court dealt with it as a claim in trespass and not as one of negligence. In that connexion the Court endeavoured to do justice without following technical rules too strictly. The judgment of Mr. Justice Salter would be allowed to stand on the ground of trespass and not on the ground of negligence, but without costs.

Lord Justice Sargant, in concurring, said that he was unable to agree with Mr. Justice Salter with regard to the question of continuing negligence. If and in so far as the action was based on negligence there would be a good answer to the claim, because there was no contract between the defendants and the plaintiff, and the defendants were under no duty towards him. On the other hand, the licence given by the plaintiff's father for the demolition work to be done only justified allowing the debris to remain on the roof of No. 87 during the progress of the demolition operations and for a reasonable time afterwards, and the act of the defendants in allowing the debris to remain on that roof after that time was a trespass. It was a continuing trespass which entitled the plaintiff to recover damages. His Lordship agreed that the appeal should be dismissed, without costs.

Lord Justice Greer agreed. It was quite clear that, in order to recover damages for negligence against the defendants, the plaintiff must prove that the defendants were under a duty towards the plaintiff himself and had committed a breach of such duty, but here there was no duty on the part of the defendants towards the plaintiff, and therefore the claim in negligence failed. But it was equally clear that if the case was to be fought in trespass the plaintiff would succeed. The dropping of the debris on the roof of No. 87 would have been a trespass but for the licence, which was a limited one. The act of leaving the debris there, or the omission to remove it at the completion of the demolition operations, was a trespass. The appeal must be dismissed, but without costs.

BROOKS AND OTHERS v. LIFFEN.*

Landlord and Tenant—Rent restrictions—Decontrol — Dwelling-house — Rent less than two-thirds of rateable value—Tenant in occupation on July 31, 1923—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 12 (7)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 2 (1).

The tenant of a dwelling-house under a 98 years' lease at a rent which was less than two-thirds of the rateable value of the house was in possession of the house at the passing of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923.

Held, that although s. 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, provides that where the rent of a dwelling-house is less than two-thirds of its rateable value the Act shall apply to the dwelling-house as if no such tenancy existed, the tenant was not, as against the freeholders, to be deemed to be the landlord of the house for the purposes of s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 so as to cause the house to become decontrolled.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of Judge Tobin at Westminster County Court. The plaintiffs had claimed possession of a dwelling-house, but the county court Judge had held that the tenant, the defendant, was protected by the Rent Restriction Acts. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Bensley Wells appeared for the appellants; Mr. Ronald Walker for the respondent.

Mr. WELLS said that the plaintiffs' claim in the county court was for possession of a house known as 15, Gillingham-street, Pimlico, S.W., of which they owned the freehold. The facts were agreed between the parties. In 1904 Mr. Liffen, the defendant, became the assignee of a 98 years' lease of the premises which expired in June, 1924, and he entered into possession of the premises under that assignment. The net rateable value of the premises at all material times had been £38 a year. The rent reserved under the lease was £5 and was, therefore, considerably less than two-thirds of the rateable value of the house. (See section 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which is set out infra). On July 31, 1923, the date of the passing of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, Mr. Liffen was still in actual occupation of the premises. On June 4, 1924, the plaintiffs wrote to him pointing out that the long lease was coming to an end and offering to allow him to remain in the house as a quarterly tenant at a yearly rent of £56 5s. Mr. Liffen accepted that and he remained as quarterly tenant on those terms after the expiration of the long lease. In November, 1926, however, an admittedly proper notice to quit was served on him by the plaintiffs determining the quarterly tenancy as from March 25, 1927. Mr. Liffen refused to leave the premises. The present proceedings were started by Messrs. Brooks in the county court to recover possession of the house and Mr. Liffen's defence to the claim was that he was protected by the Rent Restriction Acts.

Counsel submitted that that was not so as the premises had become decontrolled. Section 12, subsection 7, of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, provided: "Where the rent payable in respect of any tenancy of any dwelling-house is less than two-thirds of the rateable value thereof, this Act shall not apply to that rent or tenancy . . . and this Act shall apply in respect of such dwelling-house as if no such tenancy existed or ever had existed." Section 2, subsection 1, of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, provided: "Where the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act [The Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920] applies is in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the passing of this Act [July 31, 1923] or comes into possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at any time after the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, or from and after the date when the landlord subsequently comes into possession, as the case may be, the principal Act shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house. . . ."

In Finèy v. Gougoltz (42 The Times L.R., 501; [1926] 2 K.B., 322) it was decided that a tenant under a long lease at a rent less than two-thirds of the rateable value was to be deemed to be the landlord of the demised premises for the purpose of section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923. In the present case, therefore, Mr. Liffen was to be deemed to be the landlord of the premises; he was in possession of the whole of them on July 31, 1923; and the premises thus became decontrolled.

Mr. RONALD WALKER was not called on to argue on behalf of the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—This case is, in my opinion, a plain one. The question for our decision is whether or not this dwelling-house had been decontrolled in June, 1924, when it was let to the defendant on a quarterly tenancy. Every matter which arises under those parts of the Rent Restriction Acts which deal with tenancy is a matter between landlord and tenant—either between contractual landlord and contractual tenant, or between statutory landlord and statutory tenant, and every such case must also relate to a dwelling-house which is the subject of tenancy between that landlord and that tenant. It is important, in considering cases under the Rent Restriction Acts, to bear in mind who is the landlord and who is the tenant and what is the dwelling-house for the purpose of a particular decision.

This case, in my opinion, depends on the construction of section 12 (7) of the Act of 1920 and of section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923. In the light of section 12 (7) of the Act of 1920 I ask myself what is to be regarded as the legal position on July 31, 1923, of the parties to this action with reference to the dwelling-house which is its subject-matter. Section 12 (7) directs us to shut our eyes to the fact of an existing tenancy. It does not direct us to shut our eyes to anything else. It is admitted that on July 31, 1923, the plaintiffs were the owners of this dwelling-house and Mr. Liffen was in occupation of the whole of it. We must, however, say, for the purpose of these Acts, that no relationship of landlord and tenant existed between them. They were owners and occupier. There is no reason to assume that Mr. Liffen was a trespasser. He must be regarded as having been rightly on the premises and a person who is rightly on the premises in the absence of a tenancy must be a licensee.

Was the landlord of this dwelling-house in possession of it on July 31, 1923, within section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923? The word "landlord" must be loosely used in that subsection because, strictly speaking, there cannot be a landlord without a tenant and a tenure, and the subsection deals with a case where there is neither tenant nor tenure. "Landlord" clearly must mean nothing more than "owner." Were the owners of this dwelling-house in possession of it on July 31, 1923? Mr. Liffen was certainly not the owner and, in my view, he certainly was not the landlord. In fact, he was the tenant, but we are not allowed to say so. The plaintiffs were the owners. They were not in possession.

In my opinion, it is quite plain that section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 never came into operation as regards this dwelling-house and the Act of 1920 never ceased to apply to it. For these reasons I think that the county court Judge was right and that this appeal fails.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I am of the same opinion. We are much indebted to counsel for the plaintiffs for the clear statement of his argument, but that argument bears on its face its own refutation. It is desirable in cases under these Acts to avoid saying anything which does not directly bear on the actual case before the Court.

Here an ingenious attempt has been made to apply section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 in a way which, in my opinion, is manifestly outside the contemplation of those who framed and enacted the section. The object of the section is to confer certain rights on a man who is a landlord at the time when the question of his position as against a tenant arises, if he can show that he was in possession of, or took possession of, the dwelling-house at either of the times specified in the Act. The argument here has suggested that, because a tenant under a long lease, who has not sublet, would be a landlord if he did sublet, he is therefore to be deemed to be a landlord, in relation to the freeholder who is in fact his landlord, for the purposes of this section which was passed with the object to which I have referred. It is said that the freeholder can say to the person who is in truth his tenant: "You, my tenant, who would be in the position of a landlord if you sublet, were in possession on the critical date and although I, who was your landlord then and am so now, was not then, and never have been, in possession, the premises are decontrolled and I can charge you what I like." That seems to me to be an entire perversion of the scope of this subsection, and a fallacious deduction from the fact that a tenant may in other proceedings be himself put in the position of a landlord. The argument is founded on section 12 (7) of the Act of 1920, and is that, because alio intuitu there is supposed to be no tenancy when the rent under a long lease is below a certain figure, the tenant is to be considered, qua a person who is in fact landlord, not a tenant, but a landlord.

It is often possible by looking at portions of Acts of Parliament outside their context and by disregarding the intention with which they have been passed to construct artificial interpretations of them. I do not think that, when critically scrutinized, this argument appears to be sound, but even if I thought it more closely woven than I think it is, I should hold that there had been a misinterpretation of the Act of Parliament. There are certain authorities (one only of which has been quoted in support of the argument on behalf of the plaintiffs) which, I think, tell very much against it, but, whether that be so or not, no case has been quoted to us which, in my opinion, really supports the argument on behalf of the plaintiffs. The cases are all cases involving the consideration of a double capacity, that is to say, the position of a man who is in one relationship a tenant and in another relationship a landlord. This case is free from any such complication.

For these reasons I think that the county court Judge was right in law, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed, with costs. Leave to appeal was refused.

DE MONCHY AND OTHERS v. PHŒNIX INSURANCE COMPANY OF HARTFORD AND ANOTHER.*

Insurance (Leakage)—Certificate—Issue under alleged policies—Time limit for claim—Limit in policies—No limit in certificate—Volatility of thing insured—Bulk dependent on temperature—Whether "leakage" confined to loss of contents.

The plaintiffs had an interest in a certificate of insurance on 100 barrels of turpentine shipped from Florida to Rotterdam. This certificate had been issued under what were said to be policies of insurance subscribed by the defendants. The policies provided for payment for "leakage" in excess of 1 per cent., and, as the practice was to measure, but not to weigh, the amount shipped, and to weigh, but not to measure, the amount delivered, and as, owing to the volatility of turpentine, the weight of a gallon depended on the temperature, it was provided that the conversion of kilograms into American gallons should be on the basis of 3.25 kilograms to the gallon. The alleged policies contained a condition that no claim under them could be maintained unless brought within a year, but in the certificate there was no such condition. When the turpentine was discharged, the weight was short, as compared with the weight calculated from the number of gallons shipped, but the defendants declined to pay in the absence of injury to the barrels or some clear sign of leakage. This action was brought on the certificate but not within the year.

Held, that the contract was to pay for loss of weight or bulk, even if this was caused by change of temperature and not by loss of some of the contents of the barrels, and that, as the alleged policies were not contracts of insurance at all, but the certificate was the actual insurance, and as, in the circumstances, the clause as to limitation of time could not be read into it, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

The plaintiffs in this action were the owners of a quantity of turpentine which had been shipped in barrels from the United States. They had insured the turpentine with the defendants, two insurance companies, for the voyage. The perils insured against included leakage, and the plaintiffs now claimed for loss alleged to have been caused by leakage.

Mr. Porter, K.C., and Mr. McNair appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. van den Berg for the defendants.

The plaintiffs were interested in a certificate of insurance, dated August 27, 1923, issued under an alleged policy of insurance subscribed by the first defendant company, and in another alleged policy subscribed by the second defendant company. Each of the defendant companies insured respectively for 50 per cent. of 14,925 florins on 100 barrels of turpentine shipped from Jacksonville, Florida, to Rotterdam, on a steamship, the Cape Town Maru.

The alleged policies contained, inter alia, a clause "to pay leakage from any cause in excess of 1 per cent. on each invoice . . . conversion of kilograms into American gallons shall be made on the basis of 3.25 kilograms to the gallon."

The practice in the trade appeared to be not to weigh, but to measure, the amount of turpentine shipped, and to weigh, not measure, the amount delivered.

On August 25, 1923, the plaintiffs shipped on the Cape Town Maru, at Jacksonville, 100 barrels of turpentine for carriage to Rotterdam. During the voyage the steamer met with heavy weather, and when the turpentine was discharged at Rotterdam it was alleged that 372.75 kilograms out of a total of 16,597.75 kilograms shipped had disappeared.

Mr. Porter said that as turpentine was a volatile substance and expanded when heated the weight of a gallon would depend on the actual temperature at the moment, and a conventional weight per gallon was, therefore, agreed on. Up to a loss of 1 per cent. no claim could be made, but where there was a greater loss the underwriters had been in the habit of paying on the basis of the conventional weight, taking the difference between the weight shipped and the weight delivered as the amount of the loss. But the underwriters in this case had taken up the attitude that they would not pay for leakage unless there was visible injury to the barrels or other clear sign of leakage.

Another point taken by the defence was that the insurance was subject to a condition that no claim under it could be maintained unless brought within a year. There was such a condition in the original policies, but not in the certificate under which the plaintiffs were suing, and the question was whether the plaintiffs were bound by that condition. The action had not been brought within a year, so that, if the condition applied, the claim would be barred. The certificate stated that it "represented and took the place of the policy." From that statement, he submitted, the plaintiffs were entitled to assume that there was in existence a policy insuring against the ordinary perils and containing the ordinary conditions, but not containing anything unusual, such as the limitation of the period for suing. It might be that such limitation would apply between original insurer and original insured, and yet would not apply against the holder of a certificate. The statement that the certificate represents and took the place of the policy did not imply that every clause of the policy was incorporated in the certificate.

Mr. Jowitt submitted that the method in which business in this trade was carried on was unsatisfactory. Instead of relying on intake measurement and outturn weight, a combination which could not give accurate results, the actual weight at each end should be taken. And more care should be taken to ascertain the tare weight of the barrels.

As to the condition requiring the claim to be made within a year, the underwriters had deliberately taken the point. The claim was stale, documents relating to it had been destroyed, and no definite evidence could be brought in support of the claim. The defendants were perfectly willing to pay for loss which was really caused by leakage, but they were not prepared to pay for apparent loss which was really only a contraction in bulk due to lowered temperature. The certificate must be read with the original policy to ascertain the real contract between the parties.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon, in giving judgment, stated the facts, and said that the first defence to the claim was that the insurance was only against leakage, and though, if the temperature fell, the contents of a barrel might occupy less space without any of the contents being lost, for such loss of bulk the underwriters would not be liable. The defence contended that "leakage" must be construed strictly, and that the word was applicable only where something which had been in a receptacle had accidentally got out of it and had been lost. But, reading the clauses of the contract as a whole, he thought that what the underwriters said was, "We will pay for any loss of weight or of bulk during this voyage if the loss exceeds 1 per cent." The plaintiffs were, therefore, entitled to find the arrival weight, turn the quantity shipped into kilograms by the conventional formula, and then, if the difference between those two weights exceeded 1 per cent., make a claim. On that part of the case, therefore, the claim succeeded.

As to the provision that the action must be brought within one year, the certificate was said to take the place of the policy, and it contained many clauses. His Lordship discussed the clauses of the certificate and of the policy, and said that in his view the document called a policy was not a contract of insurance at all. It did not state the port of shipment or of destination; it did not fix the premium; and, in fact, only recorded the general terms on which the underwriters were willing to make contracts of insurance if asked to do so. The certificate was the actual insurance, and the question was whether the limitation clause could be read into it. The clause was an unusual one, and the defendants themselves had apparently forgotten its existence; for they went on corresponding about the matter long after a year had passed. He thought that the defendants had failed to make out that this clause must be considered as part of the contract, and there must, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiffs.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Atkin and Lawrence, L.JJ.)
1927. Nov. 18.

FORBES, ABBOTT, AND LENNARD, LIMITED v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Negligence—Vessel in dock—Condition as to sole risk of owners of vessel—Injury in lock through negligence of dock-owners' servants—Whether dock-owners protected by condition—Whether lock included in "dock."

The defendants, who were the owners of Chelsea Dock and of a lock connecting it with the River Thames, received the plaintiffs' barge into the dock on the condition that "All barges or vessels while in Chelsea Dock are at the sole risk of owners or persons bringing or causing the same to be brought into the dock." While the barge was in the lock on its way out from the dock to the river, it was damaged through the negligence of the defendants' servants.

Held, (1) that the words of the condition were adequate to exempt the defendants from liability for the negligence of their servants, and (2) that the word "dock" in the above condition must be interpreted as including the lock, and therefore the defendants were exempt from liability.

Decision of Avory, J. (43 The Times L.R., 769), reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendants, the Great Western Railway Company, from a judgment of Mr. Justice Avory (43 The Times L.R., 769), in favour of the plaintiffs, Forbes, Abbott, and Lennard, Limited, who were the owners of a barge, and who claimed damages for injury thereto occasioned by the alleged negligence of the servants of the defendants while the barge was being passed from Chelsea Dock through the lock connecting the dock with the River Thames. Both the dock and the lock belonged to the defendants. The defendants denied negligence, and further said that the barge was in the lock at the plaintiffs' sole risk. They relied upon public notices affixed to the lock.

The jury found for the plaintiffs on the issue of negligence, and the damages were agreed at £175.

On behalf of the defendants it was then submitted that, notwithstanding that finding, the defendants were entitled to judgment on the ground that condition No. 1 of the terms and conditions on which the defendants received barges into Chelsea Dock, of which the plaintiffs were to be assumed to have had notice, exempted them from liability for such negligence. The condition was as follows :—

"All barges or vessels while in Chelsea Dock are at the sole risk of owners or persons bringing or causing the same to be brought into the dock."

The defendants contended that the word "dock" in the condition included the lock, and that the terms used were sufficient to exclude liability for damage caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants.

Mr. Justice Avory held that condition No. 1 did not clearly and unambiguously apply to the lock as distinguished from the dock, and he, therefore, came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled to £175 damages.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. Wilfrid Lewis appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Charles, K.C., Mr. Rowland Thomas, and Mr. Roland Champness for the respondents.

The Master of the Rolls, in the course of his considered judgment, said that on February 5, 1926, the plaintiffs' barge was brought into the dock for the purpose of loading a cargo of coal. It was in charge of Finch, their lighterman, who had been in the dock with barges before. On the morning of February 8, 1926, the barge was ready to leave about an hour after high water. Vessels entering or leaving the dock had to conform to the directions of the defendants' dockmaster Titcomb. The barge went into the lock, and when the water had dropped to the river level it was found that there was not sufficient water. The barge stranded on the lock sill and suffered strain and damage so that, ultimately, it became necessary to expend £175 on repairs.

The action was tried twice. At the first trial the jury disagreed, but on the second they found a verdict in favour of the plaintiffs for £175. Mr. Justice Avory held that the terms of the conditions did not afford a defence to the action and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Two points were taken on the appeal : (1) that there was no evidence of negligence by the defendants' servants ; and (2) that, even if they were negligent, the express terms and conditions under which the plaintiffs used the lock and the dock were binding on the plaintiffs and exempted the defendants from liability.

On the first point the Court had carefully examined the evidence and had come to the conclusion that, when Finch wanted to take the barge out of the dock Titcomb was quite conscious that the time available for the passage, owing to the fall in the tide, was short. It was admitted that he could prevent a barge from going out, if it were dangerous to take it out. It appeared that the defendants did owe a duty to the barge-owner, as they exercised a control over barges coming into and going out of the dock. The jury had found that sufficient care had not been exercised ; there was evidence upon which they could so find, and therefore the Court could not disturb their finding of fact on the question of negligence.

The second point, which had been argued more fully in this Court than before Mr. Justice Avory, was a more difficult one. The Chelsea Dock was constructed originally for the West London Railway under the West London Railway Extension Act, 1859, and had become vested in the Great Western Railway Company under the railway amalgamation scheme. That Act incorporated the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, under which power was given to make by-laws regulating docks. By section 2 of the Act of 1847

"the expression 'the harbour, dock, or pier,' shall mean the harbour, dock, or pier, and the works connected therewith, by the special Act authorized to be constructed."

* Reported by H. Langford Lewis and G. T. Whitfield-Hayes, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

The whole of the works, including the dock and the lock, were authorized to be constructed by the special Act of 1859. It was, therefore, impossible, for the purposes of the by-laws, to separate the lock from the dock. By section 83 of the Act of 1847 the authority was empowered to make by-laws :

" for regulating the admission of vessels into or near the harbour, dock, or pier, and their removal out of and from the same, and for the good order and government of such vessels, whilst within the harbour or dock, or at or near the pier."

The by-laws, therefore, applied to the whole system, comprising both the dock and the lock. In addition to that, there were certain terms and conditions made applicable by the by-laws. The terms and conditions referred in more than one place to the company's by-laws and fitted in with them, so that it was impossible to say that the terms and conditions applied to the dock, but not to the lock. The question then was whether condition No. 1 served to release the defendants from liability for accidents in the lock. He wished to adopt the statement of Lord Justice Scrutton in Rutter v. Palmer (38 The Times L.R., 555 ; [1922] 2 K.B., 87, at p. 92), where he said :—

" In construing an exemption clause, certain general rules may be applied : First, the defendant is not exempted from liability for the negligence of his servants, unless adequate words are used ; secondly, the liability of the defendant apart from the exempting words must be ascertained ; then the particular clause in question must be considered ; and if the only liability of the party pleading the exemption is a liability for negligence, the clause will more readily operate to exempt him."

In Price and Co. v. Union Lighterage Company (20 The Times L.R., 177 ; [1904] 1 K.B., 412), the exemption being in general terms, the barge-owner was held not to be exempt from liability for the negligence of his servants. In the present case the words were quite wide enough to include negligence. See Reynolds v. Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Company, Limited (38 The Times L.R., 429).

The second rule was that the liability of the defendants must be ascertained. He was not at all sure that the words used would cover liability for pilferage from the cargo in the dock, as had been suggested. See Shaw v. Great Western Railway Company (10 The Times L.R., 176 ; [1894] 1 K.B., 373). After a careful examination of the points of liability, apart from negligence, it was difficult to suggest that there were any. It appeared to him that the words used in the condition were intended to cover negligence, and they were quite apt to do so. The condition dealt with " persons bringing or causing the same to be brought into the dock." That was just the point at which the greatest probability of danger, and injury to the vessel, might arise. The judgment of the Judge below must be set aside, the appeal allowed, with costs, and judgment entered for the defendants.

Lord Justice Atkin said that it was quite clear that in a case like the present the contracting party, the Great Western Railway Company, could be relieved from liability under the contract only if the language of the alleged exemption were clear and unambiguous. In the present case the language used was reasonably clear, and the intention to exclude liability arising from the negligence of servants was obvious. It was difficult to distinguish the liability of the defendants from that referred to by Lord Justice Scrutton in Rutter v. Palmer (38 The Times L.R., 555 ; [1922] 2 K.B., 87), and he (Lord Justice Atkin) would find it very difficult to say that the words used in the condition No. 1 were not plain and unambiguous, or that they did not plainly operate to exempt the defendants from liability for the negligence of their servants.

As to the point raised that " in the lock " was not " in the dock," that might be so in common parlance, where a dock might well be different from a lock ; but in this case, as soon as it was seen that the condition was intended to protect the railway company from any negligence on the part of their servants, it was easy to see that it was meant to apply to the lock also.

Lord Justice Lawrence thought that there was no doubt that the expression " Chelsea Dock " would cover also the site of the lock. As regards the other point raised, he thought that it was reasonably clear from the language of the exemption that negligence of the defendants' servants was intended to be covered. Had counsel for the plaintiffs shown that there was any other risk likely to be run in the dock he might have come nearer to succeeding, but it seemed on the face of things that negligence of the kind that actually happened was the risk against which the defendants had expressly desired to guard.

K.B. Div. (Scrutton and Sargant, L.JJ.) 1927. Nov. 24.

GLANVILLE v. SUTTON AND CO., LIMITED.*

Animals—Damage by—Liability of owner—Scienter—Horse accustomed to bite other horses—Whether owner liable for bite of human being.

The fact that the owner of a horse knew that it was accustomed to bite other horses is not sufficient to establish his liability for its biting a human being.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Mr. Glanville, from a judgment of his Honour Judge Sherwell Cooper in an action tried by him, with a jury, in the Mayor's and City of London Court.

The plaintiff's claim was for personal injuries caused by a horse, the property of the defendants. The facts as found were as follows :—The plaintiff was crossing from the south side of Ludgate-hill to the north side, where there was, by the kerb, a stationary one-horse van, the property of the defendants. It was unattended. The carman had gone to adjoining premises on his business, and the plaintiff, when crossing the road, passed a short distance in front of the horse. As he was passing, the horse, which was muzzled, stretched out its head and made for the head of the plaintiff, thereby injuring his face.

Evidence had been given that on a previous occasion the horse had bitten another horse, and that since the injury to the plaintiff it had attempted to bite other horses.

The questions which were put to the jury, together with their answers, were :—

" (1) Did the defendants know, or ought they to have known, that the horse was (a) dangerous to other horses ?—Yes ; (b) dangerous to mankind ? —Yes. (2) Was the injury to the plaintiff caused by the dangerous nature of the horse ?—Yes. (3) Were the defendants in all the circumstances negligent in leaving the horse unattended ?—No."

* Reported by E. J. M. Chaplin, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On those findings the jury awarded £25 damages to the plaintiff.

In a considered judgment the Judge came to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the finding of the jury, the defendants were entitled to judgment, and he entered judgment accordingly.

The plaintiff appealed on the ground that, on the findings of the jury, the Judge was wrong in law in entering judgment for the defendants.

Mr. F. G. Paterson appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. H. D. Samuels for the defendants.

Mr. Paterson submitted, on behalf of the plaintiff, that where anybody kept an animal with a vicious propensity which made it an exception to its class, and the owner was aware of that propensity, he was liable upon the analogy of Fletcher v. Rylands (L.R., 1 Ex., 265 ; L.R., 3 H.L., 330). The only question which should have been left to the jury was whether the horse had a vicious propensity. It was entirely a matter for them. Upon their findings, he submitted that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. He referred to Cox v. Burbidge (13 C.B., N.S., 430) ; Bradley v. Wallaces, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 705 ; [1913] 3 K.B., 629) ; Jones v. Perry (2 Esp., 482) ; Manton v. Brocklebank (39 The Times L.R., 344 ; [1923] 2 K.B., 212).

The Court did not call upon counsel for the defendants.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in giving judgment, said that the case raised an interesting point. He referred to the facts and to the questions which had been left to the jury, and said that no objection had been taken to the finding that the horse, to the knowledge of the defendants, was dangerous to other horses. But as to the other finding, that it was dangerous to mankind, no evidence had been given to show that horses which bit other horses would bite mankind. He agreed with what had been said by Lord Sterndale, M.R., in Manton v. Brocklebank (39 The Times L.R., 344 ; [1923] 2 K.B., 212), that it was not safe for people to act upon what they believed to be common knowledge without evidence, and horses were subjects upon which people often disagreed. He (the Lord Justice) agreed that in this case no such evidence as was necessary had been given.

But then the case for the plaintiff had been put upon this line of thought. It was said that, when once it was known that the horse was in this one respect different from what horses ordinarily were, it was shown to be out of its class, and, therefore, must be kept by its owner at his own risk within the principle of Fletcher v. Rylands (L.R., 1 Ex., 265 ; L.R., 3 H.L., 330), so that the defendants would be liable for the damage. He was not aware of any case which justified the statement that when once the owner knew that an animal was dangerous in one particular way he became liable in respect of any other kind of damage caused by the animal, however unexpected or unusual. He could find no authority to support the view that it was to be assumed that an animal would do all sorts of things which its species did not generally do. In Manton v. Brocklebank (supra) Lord Justice Atkin had said, at page 231 : "The owner of a dog is not liable for its trespass and damage without proof of scienter of a special mischievous propensity to do such damage." The words to be emphasized were, "to do such damage," and not "to do some other damage."

It appeared to him that when there was a finding that the owner of the horse knew that it was accustomed to bite other horses, that was not sufficient to establish liability for damage of a different kind—namely, for biting, not animals, but human beings. The appeal, therefore, failed, and must be dismissed.

Lord Justice Sargant agreed.

Chan. Div. (Clauson, J.) 1927. Nov. 24.

MACAULAY v. GUARANTY TRUST COMPANY OF NEW YORK.*

International Law — Foreign receivers—Chose in action—Right by foreign law to sue—Right in this country.

Foreign receivers or assignees in bankruptcy, who have, according to the law of the country in which they have been appointed, a right to sue in their own names for a chose in action due to a person in respect of whose property they have been appointed, have a similar right of action here.

The plaintiffs in this action, who were duly appointed according to American law by the Court of Chancery in the State of Delaware as the receivers of the assets and property of the Parkhill Corporation, Limited, claimed to be entitled to be paid all moneys now standing or hereafter to stand to the credit of the corporation with the defendants. The defendants, the London branch of the Guaranty Trust Company of New York, carried on the business of bankers and had, as such, £2,065 4s. in their hands belonging to the corporation. In their defence they stated that they were willing to abide by an order of the Court.

By an order made by the Court of Chancery of the State of Delaware, dated June 13, 1927, the Parkhill Corporation, Limited, which had been incorporated under the laws of that State on January 15, 1924, were adjudged to be insolvent, and the plaintiffs were appointed receivers of the corporation to have sole control of all assets and solely to administer the affairs of the company.

Under that order this action was begun. On November 2, 1927, on motion in the proceedings in Delaware, an order was made vacating the order of June 13, 1927, and reappointing the plaintiffs pendente lite to have sole control and to take possession of all the assets and solely to administer the affairs of the company. The plaintiffs were further authorized to take all necessary proceedings to secure control and possession of the assets. The corporation, as a party to the cause, were ordered to deliver into the possession of the plaintiffs any assets in their control and possession.

Mr. Gover, K.C., and Mr. F. O. Langley appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. J. G. Strangman for the defendant company.

Mr. Gover, in opening the case, said that there was no question that the £2,065 4s. was due to the Parkhill Corporation, but the defendant company thought that they were entitled to an order from this Court before paying over the money in their hands. By international comity Courts here gave effect to orders of foreign Courts.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON.—If I appointed a new trustee of a trust in New York, would effect be given in America to that order?

Mr. GOVER.—The American Court would have regard to your Lordship's order.

Continuing, counsel said that the domicile of the Parkhill Corporation was in the State of Delaware. The order there made was what we should call a winding-up order, but it was really a combination of a winding-up order and an administration order. Whereas the first order of June 13 was a final order, the order made on November 2 modified it by making it pendente lite. This case was analogous to cases in which the Courts in this country had been asked to hand over property here to a foreign curator.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON.—Prima facie, this order will have no effect against the Parkhill Corporation in this country. They are not joined as parties to the present proceedings.

Mr. GOVER referred to Westlake's Private International Law (7th Ed., p. 177); Alivon v. Furnival (1 Cr., M. and R., 277, at pp. 286, 294). In Didisheim v. London and Westminster Bank (16 The Times L.R., 311; [1900] 2 Ch., 15, at pp. 48, 50) the principle was adopted that a foreign curator could sue here in his own name for the goods and chattels of a person of unsound mind.

Mr. STRANGMAN said that the defendant company claimed no interest in the £2,065 4s., and set up no cross-claim against it.

Mr. Valentine Worthington, a member of the English Bar and of the Bar of New York, gave evidence that he was conversant with the laws of the State of Delaware and had considered the order made in that State appointing the plaintiffs as receivers, and he was of opinion that under that order the plaintiffs could sue in a Court in the State of Delaware to recover property or choses in action, belonging to the Parkhill Corporation, without joining the corporation as plaintiffs.

Mr. STRANGMAN admitted that his Lordship was entitled, according to the general rule of international law, to regard the order appointing the plaintiffs as an order to which this Court would give effect.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON said that he would give judgment that the plaintiffs should recover against the defendant company £2,065 4s., the plaintiffs to pay the defendant company's costs. He felt justified in making that order, having regard to the decision of Baron Parke in Alivon v. Furnival (1 Cr., M. and R., 277). That was an authority for the proposition that, if receivers or assignees in bankruptcy had, according to the law of the country in which they had been appointed, a right to sue in their own names for a chose in action due to a body or person in respect of whose property they had been appointed receivers or assignees, that gave them a right which this country, by the comity of nations, would treat as though it were a right of action at common law on evidence that in fact the operation of the orders appointing them gave them a right to recover choses in action in the country in which they were appointed.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Atkin and Lawrence, L.JJ.)
1927. Nov. 25.

MAXWELL v. KEUN, JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LIMITED, AND BUTLER AND TANNER.

MAXWELL v. KEUN, JONATHAN CAPE, LIMITED, AND BUTLER AND TANNER.*

Practice—Postponement of action—Application—Dismissal with costs—Appeal—Competency—Interference with Judge's discretion—Rules of the Supreme Court, Order XXXVI., r. 34—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 27 (1).

Where a Judge dismisses with costs an application under Order XXXVI., r. 34, to postpone a trial, his decision is, at all events by leave, subject to appeal under s. 27 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and, though the Court of Appeal will be slow to interfere with the exercise of his discretion, it will do so if it comes to the conclusion that justice would not result from the decision appealed from.

This was an appeal, by leave of the Court of Appeal, from the refusal of an application by the plaintiff that two actions should stand out of the list during this term.

Sir Henry Maddocks, K.C., and Mr. Linton Thorp appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Norman Birkett, K.C., and the Hon. S. O. Henn Collins, Mr. Croom-Johnson, K.C., Mr. Michael Hoare, and Mr. St. John Field for various defendants.

SIR HENRY MADDOCKS said that the plaintiff was an officer in the Army, and was at present serving in India. The first defendant, Miss Odette Keun, had written a book called "My Adventures in Bolshevik Russia," in which there were very grave libels upon the plaintiff, who had begun a libel action in respect thereof, No. 3,062 in the special jury list, which was at present about 106 out of the list. Miss Keun had also written a book called "Prince Tarièl," in which a Major Cassell, one of the characters, was, as the plaintiff alleged, a representation of, and a libel upon, him, his second Christian name being Cassell. There was another libel action in respect of that book, No. 3,063 in the same list, and that action was expected to be in the daily list almost immediately.

As it would be impossible to have a fair trial in the absence of the plaintiff in India, an application had been made to the Lord Chief Justice to allow both actions to be adjourned until a date to be fixed in the future, so that the plaintiff could get leave from the Army and return to England for the hearing. The Lord Chief Justice had refused that application, and the present application was by way of appeal from that refusal.

Miss Keun was not represented, but the other defendants were the printers and publishers of the two books.

Mr. BIRKETT took a preliminary objection that the discretion given to the Lord Chief Justice, by

* Reported by G. T. WHITFIELD-HAYES and H. LANGFORD LEWIS, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Order XXXVI., Rule 34, of the Rules of the Supreme Court—

"The Judge may, if he think it expedient for the interests of justice, postpone or adjourn a trial for such time, and to such place, and upon such terms, if any, as he shall think fit—" was an absolute discretion and could not be questioned by any other Court.

The counsel for the defendants also contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to the indulgence asked for. The alleged libels had been published in 1923 and 1924, and the plaintiff had taken no action until 1926.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS said that, with regard to action No. 3,063, the book, "Prince Tarièl," was said to have represented the plaintiff, under the name of Major Cassell, as being guilty of a gross piece of cruelty to a woman. It seemed essential that in an action like the present the plaintiff should be present and give evidence, and if he were unable to do so it seemed that judgment would probably be given for the defendants. A preliminary objection had been taken that the discretion of the Lord Chief Justice was not open to appeal; for, by section 27 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, it was said that the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to determine appeals "from any judgment or order of the High Court" and the defendants contended that there was no "judgment or order" here, but simply a refusal to alter the cause list. But the Lord Chief Justice had made an order giving the costs of the application to the defendants, and the addition of an order as to costs brought the matter within the term "order" in section 27 (1).

He (the Master of the Rolls) fully agreed that the discretion given to a Judge by Order XXXVI., Rule 34, should be upheld. Sir Henry Maddocks had, however, referred to a case, Sackville-West v. Attorney-General (128 Law Times Newspaper, 265), which showed that, although it would only be upon rare occasions, yet now and again the Court of Appeal might interfere if it could see that justice would not result from the order made below. He (his Lordship) agreed with that decision. The facts in the present case were not in dispute. If the plaintiff were absent in India, his action would probably fail, judgment would be for the defendants and that would be the result in spite of any order which the Judge could make at the hearing. Could it be said that in the absence of the plaintiff justice would be done between the parties? The defendants' counsel had suggested that an application to adjourn might be made when the case was called on, but that course would be inconvenient and expensive.

The Court of Appeal had the deepest respect for the decision of the Lord Chief Justice, but they had had the opportunity of having the matter explained at much greater length and with more detail. The only right course was to say that action No. 3,063 would not be heard this term. It was not necessary to make any order as to action No. 3,062, as it would not be in the list this term in any event. The application as to that last action would, therefore, be dismissed. Action No. 3,063 would stand out of the list for the present.

LORD JUSTICE ATKIN said that he was of the same opinion, and but for the fact that the Court was differing from the view of the Lord Chief Justice, he would not have added anything. The Court ought to be very slow to interfere with the discretion of a Judge in such a matter as the time of the trial. If, however, it was clear to the Court of Appeal that the order appealed from would lead to what amounted to a denial of justice, they would not hesitate to reverse it. In Jones v. S.R. Anthracite Collieries, Limited (90 L.J.K.B., 1315) the Court allowed such an appeal. Lord Sterndale, M.R., said (at p. 1316): "I cannot remember any specific instance of this Court doing so, but my impression is that this Court has interfered with the decision of even High Court Judges in regard to 'adjournments,' although, as I say, I cannot remember any specific instance of that being done at the moment." And Lord Justice Scrutton said: "I should like to say, in regard to the point as to whether the Court has ever interfered with the decision of a County Court Judge as regards an adjournment, that my impression is the same as that of the Master of the Rolls. My impression is that this Court has frequently interfered with the decisions of County Court and High Court Judges in regard to the question of 'adjournment,' because the whole duty of this Court, and of every Court, should be to do justice between the parties without being prevented by technical objections." He (his Lordship), continuing, said that he was distinctly of the same impression. In order to determine the question it seemed relevant to dwell for a few moments on the facts of the case. The plaintiff complained of a libel upon himself contained in two different books, each written by the same author, Miss Keun, and printed by the same printers, but published by different publishers. In one case the book was entitled "My Adventures in Bolshevik Russia," and it referred to the plaintiff by his name and used words in reference to him which were plainly defamatory. In that action the defence was only a denial of liability with payment of a sum of money into Court, but it had been set down rather late, and was now about 106 cases down the list. In the second action the words complained of referred to one Major Cassell, of the British Mission in Georgia, and the plaintiff said that the reference was to him under his proper rank and his second name. Both writs were issued on the same day, but the proceedings did not quite synchronize, as one action was delayed by various interlocutory proceedings; the other action, however, proceeded rapidly, and had been brought into the list early by the act of the defendants, who gave notice of trial at a date when they knew that the plaintiff was in India. It was said that the plaintiff had been guilty of delay, but it was not disputed that if the action came on next week it would be impossible for him to succeed in it. It appeared to him (his Lordship) quite obvious that it was the duty of the defendants to provide that, if the plaintiff were abroad and were obliged to return home, he would be able to have both actions heard one after the other during the same period of leave. It was perfectly reasonable for the plaintiff to have waited until both actions had been set down for trial, and the second one had not been set down for trial until October of this year. He (his Lordship) did not take the view that the present application could have been made in May or June, or even in July. In the exercise of his judicial discretion no Judge ought to make any order that would defeat or destroy the rights of the parties, unless he was satisfied that by reason of the conduct of one of the parties he ought to do so. Here a very substantial injustice would have been done had the case come on for trial immediately. The case ought not to be heard this term, and therefore should be taken out of the weekly list. It would save considerable expense to the plaintiff if it could be arranged that the two actions should come on, one immediately after the other. As to the other case it was unnecessary to apply for the postponement of an action which was now 106 cases off, and that appeal would therefore be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE agreed. No words of his, he thought, were needed to emphasize the reluctance of the Court of Appeal to interfere with the discretionary order of a Judge, unless it was clear that such an order must result in a denial of justice. On the facts in the present case he was convinced that if the case came on there would be such a denial. It was not suggested that the plaintiff was in any way reluctant to come to England to give evidence at the trial, and be cross-examined, but it was plain that if he was not present he must fail. He agreed with the order proposed to be made in the one case, and that in the other the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

K.B. Div. (Rowlatt, J.) 1927. Nov. 28.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. STILL AND ANOTHER.*

Revenue — Betting duty—Returns—Default—Information by Attorney-General—Judgment for penalties—Whether a "conviction"—Order disqualifying from holding certificate—Finance Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 22), s. 17 (3).

By s. 17 (3) of the Finance Act, 1926, "Any Court before which a bookmaker is convicted of any offence under this Part of this Act or otherwise in connexion with his business as a bookmaker, may order him to be disqualified for holding a bookmaker's certificate for such period as the Court may think fit. . . ."

Held, that a judgment for penalties on an information by the Attorney-General in the High Court under s. 17 (1) for failure to make returns of bets is a "conviction" within the meaning of s. 17 (3).

This was the first motion in the High Court for an order to disqualify bookmakers from holding a bookmaker's certificate under section 17 (3) of the Finance Act, 1926, on the ground that they had been convicted of offences relating to betting duty. The respondents, Mr. Frederick Henry Still and Mr. John Bennett, carried on business in partnership at the time of the offences charged against them.

Mr. Bowstead moved on behalf of the Attorney-General; Mr. T. Carthew appeared for the respondents.

MR. BOWSTEAD read section 17 (3) of the Finance Act, 1926, which provided:—

"Any Court before which a bookmaker is convicted of any offence under this Part of this Act or otherwise in connexion with his business as a bookmaker, may order him to be disqualified for holding a bookmaker's certificate for such period as the Court may think fit, and any such certificate held by him shall, so long as the disqualification continues, be of no effect, and if any person applies for or obtains such a certificate while he is so disqualified he shall be liable to an excise penalty of one hundred pounds, and any certificate so obtained shall be of no effect."

The respondents, said counsel, had been convicted on an information by the Attorney-General in the High Court for failing, for 11 consecutive weeks, to make the return of bets required by the regulations made under the Act. Each separate offence rendered them liable to a penalty of £100, and they had been ordered to pay £1,100 in excise penalties. They were liable, in addition, to pay £1,700 for betting duty itself. The penalties might be recovered summarily, but in view of the large amount involved it was thought proper to proceed in the High Court. The respondents failed to enter appearance and were convicted in default.

MR. CARTHEW contended that this was a civil matter, and not a "conviction" which could be followed by disqualification. The word "conviction" referred to offences of a definitely criminal character, such as obstruction of an excise officer under section 16. In its ordinary sense "conviction" meant conviction before a criminal Court. On the civil nature of penalties he referred to Attorney-General v. Bradlaugh (14 Q.B.D., 667); Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, s.v. "Conviction"; Todd v. Robinson (12 Q.B.D., 530).

If his Lordship were against him on that, he submitted that this was not a case for disqualification. The betting duty, on its first introduction, placed a great deal of extra work on bookmakers, which was very heavy. The respondents did not, like many bookmakers, pass any of the duty on to their customers, and they sometimes found themselves unable to pay it owing to bad trade. In those cases they thought it useless to send the returns without the duty, but when they were in a position to pay they sent the returns up to date with the amount required. It was not a case of persons who had received the money and not handed it over.

MR. BOWSTEAD, in reply, referred to the forms of judgment for Crown debts and penalties respectively in the appendix to the Exchequer Rules, 1860. In the latter case the form was: "It is considered that the said A.B. be convicted of the offence charged."

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT delivered the following considered judgment:—In this case the defendants have suffered judgment in default of appearance for Excise penalties under section 17 (1) of the Finance Act, 1926, and motion was made before me under subsection 3 of that section for an order disqualifying them from holding bookmakers' certificates. To this it was objected that they had not been convicted of any offence under this part of the Act within the meaning of that subsection on the ground that the recovery of those penalties was not a conviction.

The form of proceeding for recovery of penalties was well known when the Act was passed, and is to be found set out in the Exchequer Rules of 1860. It is there declared that the language of the judgment in a case of this kind is that the defendant be convicted of the offence giving rise to the penalty. In these circumstances it seems impossible to argue that a judgment for the penalty cannot be described as a conviction of the offence.

* Reported by J. W. HALL and G. F. L. BRIDGMAN, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

I was, however, pressed with the case of Todd v. Robinson (12 Q.B.D., 530). There the plaintiff sued as a common informer to recover as a debt a penalty provided by the Public Health Act, 1875, and he obtained judgment, whereupon the Treasury, purporting to act under the Remission of Penalties Act, 1859 (22 Vic., c. 32), section 1, made an order for remission of what was now a judgment debt due to the plaintiff as a "penalty or forfeiture on a convicted offender." It was held that this did not protect the debtor as the judgment was not a conviction within the meaning of that Act.

That case has no bearing on the present case. The purpose of penal provisions, such as the one in the former case, is to expose an offender to a pecuniary sacrifice in respect of his offence, from which the Crown cannot protect him, by making him liable to an informer for the penalty simply as a matter of private debt altogether outside the region of convictions, and on that ground the Court decided that case.

I therefore order disqualification for three months from the date of the judgment. The order will be endorsed on the certificates and notice will be sent to the Commissioners.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Atkin and Lawrence, L.JJ.)
1927. Nov. 23.

JACOBSON v. FRACHON.*

International Law — Foreign judgments — Impeachability — Contrary to natural justice— Evidence required.

Observations on the evidence required to impeach a foreign judgment between the same parties where it is set up in answer to the plaintiff's claim.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Roche.

Jacobson, the plaintiff, carried on business in London. For the purposes of that business he purchased silk and crêpe de Chine goods from the defendant, a silk merchant of Lyons.

Disputes arose in connexion with the execution of those transactions, the plaintiff complaining, inter alia, that goods delivered to him were not of the contract quality and were not delivered within the time contracted for. A protest was made, and correspondence, and an interview at which an attempt was made to settle the case, took place. Ultimately an action was commenced in the Lyons Court by Frachon against Jacobson, and the Court appointed an expert, a M. Varenne, to examine the goods and report as to their quality. On receiving that report the French Court decided in favour of Frachon.

Jacobson brought this action against Frachon in England, and the defendant by his defence pleaded that as the matter had already been disposed of by the French Court the judgment of the French Court estopped the plaintiff from proceeding here. To that the plaintiff replied that the French judgment was not an estoppel because, in fact, the obtaining of it was "contrary to natural justice." He alleged that M. Varenne had been asked by him to examine the bulk samples which the defendant had sent him, but had refused point blank to do so ; that he also refused to examine other goods, and refused to hear witnesses whom the plaintiff presented to him ; that he was guilty of perversity and misconduct ; and that his position was similar to that of an official referee in the English Courts, and the refusal by an official of the Court to hear evidence was a denial of natural justice.

It was further alleged that M. Varenne ought not to have been appointed, as he was a brother-in-law of a partner of Frachon.

Since the action was begun in England Jacobson had applied to the French Court for the appointment of a fresh expert, but this was refused, and an appeal which had been lodged was withdrawn. The plaintiff, however, pursued his action here, contending that, unwilling as our Courts were to set aside the judgments of the Courts of a friendly country, they could and would do so in cases where those judgments had outraged natural justice.

Mr. Justice Roche expressed opinions unfavourable to the action of M. Varenne, and characterized his report on the quality of the goods shipped as an "uncandid document." He declined, however, to give a judgment which virtually would reverse that of the French Court and dismissed the action, but without costs.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. J. B. Matthews, K.C., Mr. Turner-Samuels, and Mr. C. F. Shoolbred for the appellant relied upon Salvesen or von Lorang v. Administrator of Austrian Property (43 The Times L.R., 609 ; [1927] A.C., 641) as showing that to prevent a failure of justice our Courts would set aside foreign judgments. In Westlake's International Law, 7th Edition, at p. 407, it was said that there was that exception to the respect which our Courts paid to the Courts of other countries.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. Stenham appeared for the respondent.

The Master of the Rolls, in the course of his judgment, referred to the contracts and said that complaints were made both as to the quality of goods and as to the time of delivery in the case of the first contract, and it was uncontested that no deliveries were made under the second contract. Protests were made, and correspondence took place, and an attempt was made, without result, to settle the dispute. There were undoubtedly breaches of contract by the defendant. The first step in the litigation was taken by the issue of a writ by Frachon in the French Court at Lyons claiming cancellation of the contract and damages. After various proceedings an expert, M. Varenne, was appointed by the Court on October 30, 1925. He was directed to come to London, inspect the goods in the plaintiff's possession, hear the statements of witnesses, inspect the contract, and report to the Commercial Court at Lyons. That order was made in accordance with chapter 14 of the Code Civil. On January 26, 1926, he made a preliminary examination at Lyons, and on February 5 he came over here to inspect and report. The plaintiff took exception to M. Varenne's report ; it was said that in one and a half hours he endeavoured to examine over 100 pieces of stuff, but would not hear any witnesses and made but a perfunctory examination of some of the pieces. On March 15, 1926, he made his report in favour of the view presented by the defendant, and said, in terms, that, even if there had been delay and if the goods were not in accordance with the contract, yet the facts were not such as to justify the plaintiff's attitude. The report was served on the parties. Mr. Jacobson appeared in the French Court, though an Englishman, and was represented by a French advocate, who took objections to the report. On May 17 an application was made to the Court to appoint another expert in place of M. Varenne, but the Court rejected it. On June 10 the case was argued in the Court at Lyons, on materials presented to the Court by counsel for Mr. Jacobson, but the Court accepted the report of M. Varenne and ordered the contract to be cancelled and Mr. Jacobson to pay £200.

It was plain from the judgment of Mr. Justice Roche that there was serious ground for thinking that M. Varenne did not exercise his functions in the manner that would be expected of an expert in this country. There was grave reason to suppose that the plaintiff's case had not been properly or adequately considered in the French Court.

In the English Court the defence was put in in December, 1925, and amended and redelivered on October 19, 1926, by pleading the estoppel created by the French judgment in favour of the defendant. A reply was filed by February 14, 1927, protesting against the action of M. Varenne, pleading that he did not make a proper examination of the goods or hear the plaintiff's witnesses, and that the whole procedure was contrary to the British idea of natural justice.

That issue, of course, raised the question whether the judgment which had been pleaded in answer to the claim was one that could be enforced by our Courts, or whether it ought to be ignored. Mr. Justice Roche came to certain conclusions, which the Court quite accepted, conclusions which were severe on M. Varenne's conduct. He described the report as the "uncandid production of a biased and prejudiced mind." That being so, the Court had to consider very carefully whether effect ought to be given to the judgment of the French Court.

The Courts had made it a rule of comity with foreign nations to accept the judgments of their Courts of competent jurisdiction. The passage accepted as the best authority on the point was that of the then Master of the Rolls, Lord Lindley, in Pemberton v. Hughes (15 The Times L.R., 211; [1899] 1 Ch., 781), where he said at p. 790 :—

"If a judgment is pronounced by a foreign Court over persons within its jurisdiction, and in a matter with which it is competent to deal, English Courts never investigate the propriety of the proceedings in the foreign Court, unless they offend against English views of substantial justice."

There were a number of cases in which it had been held that a foreign judgment could not be impeached on its merits, or on a mistake made in it, either of foreign or of English law. It must be assumed that the procedure of the foreign Court had been regular and rightly carried out. On those principles it was very difficult to set aside the foreign judgment, even if this Court came to the conclusion that M. Varenne's report was unfair.

It was then said that it was contrary to natural justice that the plaintiff should be compelled to pay damages, but the question of natural justice was almost entirely confined to the question whether there had been a proper hearing of the case (Robinson v. Fenner, [1913] 3 K.B., 835). It was quite plain from the article of the Code Civil, under which M. Varenne was appointed, that the Court was not bound to follow M. Varenne's report, which was simply evidence before the Court. The Court did consider the objections made to his report, and his refusal to examine witnesses, and came to the conclusion that they would accept the report.

It seemed, therefore, impossible to impeach the judgment on those grounds.

Then came another point. It was discovered that M. Varenne and a partner of M. Frachon in another business had married sisters. In May a private detective was instructed to find out what he could about the matter. In the result there was no evidence that connected M. Frachon with any sinister charge that could be preferred against M. Varenne. The French Appeal Court were asked to postpone the case until after the English action, but no application was made to the French Court to reconsider their attitude in view of the suggested bias of M. Varenne in favour of the defendant; at any rate, Mr. Jacobson had abandoned his appeal in the French Courts. The case could not be put higher on this point than that M. Varenne ought not to have been appointed an expert to report. It amounted to this, that the French Court might have been misled, but its judgment stood valid (Abouloff v. Oppenheimer, 10 Q.B.D., 295, at p. 301).

Dicey in his Conflict of Laws put the matter in this way: "A foreign judgment is invalid if obtained by fraud, either of the party or of the Court." A rather better statement of the very narrow rule was given by Lord Chief Justice Coleridge in Abouloff v. Oppenheimer (supra), where he said: "Although it is not permitted to show that the Court were mistaken, it may be shown that they were misled"; and Lord Justice Brett in the same case at p. 307 said: "It is immaterial to consider whether it"—i.e., the judgment of the foreign Court—"was erroneous by reason of a wrong appreciation of the evidence or of the law, or by reason of frauds perpetrated on the Courts by witnesses other than the plaintiff and her husband; the only manner in which that foreign judgment can be rendered ineffective upon the ground of fraud is by proving that it was obtained by the fraud of the plaintiff, who now relies upon it."

To apply that standard to the present case, however indignant the plaintiff and his advisers might feel that their case was not properly handled by M. Varenne or the foreign Court, the evidence before the Court here fell far short of what was necessary to get over the judgment of the French Court. He (his Lordship) thought that the judgment of Mr. Justice Roche was right, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Atkin, having detailed the facts, said that the question was whether the judgment in the French action afforded a defence to the plaintiff's claim in the present case. Prima facie a foreign judgment would be a defence to an action brought on the same subject-matter, not that the debt was merged in the judgment, but it was a debt due from one party to the other, and the parties were estopped from again litigating the same subject-matter by reason of the decision of a Court of competent jurisdiction. The reply was that the foreign judgment was contrary to British views of natural justice, per Lord Lindley in Pemberton v. Hughes (15 The Times L.R., 211; [1899] 1 Ch., 781). But it was quite plain from the context that Lord Lindley was dealing not with the merits of the case or the actual decision, but with proceedings in the case offending against English views of natural justice, for in the same case he said ([1899] 1 Ch., at p. 792): "A judgment of a foreign Court having jurisdiction over the parties and subject-matter . . . cannot be impeached in this country on its merits."

It could only be impeached if the proceedings, the method by which the Court came to its final decision, were "contrary to the principles of natural justice"—principles which were not always easy to define, or to invite everybody to agree about. Those principles seemed to him (his Lordship) to involve, first, that the Court, being a Court of competent jurisdiction, had given notice to the litigant that they were about to proceed to determine the case, and, secondly, that he should be afforded an opportunity of substantially presenting his case before the Court. The rule had been expressed in Professor Dicey's Conflict of Laws (rule 107) somewhat too narrowly.

His Lordship then dealt with the facts as to the appointment and duties of M. Varenne as expert and the terms of the order appointing him. It was said that the Court had delegated to M. Varenne its duty of investigating the facts and hearing the witnesses, and that his finding was substantially the finding of the Court. As to what M. Varenne did, if that were the true position, the judgment could not stand for a moment. He had examined the goods in a hurry, and had absolutely refused to hear the evidence of Mr. Jacobson and others. He was invited to consider the evidence that the seller's representatives had admitted over and over again that the goods were not equal to sample. The learned Judge had found that the report was the erroneous and uncandid production of a biased and prejudiced mind, and he (his Lordship) had no reason to differ from that finding. Again, M. Varenne did not deal at all with any explanation of the circumstances of the second contract, as to which there appeared to be no defence in respect of the claim for non-delivery. But the question was whether M. Varenne's refusal to hear the evidence was the refusal of the Court to hear the evidence of the party, and it was in that respect that he thought the plaintiff's claim failed. The affidavit of the French expert M. Monsarrat showed that the report of an expert appointed by the Court was evidence only as to the matters set out therein, and the French Court was not in the least bound to accept and act on such a report. The party who had requested the Court to appoint the expert was not prevented from attacking his report and adducing such further evidence as the Court would admit, and certain certificates and a statement in writing as to the condition of some of the goods delivered under the first contract, sent in by the plaintiff, were evidence admissible in the French action, and the Court might accept and act thereon, and if satisfied thereby reject the report. The Tribunal of Commerce came to the conclusion that, notwithstanding those facts, they would accept the report of M. Varenne and they did accept it, and in those circumstances treated the contract as having been broken by Mr. Jacobson, and awarded £200 damages to M. Frachon with what appeared to be a very modest sum for costs. Therefore it was quite impossible to make out that the French Court refused to hear Mr. Jacobson's evidence or his case. He (his Lordship) failed to find that there was any violation of the ordinary principles of justice in accordance with our rules.

He assumed, in justice to the Tribunal, that they did not know that the expert whom they had appointed was connected by marriage with a partner of the defendant. No doubt on the facts elicited that created a likelihood of bias on the part of M. Varenne, and explained the bias which the learned Judge found to have existed. The question arose whether that fact in itself was sufficient to show that the decision had been arrived at in a way contrary to the principles of natural justice. He (his Lordship) was bound to say that he did not think the rules did permit such a fact to invalidate the judgment. It was only an attack on the merits of the decision, and not an attack on the procedure. It would be different if it could be shown that M. Frachon had himself procured a witness whom he knew to be a biased witness, and who would be likely to mislead the Court. That would be fraud on his part. But here the order of the Court nominated M. Varenne as though he were in fact appointed by the Court.

In those circumstances, seeing that there was no violation of the principles of substantial justice in regard to the proceedings, and no allegation of fraud against M. Frachon and indeed no evidence to lead to the conclusion that there was fraud, he (his Lordship) thought that the judgment was a valid foreign judgment, and if that were so it afforded a defence to the claim. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE agreed.

K.B. Div. (Salter and Talbot, JJ.) 1927. Nov. 17.

TURNER v. WATTS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Weekly tenancy — Determination — Agreement by tenant to purchase house—Position of tenant after rescission of agreement—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 12 (7).

By an agreement in writing dated August 28, 1926, the defendant, who was the weekly tenant of a house to which the Rent Restriction Acts applied, agreed to buy it from the plaintiff, the landlord, for £900. The agreement also provided that the defendant acknowledged owing the plaintiff £63 10s. arrears of rent and that the plaintiff would accept £50 in settlement; that, until certain mortgages had been transferred from the plaintiff to the defendant, the plaintiff should remain in absolute ownership of the premises; and that, until the completion of the conveyance, the defendant, who was to remain in possession, should pay to the plaintiff interest on the £950 at the rate of 6 per cent. with interest on interest dating from September 1, 1926. The defendant also agreed to pay certain deposits, the plaintiff, on failure of such payments, to be entitled to rescind the agreement and enter into possession of the house. The defendant agreed to maintain the house in a good state of repair and to pay rates, taxes, and insurance.

On February 27, 1927, the plaintiff rescinded the agreement under the powers reserved in it. The defendant refused to give him possession of the house and the plaintiff brought this action for recovery of possession, arrears of rent, and mesne profits.

* Reported by G. F. L. BRIDGMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the effect of the agreement, as indicating the intention of the parties, was to determine the weekly tenancy and to substitute for it either a licence or a tenancy at will which, in its turn, was revoked or determined by the rescission of the purchase agreement. The defendant, therefore, had no contractual right to resist the claim for possession.

Dictum of Parke, B., in Weddall v. Capes (1 M. and W., 50, at p. 52) applied.

Doe d. Gray v. Stanion (1 M. and W., 695) distinguished.

Held, further, that the defendant was not protected by the Rent Restriction Acts. After August 28, 1926, the defendant remained in possession of the house by virtue of the contract of purchase and not as a statutory tenant. Under that contract she was either a licensee or a tenant at will. After its rescission, if she had been a licensee, she was not a tenant who had held over under the Acts ; if she had been a tenant at will her tenancy had been at no rent and, by section 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, it must be ignored, with the result that the house was to be treated as untenanted and the plaintiff had an unrestricted right to recover possession of it.

Bracey v. Pales (43 The Times L.R., 69 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 818) applied.

Held, further, that the rescission of the purchase agreement did not deprive the plaintiff of his right to the arrears of rent which had accrued due to him before the agreement was made. It did, however, destroy the defendant's right to enforce the agreement with the plaintiff to accept a less sum than that which was in fact owing.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a decision of the Bristol County Court. There was a cross-appeal by the plaintiff.

The facts and arguments appear fully in the judgments.

Mr. Cecil Havers appeared for the appellant ; Mr. J. B. Matthews, K.C., and Mr. W. G. H. Cook for the respondent.

After consideration the following judgments were read :—

Mr. Justice Salter.—This was an action in the Bristol County Court to recover possession of certain premises and for arrears of rent and mesne profits. The defendant counterclaimed money due under an agreement.

The premises—529, Fishponds-road, Bristol—are a dwelling house to which the Rent Restriction Acts apply. By an agreement in writing dated August 28, 1926, the defendant, who was a weekly tenant at a rent of £1 2s. 2d. a week, agreed to buy the house from the plaintiff for £900. She remained in possession pending the completion of the purchase. The agreement was in force from its date to February 27, 1927, and on that day it was rescinded by the plaintiff in pursuance of a power reserved in the agreement. During the currency of the agreement, on December 3, 1926, the parties made a parol agreement that the defendant should render certain services to the plaintiff and should be paid therefor £100. Having rescinded the purchase agreement, the plaintiff brought this action claiming possession, arrears of rent which had accrued before the purchase agreement and mesne profits. The defendant counterclaimed £100 for services alleged to have been rendered under the parol agreement. The plaintiff had judgment for possession and certain mesne profits but not for the arrears of rent. The defendant had judgment on her counterclaim for £100. The judgment is challenged on every point except mesne profits. The defendant appeals against the order for possession. The plaintiff makes a cross-appeal against the refusal of the arrears of rent and the judgment for the defendant on the counterclaim.

I will deal first with the plaintiff's claim to possession. As to this, the defendant submitted (1) that the Court had no jurisdiction, (2) that the weekly tenancy had not been determined, and (3) that she was protected by the Rent Restrictions Act.

As to jurisdiction, section 67 of the County Courts Act, 1888, was relied on, but this was not an action for the rescission of the purchase agreement. So far as this was an action of ejectment, section 59 of the Act (as amended by section 3 of the County Courts Act, 1903) applied, and the Court had jurisdiction.

On the question whether the weekly tenancy was determined before action, the plaintiff stated that he gave the defendant a week's notice to determine it. There was no evidence of when this notice was given, or whether it was valid, and the learned Judge did not rely on it. His view, with which I agree, was that the weekly tenancy was determined by the purchase agreement. Indeed, the validity of this defence, and also of the defence under the Rent Restriction Acts, depends on the construction of that agreement. It is inartificially drawn. The defendant acknowledges that she is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £63 10s., arrears of rent, and the plaintiff agrees to accept £50 in full settlement of the debt. The plaintiff agrees to sell and the defendant to buy the house for £900 "together with a further £50, arrears of rent due as aforesaid, making a total of £950." Clause 4 is as follows :—"That until suitable arrangements can be made for the transfer of the existing first and second mortgages from the vendor to the purchaser the vendor shall remain in absolute ownership of the premises and that until the completion of the conveyance the said Maud Watts will pay to the vendor interest on the aforesaid £950 at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum with interest on interest dating from the first day of September 1926." The defendant further agrees to increase, by monthly payments of £5, her present deposits in two companies which are said to be the second mortgagees of the house. If she is more than fourteen days in arrear with any of the deposits the plaintiff may forthwith rescind the purchase agreement and enter into vacant possession of the house. The defendant agrees to assign her dividends in these companies to the plaintiff as collateral security until the interest due to him under the agreement has been paid. The defendant agrees to pay all rates, taxes, insurance, repairs, and outgoings as from September 1, 1926, and to keep the house in good repair. The plaintiff undertakes to procure a transfer to the defendant of the second mortgage as soon as the deposits shall have been increased to £100, "after which the said Maud Watts shall enter into the unrestricted possession of the premises together with the conveyance subject only to any payments still due on mortgage or by way of interest under paragraph 4 hereof."

Some parts of this agreement are obscure, but the question to be considered is the nature of the right (if any) of occupation or possession which it gives to the defendant pending the completion of the purchase. In Weddall v. Capes (1 M. and W., 50, at p. 52), Baron Parke said : "No particular words are necessary to make a surrender, if it sufficiently appear to be the intention of both parties that the term should immediately cease." In Doe d. Gray v. Stanion (1 M. and W., 695) there was an agreement by a tenant from year to year to purchase the reversion. The purchase money was to lie at interest. No date was fixed from which interest was to be payable. It was held that the yearly tenancy was not surrendered by operation of law because there was an implied condition that the vendor should make a good title. Baron Parke said (at p. 700) : "Where the purchaser is already in possession as tenant from year to year, it must depend upon the intention of the parties, to be collected from the agreement, whether a new tenancy at will is created or not, and from what time. In this case, if the true construction of the agreement be, that from the date of it (or any other certain time), the defendant was to be absolutely a debtor for the purchase money, paying interest on it, and to cease to pay rent as tenant from year to year, a tenancy at will would probably be created after that time ; and the acceptance of such new demise at will would then operate as a surrender of the interest from year to year, by operation of law."

In the present case it is plain that the defendant is not to pay any rent and the plaintiff said that he so understood the agreement. On the other hand, the purchase money is to be paid by September 1, or interest becomes payable from that date. The defendant, in my opinion, has a right under the agreement, as purchaser, to use and occupy the house pending completion. She can call for a conveyance at any time on paying the purchase money and any arrears of interest. If she is more than a licensee and acquires any estate in the land, it is no more than a tenancy at will. The weekly tenancy is surrendered, either expressly or by operation of law. In either case, it is determined at the date of the agreement to buy. The letter of February 27, 1927, which rescinded the purchase agreement, revoked the licence, or determined the tenancy at will. From that time to the commencement of the action there is no evidence of any contract of tenancy between the parties. The defendant, therefore, had no contractual right to resist the claim to possession.

The defence set up under the Rent Restriction Acts raises the question whether the defendant was a statutory tenant of the house when the action was brought. The Acts were passed to protect tenants from increase of rent and eviction, not to protect mere trespassers. Section 5 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as amended and modified by the later legislation, protects only the statutory tenant from eviction. The statutory tenant (section 15 of the same Act) is an occupier who, on the determination of his contractual tenancy, holds over by virtue of the Act. If he holds over by virtue of a contract with the landlord he neither needs nor receives any statutory protection. It seems that a statutory tenant may have contractual rights against the statutory landlord, as, for example, an option of purchase : William McIlroy, Limited v. Clements ([1923] W.N., 81, 149) ; but it is impossible that he should have a contractual right to occupy. It is impossible that he should occupy on the terms imposed by the Acts and at the same time occupy on different terms imposed by a contract with the landlord. After August 28, 1926, the defendant remained in possession by virtue of the contract of purchase and not by virtue of any statute. Therefore, she was not a statutory tenant during the currency of the purchase agreement. Then, did she become a statutory tenant when the contract of purchase was rescinded ? If she was a mere licensee, she was not a "tenant" who held over under the Acts. If she was a tenant at will, then the rescission of the purchase agreement determined the tenancy and she would have become a statutory tenant, and been entitled to protection, but for the provisions of section 12 (7) of the Act of 1920. The tenancy at will, if any, having been a tenancy at no rent, the Rent Restriction Acts are to apply to this dwelling-house "as if no such tenancy existed or ever had existed." That is, the house must be treated for the purposes of the Acts as untenanted and there is nothing in the Acts to restrict the right of the owner of an untenanted house to recover his property : Bracey v. Pales (43 The Times L.R., 69 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 818). The judgment for possession was therefore right.

As to the claim for arrears of rent, the learned Judge has given no reason for ignoring it. It was argued before us, and perhaps before him, that the rescission of the purchase agreement destroyed the plaintiff's right to rent which accrued due to him before that agreement was made. I think the rescission put an end to the plaintiff's agreement to commute the arrears agreed at £63 10s. to £50, and to wait for payment until completion of the purchase, the debtor paying interest meanwhile. Strictly, I think the plaintiff is entitled to £63 10s., but, as he is willing to take £50, there should be judgment for that sum. It was vaguely suggested by the defendant that the plaintiff was indebted to her for wages. He denied that he ever employed her. She did not counterclaim for any wages and the learned Judge makes no reference to the matter. If she has any such right she can enforce it, but this suggestion ought not to prevent the plaintiff from having judgment for the arrears of rent.

It remains to consider the counterclaim, which is an entirely separate matter. The defendant made two monthly payments of £5 in accordance with clause 5 of the agreement and made default in paying the third, which was due on November 28, 1926. The days of grace would expire on December 12. On December 3 the parties met and, notwithstanding the plaintiff's denial, the learned Judge was satisfied that a parol agreement was made. It was an agreement that the defendant should render services to the plaintiff and should be paid £100 therefor. The questions are, what were the services to be rendered to entitle the defendant to payment, and were they rendered ? One agreement was pleaded, another was sought to be proved, and a third has been found by the learned Judge. The agreement pleaded was that the defendant should give vacant possession to Mrs. Walker on completion of a sale of the house by the plaintiff to Mrs. Walker. No evidence of such agreement was given. If it had been proved, the counterclaim must have failed, since the time for completion with Mrs. Walker had not arrived when the counterclaim was made. In fact, the defendant has never given possession either to Mrs. Walker or to the plaintiff. The agreement to which the evidence of the defendant and her witnesses was directed (and it was put to the plaintiff in cross-examination) was an agreement that the defendant should give vacant possession to the plaintiff to enable him to give vacant possession to Mrs. Walker and that the plaintiff should pay her £100 for so doing. It is not clear that the learned Judge found this agreement proved. If he did, then it is said that it was unenforceable without writing under section 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. I doubt if the defendant had any interest to dispose of. I think that the contract was only a contract not to give trouble. But assuming the contract to be proved in fact and enforceable at law, it is plain that the service was not rendered. If, when the plaintiff brought his action, the defendant had admitted his right to immediate possession, she might perhaps have recovered the £100, subject to questions of costs. But she claimed to be paid the money while denying the right to possession. She has kept the plaintiff out of possession of his house on every possible pretext to this day and he has, therefore, been unable to complete the sale to Mrs. Walker. The learned Judge, in a supplementary note, states that he finds that the plaintiff agreed to pay the defendant £100 if she would default in making the deposits and so enable him to rescind the contract of sale. No doubt it was part of the arrangement that the contract of sale should be rescinded, but there was no evidence on which it could be held that the plaintiff promised to pay the defendant £100 while she withheld possession of the house. In my opinion, there was no evidence showing any right in the defendant to recover any money from the plaintiff for services rendered.

The defendant's appeal, therefore, fails, and the plaintiff's cross-appeal succeeds. The judgment on the claim must be amended by adding judgment for £50 arrears of rent. The judgment for the defendant on the counterclaim must be set aside and judgment entered for the plaintiff. The plaintiff must have the costs in the County Court and the costs of this appeal.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I take first the contention that the Judge was wrong in holding that the agreement of August 28, 1926, operated as a surrender of the defendant's tenancy. The tenancy here was weekly and, therefore, it was not necessary that a surrender of it should be by deed. It is enough if it was in writing or by operation of law. No particular words are necessary to make a surrender. It is enough "if it sufficiently appear to be the intention of both parties that the term should immediately cease," per Baron Parke, in Weddall v. Capes (1 M. and W., 50, at p. 52).

In my opinion, that is the effect of the agreement of August 28, 1926. There is an agreement for sale by the landlord, the plaintiff, to the tenant, the defendant—an agreement that, till arrangements can be made for the transfer of certain mortgages to the defendant, the plaintiff is to "remain in absolute ownership of the premises," the defendant paying compound interest on the purchase money until completion of the purchase. There is also an agreement for the payment by the defendant monthly of certain "deposits" and a provision that, if these payments are in arrear for more than 14 days, the plaintiff may forthwith rescind the agreement for purchase of the premises and "enter into their possession" forthwith. It is clear, in my opinion, that the intention was to put an end to the weekly tenancy as from the date of the agreement, and to substitute for it a new relation defined by this agreement, namely, a contract for sale on certain conditions by the plaintiff to the defendant, the defendant remaining in actual occupation without tenancy or rent and paying interest on the purchase money until completion.

There was, therefore, a surrender by writing signed by the surrenderor, and it is unnecessary to resort to surrender by operation of law. This differentiates the case entirely from that of Doe d. Gray v. Stanion (1 M. and W., 695), in which it was sought to extract from a bare note of an agreement for purchase of the freehold by a tenant from year to year, the purchase money to lie unpaid at 4 per cent. interest, a surrender by operation of law. It was held that such an agreement for purchase cannot, without more, have that effect, because (apart from anything else) such an agreement is always conditional on the making of a good title by the vendor, and it requires plain words to show that a substantial interest is surrendered on the expectation of a purchase which it may never be possible to complete. But the judgment of the Court recognizes that there may be an agreement for purchase of which the terms prove that the parties intended an immediate end of the tenancy, and it is obvious that such an intention is much less unlikely in the case of a weekly tenancy than where the interest is greater. The weekly tenancy having, therefore, been surrendered, the right of the plaintiff to possession depends on, and is established by, clause 6 of the agreement of August 28, 1926.

The next question is whether the learned Judge was right in holding that the plaintiff was not prevented from recovering possession by the Rent Restriction Acts. On this point the defendant relied on Barton v. Fincham (37 The Times L.R., 386; [1921] 2 K.B., 291). That case decides that, by agreeing for consideration to give notice to quit for a particular day, the tenant of premises to which the Acts apply cannot enable a Court to make an order for possession after that day unless the conditions required by section 5 of the Act of 1920 (as modified by the Act of 1923) have been fulfilled. It does not decide, nor, so far as I know, does any other case, that where a contractual tenancy has actually been surrendered and the person who was tenant remains in possession, not at a rent nor under the Act, but under an agreement to purchase the freehold, an order for possession cannot be made. These are the facts, as I understand them, of the present case. In my opinion, Barton v. Fincham (supra) does not apply, and I know of no principle or authority showing that the learned Judge was wrong in holding that the Rent Restriction Acts do not protect the defendant.

As to the cross-appeal, the first point taken is that the Judge was wrong in refusing to give the plaintiff judgment for £63 10s. claimed as arrears of rent. The agreement of August 28, 1926, contains an express acknowledgment by the defendant that rent to that amount was then due from her to the plaintiff, and it was agreed that £50 in satisfaction of that debt should be paid by the defendant in addition to the purchase money (£900) for the freehold. The defendant does not say that the arrears are not due. She merely suggests that she, or her husband, has cross-claims for a much larger amount. She has, however, made no counterclaim in respect of them, and there was (so far as appears) nothing to justify the refusal by the Judge to give the plaintiff judgment for this part of his claim. Neither the £900 nor the other £50 has been paid and the agreement has been rescinded by the plaintiff under clause 6. The plaintiff's counsel being willing that judgment should be entered for £50 only, it is unnecessary to consider whether the full amount of £63 10s. is still due. I am of opinion that the judgment on this point cannot be supported.

The next point on the cross-appeal relates to a sum of £100 for which the Judge has given judgment on the defendant's counterclaim. This claim was based on an oral agreement alleged to have been made on December 3, 1926, between the plaintiff and the defendant whereby (inter alia) the plaintiff agreed to pay to the defendant £100 in consideration of the defendant agreeing to give vacant possession of the premises to the purchaser of them from the plaintiff on completion of the purchase. To this section 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925 (which now takes the place of section 4 of the Statute of Frauds as to land or any interest in land), may (by leave of the Judge) be pleaded. What was proved at the trial was an agreement to pay £100 if the defendant would give vacant possession to the plaintiff. The Judge thus states his finding regarding this oral contract in a supplemental note : "I came to the conclusion . . . that, on December 3, 1926, the plaintiff induced the defendant to agree to discontinue [paying the deposits] in consideration of his undertaking to pay her £100 ; that he did this to bring about a breach of that agreement, enabling him to rescind it ; and that it was on the faith of such undertaking that the defendant discontinued the payments and lost her rights under the agreement. . . . I did not believe the plaintiff's statement that the agreement by him to pay £100 was merely 'voluntary' or 'as a gift.'" As to this the defendant appears to me to be in a dilemma. If the effect of this judgment is that the consideration for the agreement to pay £100 was an agreement to give vacant possession, it was conceded by counsel for the defendant that the contract is within section 40 and that, in the absence of a note in writing, it cannot be sued on. If, on the other hand, the Judge meant to find some different agreement, e.g., to discontinue the payments under clause 5 of the agreement of August 28, 1926, no such agreement was proved. On the contrary, the evidence of the defendant's witnesses, which the Judge says he accepts, is clear that the consideration for the promise to pay £100 was the agreement to give vacant possession. I think that the plaintiff was entitled to assume, in the absence of distinct words to the contrary, that the Judge found the agreement to be that proved by the evidence which he accepted and that it was not necessary to include in his grounds of cross-appeal a contention that there was no evidence to support the finding. I do not think that the County Court Judge did really find that agreement to be other than that which the defendant's witnesses swore to. I think he only referred to the plaintiff's discontinuance of the payments under clause 5 of the agreement of August 28, 1926, to explain how it came about. It is, moreover, a fatal objection, in my opinion, to the defendant's claim for £100 that she has not proved, and apparently cannot prove, that she was at any time ready and willing to perform her part of the agreement, viz., to give vacant possession of the premises.

A point was taken in the defendant's notice of appeal with regard to the jurisdiction of the County Court. We understood in the course of the argument that this contention was misconceived and it was, I think, virtually abandoned, and very properly so, by the learned counsel for the defendant.

In my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed, but the cross-appeal should be allowed as to the £50 and the £100 in the counterclaim.

Court of Appeal. (Scrutton, Sargant, and Greer, L.JJ.) 1927. Nov. 15.

SMITH AND OTHERS v. SCHILLING.*

Practice—Payment into Court—Action for negligence by three plaintiffs—Separate causes of action—General payment into Court by defendant — Validity — Verdict against one plaintiff—Verdict for two plaintiffs—Damages —Inadequacy—R.S.C. Order XVI., r. 1, Order XXII., r. 1.

A general payment into Court by a defendant with a denial of liability, under Order XXII., is not a good payment in, in the case of an action brought against the defendant by several plaintiffs each having a separate cause of action.

Benning v. Ilford Gas Company (23 The Times L.R., 485 ; [1907] 2 K.B., 290) overruled.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment and verdict on the trial of an action before Mr. Justice Swift and a common jury.

The action was brought by three plaintiffs, the male plaintiff, Mr. Shed Smith, the female plaintiff, Mrs. Fanny Mary Leah Smith (the male plaintiff's wife), and the infant plaintiff, Miss Dorothy Smith (the daughter), to recover damages from the defendant for negligence in the driving and management of a Ford motor-van in the Lewisham High-road on March 15, 1926, whereby a collision occurred between the defendant's motor-van and a motor-cycle combination owned and driven by the male plaintiff, in which the other two plaintiffs were being carried as passengers.

The defendant, by his amended defence, denied liability and alleged that the accident was caused solely by the negligence of the male plaintiff in and about the riding of the motor-cycle combination referred to. As an alternative defence, the defendant paid into Court the sum of £150 and said that that was sufficient to satisfy the whole of the claims of the three plaintiffs.

The jury found that the defendant had been negligent, but that the male plaintiff had been guilty of contributory negligence. They awarded the female plaintiff £15 damages and the infant plaintiff £5 damages.

After legal arguments on the findings of the jury, Mr. Justice Swift said : The jury have found that there was negligence on the part of Mr. George Schilling, and that there was negligence which contributed to the accident on the part of Mr. Shed Smith, and it is clear that upon that part of the case Mr. Schilling is entitled to judgment against Mr. Shed Smith. It is equally clear that as the accident was caused by the combined negligence of the two, both the plaintiff (Mr. Shed Smith) and the defendant, the other plaintiffs, Fanny Mary Leah Smith and Dorothy Smith, are entitled to the damages the jury have awarded, namely, Mrs. Smith, £15, and Dorothy Smith, £5. I say nothing about the damages awarded to Dorothy Smith, except that they certainly do not err on the side of generosity. With regard to the damages awarded to Mrs. Smith, in my opinion they are totally inadequate. She sustained a fractured shoulder-blade, she was rendered unconscious, she was kept in hospital and was for three months under the care of her own doctor, and she was prevented for a considerable time from following her occupation, and even now she still suffers as a consequence of the accident. I have no doubt whatever that the figure of £15, which is quite inadequate, was arrived at by a compromise, and a compromise which is distinctly unfair to the plaintiff Mrs. Fanny Mary Leah Smith. But I do not know what I can do in regard to the matter. If this is to be set right, as indeed it ought to be set right, it must be done by the Court of Appeal. It appears that the defendant amended his defence and paid £150 into Court in satisfaction of the claims of the three plaintiffs. I should have thought that any payment into Court of that sort was a bad payment in. I do not see how any one of the three plaintiffs, who are quite independent plaintiffs, could have taken out any of the sum which was in Court. If Dorothy Smith had said, "I am quite satisfied, I will take that £150 out," then the other two could have objected. It is suggested that there was some sort of arrangement between them as to the bringing of the action, and therefore they must arrange between themselves as to the apportionment of the £150. I should have thought myself, had I been free in the matter, that that was a bad payment in and that the defendant could not take any advantage of it. But there is the authority of the case of Benning v. Ilford Gas Company (23 The Times L.R., 485 ; [1907] 2 K.B., 290), which I am unable to distinguish from the present case and which I think is binding upon me, and there is, therefore, no course open to me except to enter judgment for the defendant against all three of the plaintiffs, with costs as against the male plaintiff of the whole action, and with costs as against the other two plaintiffs from the time of the payment into Court.

* Reported by T. W. Morgan, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. W. Elliott Batt appeared for the appellants ; and Mr. Melville, K.C., and Mr. R. O. Mobbs for the respondent.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in delivering judgment, referred to the facts and read a passage from the judgment of Mr. Justice Swift, as follows : "With regard to the damages awarded to Mrs. Smith, in my opinion they are totally inadequate. She sustained a fractured shoulder-blade, she was rendered unconscious, she was kept in hospital and was for three months under the care of her own doctor, and she was prevented for a considerable time from following her occupation, and even now she still suffers as a consequence of the accident. I have no doubt whatever that the figure of £15, which is quite inadequate, was arrived at by a compromise, and a compromise which is distinctly unfair to the plaintiff Mrs. Fanny Mary Leah Smith. But I do not know what I can do in regard to the matter. If this is to be set right, as indeed it ought to be set right, it must be done by the Court of Appeal."

The Court of Appeal always paid great attention to the views expressed by the Judge who tried the action. Such views were, of course, not conclusive, but they constituted a very important element to be considered by the Court in arriving at its decision. In the present case the amount of damages awarded was not generous and one could understand that the jury might easily have thought that the female plaintiff was in some way identified with the male plaintiff's negligence. The Court would be slow to interfere with the amount found by the jury and would not interfere merely because they themselves would have awarded a different amount from that awarded by the jury. They must be satisfied, with the assistance of the report of the trial Judge, that the jury must have taken into consideration something which they ought not to have considered or have disregarded something which they ought to have considered.

He (Lord Justice Scrutton) came to the conclusion that the jury in this case must have taken into account something that they ought not to have considered or they must have disregarded something which they ought to have taken into consideration in arriving at their award of £15 damages for the wife. In these circumstances the Court would interfere, but, instead of sending the case back for a new trial, the Court, with the consent of the parties, would themselves assess damages.

Then a question arose with regard to payment into Court. A sum of £150 had been paid into Court, with a denial of liability, by the defendant in satisfaction of all the plaintiffs' claims. The learned Judge was faced with the authority of the case of Benning v. Ilford Gas Company (23 The Times L.R., 485 ; [1907] 2 K.B., 290), where the Divisional Court held that such a payment into Court as was made in this case was a good payment in. Accordingly, having regard to the fact that the jury in this case had only awarded the plaintiffs £20 damages, judgment was entered for the defendant against the male plaintiff with costs, and as against the other two plaintiffs the defendant got his costs from the date of payment into Court. That raised the question whether, in a case where there were several plaintiffs each having a cause of action against the defendant, a general payment into Court by the defendant of one sum was a good payment into Court. The authorities on that point were not very satisfactory.

There were conflicting decisions of the Court of Appeal, and in view of such conflicting decisions the Court was free to put its own construction on the rule with regard to payment into Court and to decide whether Benning v. Ilford Gas Company (supra) was good law. He (Lord Justice Scrutton) was of opinion that that decision was not good law and that a general payment into Court in respect of several plaintiffs and several causes of action was a bad payment in, and had no effect on costs. The present case was an instance of the extreme inconvenience of treating such a payment in as a good payment in, where there were different causes of action, and a plea of payment into Court of a lump sum generally was not a good plea.

In the result, the judgment against the male plaintiff must stand. The jury's finding of £15 damages in favour of the wife would be set aside and the Court assessed the damages of the wife at £60. As the payment into Court was not a good payment in, there must be judgment for the wife for £60 damages, with full costs on the High Court scale and for the infant daughter for £5 damages with full costs on the High Court scale.

Lord Justice Sargant agreed. It was unnecessary to say anything about the authorities except to say that he agreed with Lord Justice Scrutton in saying that they left the point at large. The balance of authority was in favour of the proposition that a payment into Court such as had been made in this case was a bad payment in, and therefore the Court was at liberty to put its own construction on the matter. In a case like the present, where there were three separate plaintiffs having three separate causes of action, the terms of the rule would be avoided if it were held that a general payment into Court, such as the one made in this case, was a good payment into Court. He agreed that Benning v. Ilford Gas Company (23 The Times L.R., 485 ; [1907] 2 K.B., 290) was bad law. He also agreed with the judgment of Lord Justice Scrutton with regard to the damages.

Lord Justice Greer agreed. On the question of the power of the Court of Appeal to interfere on the question of the amount of the damages, the rule was that a verdict could be set aside by the Court of Appeal if it was of opinion that the jury had considered something which they were not entitled to consider or had failed to consider something which they ought to have considered. From either point of view, this was a case in which the Court of Appeal was entitled to set aside the verdict of £15 damages awarded to the wife. The sum was so small that, in the circumstances, 12 reasonable men could not have awarded such a sum, or the jury must have taken into consideration something which they were not entitled to consider. He agreed that a payment into Court such as had been made in this case was a bad payment in.

HEWITT v. ESSEX COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Practice—Arbitration—Acquisition of land—Injurious affection—Award of official arbitrator—Statement in form of special case—Whether to be entered in the Crown Paper or in the Special Paper—Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. V., c. 57), s. 6.

An award made by an official arbitrator under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, in the form of a special case, is rightly entered in the Crown Paper.

This was an application by the claimants that an award stated by the official arbitrator in the form of a special case under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, might be transferred from the Crown Paper to the Special Paper.

Mr. Tristram Beresford appeared for the claimants ; Mr. W. Bowstead for the Minister of Transport. The Essex County Council were not separately represented.

Mr. Beresford said that the claim was for injurious affection of land, not for compulsory acquisition, and he suggested that the proper person to decide it was not the official arbitrator, but a private one. The county council took the opposite view, and to avoid delay his clients submitted to the jurisdiction of the official arbitrator, who stated his award in the form of a special case, as he was empowered to do under section 6 of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, which provides :—

"(1) The decision of an official arbitrator upon any question of fact shall be final and binding on the parties and the persons claiming under them respectively, but the official arbitrator may, and shall, if the High Court so directs, state at any stage of the proceedings, in the form of a special case for the opinion of the High Court, any question of law arising in the course of the proceedings, and may state his award as to the whole or part thereof in the form of a special case for the opinion of the High Court.

"(2) The decision of the High Court upon any case so stated shall be final and conclusive, and shall not be subject to appeal to any other Court."

The Act was silent as to the procedure to be followed on the hearing of a special case, and therefore in counsel's submission it should follow the practice under the Arbitration Act, 1889. This was not a consultative case, but a final award. Section 7 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, therefore applied, and the case should be set down in the Special Paper for hearing before a Judge alone, but the respondents, after consulting the Master of the Crown Office, had set it down in the Crown Paper.

Mr. Justice Sankey.—Where there is no appeal is it not better that your clients should have the accumulated wisdom of three Judges, rather than the wisdom of one Judge ?

Mr. Beresford.—It might be so, but my clients do not desire it, and submit that they are entitled to be heard in the Special Paper. The case of Thurrock, Grays and Tilbury Joint Sewerage Board v. Thames Land Company, Limited (23 L.G.R., 648) was entered in the Special Paper without objection and tried by Mr. Justice Roche. On the other hand, Northwood v. London County Council (42 The Times L.R., 508 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 411) was entered in the Crown Paper without objection and tried before three Judges. In neither of those cases was the point discussed, but he had the support of a well-known text-book, and the advantage that the learned editor of it now appeared to oppose this motion. In Russell on Arbitration (11th ed., by Mr. W. Bowstead) it was stated at page 151 :—

"An arbitrator under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, may state his award as to the whole or part thereof in the form of a special case for the opinion of the High Court, whose decision thereon is final and conclusive and not subject to appeal.

"Practice.—In the King's Bench Division a special case under this section is set down for hearing in the Crown Office. It is entered in the Special Paper and heard by one Judge."

Mr. Justice Sankey.—Your opponent has written a book ?

Mr. Beresford.—Yes, my Lord, and I hope to use it against him. Perhaps my learned friend, with the assistance of the book which I have handed to him, will explain presently why he wrote that.

Counsel cited the opening passage of the judgment of Lord Justice Bowen in In re Knight and the Tabernacle Permanent Building Society (8 The Times L.R., 783 ; [1892] 2 Q.B., 613).

Mr. Bowstead referred to Order LIX., Rule 1, of the rules of the Supreme Court :—

"The following proceedings and matters shall continue to be heard and determined before Divisional Courts . . . (e) Proceedings directed by any Act of Parliament to be taken before the Court, and in which the decision of the Court is final."

Mr. Beresford said that that rule when closely examined did not apply ; it was dealing with appeals from inferior tribunals.

Mr. Bowstead was not called upon to argue.

Mr. Justice Sankey, in giving judgment, said that this was an application on a matter of procedure as to which Court should consider the award. In fact, it had been set down in the Crown Paper for which a Divisional Court of three Judges were accustomed to sit. But Mr. Beresford asked them to say that that was wrong and that it ought to be set down in the Special Paper for one Judge. In his (his Lordship's) view no question of principle, as usually understood, arose ; it was a question of practice and procedure. After reading section 6 of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, his Lordship said that Mr. Beresford had rightly drawn attention to the two different forms of special case under section 7 and section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The history of the Special Paper was this : Originally, the cases went to the Divisional Court, but an Order was made some years ago by the then Lord Chief Justice, for the relief of the Divisional Court list, that certain cases in which there was an appeal should go into a Special Paper before one Judge, and if he went wrong there was an appeal from his decision. That was merely an order as to practice.

But both the Divisional Court and the single Judge were sitting as "the High Court." He did not see anything which gave the right to a litigant to say that his case should go to one or the other. In this case the Act said that the decision of the High Court should be final, and it seemed desirable in these important matters, as they undoubtedly were, that the party should have the advantage of three Judges.

Attention had been drawn to Order LIX., Rule 1 (e), but he did not rest his judgment on that. He thought that it was rather a matter of discretion, and that it was advisable where the decision was final that three Judges should sit. It was true that the practice had varied, but the point had not been taken. Now that it was taken they had to decide it, and he thought that the case was rightly entered in the Crown Paper.

MR. JUSTICE TALBOT agreed.

HEASLIP v. HASEMER.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Deduction — Child receiving full time instruction — Educational establishment — Finance Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 18), s. 21 (1).

A teacher's house, where he gives to individual pupils private lessons and directions for home study and practice, is not an educational establishment where a pupil receives full-time instruction, so as to entitle the father to a deduction from income-tax under s. 21 (1) of the Finance Act, 1920.

This was an appeal by the Crown against a decision of the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the division of Tower Hamlets, by which it was held that a taxpayer, in estimating his taxable income, was entitled to a deduction in respect of his daughter, who was being taught musical subjects by a private teacher.

* Reported by G. F. L. BRIDGMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At a meeting of the General Commissioners the respondent, Mr. George Henry Hasemer, appealed against an assessment made on him under Schedule E of the Income Tax Acts in the sum of £382 for the year ending April 5, 1926. The assessable income charged under the assessment was in accordance with the return made by him, and there was no dispute about its amount, but the respondent claimed that under section 17 and section 21 (1) of the Finance Act, 1920, he was entitled, for the purpose of estimating his taxable income, to a deduction of £36 in respect of his daughter, Doris Gertrude Hasemer, aged 19. The claim, which was resisted by the appellant (an inspector of taxes), was the only subject of the appeal.

During the year 1925-26 Miss Hasemer was receiving instruction in musical subjects from a teacher at the teacher's dwelling-house at Edmonton, N., and she was being prepared for the examinations of the Trinity College of Music, with a view to her obtaining such diplomas or other qualifications as would enable her to earn her livelihood as a teacher of music. The examinations held by the Trinity College of Music were open to all comers, wherever they were taught, but the College maintained an establishment of its own where students could obtain instruction and training in any branch of music. Miss Hasemer, however, was not at any time a student at that establishment of the Trinity College of Music.

The Trinity College examinations were simultaneously held at various centres, and there was a centre in Tottenham where Miss Hasemer attended for examination.

The teacher had numerous pupils, the bulk of whom were engaged in preparing for Trinity College examinations. He taught his pupils privately and individually, and at his own house in all cases. He conducted no classes and had no assistants. He was not a member of the staff of the Trinity College of Music, but was a Fellow of the College and also a Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

The subjects in which Miss Hasemer received tuition were four in number—namely, pianoforte (practical), pianoforte (theory), harmony and the art of teaching, and her weekly attendances at the teacher's house were four periods of three-quarters of an hour each—one period for each subject—amounting in the aggregate to three hours per week.

Miss Hasemer spent the whole of her time (apart from necessary recreation) on her musical training. When not receiving instruction she was practising or reading at home in musical studies supervised and directed by her teacher. Miss Hasemer was not entitled to any income in her own right.

Mr. Hasemer contended before the General Commissioners, (a) that the instruction given to his daughter was full-time instruction and was of the nature required by section 21 (1) of the Finance Act, 1920 ; (b) that the system of personal instruction in music, co-ordinated with the practising and studying at home, when applied to the number of pupils taught by the teacher and prepared for the examinations of the Trinity College of Music, afforded ample evidence that his establishment was a "school" or "educational establishment" within the meaning of the subsection, and that it was in fact such a school or educational establishment ; (c) that the system of personal individual instruction by a master to one pupil at a time without classes or assistants was acknowledged by the musical profession to be the best and most suitable for imparting musical knowledge and technique, and this was adopted in musical colleges; and (d) that he was entitled to the deduction claimed.

The appellant contended, (a) that Miss Hasemer was not receiving full-time instruction; (b) that what instruction was received was not received at any university, college, school, or other educational establishment; (c) that the teacher's house, even if it could be called an establishment at all, was not one for education, but was for professional or vocational training; and (d) that the deduction claimed was not allowable.

The General Commissioners found that the teacher's establishment and his arrangements for giving instruction in musical subjects in conjunction with home practice and study supervised and directed by him were a school or educational establishment, and that Miss Hasemer received full-time instruction at that school or educational establishment during the year of assessment. They, therefore, allowed the deduction of £36 from the respondent's assessment.

The Crown appealed.

Section 21 (1) of the Finance Act, 1920, provides:—

"If the claimant proves that he has living at the commencement of the year of assessment any child who is either under the age of 16 years or who, if over the age of 16 years at the commencement of that year, is receiving full-time instruction at any university, college, school, or other educational establishment, he shall . . . be entitled in respect of [each] child to a deduction. . . ."

The Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the appellant; Mr. Cyril King for the respondent.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT, in giving judgment, said that he accepted that Miss Hasemer had done all that she could to work hard at her music and fit herself for a musical career, but it did not follow that section 21 (1) of the Act of Parliament had been complied with. For the requirements of that subsection to be satisfied she must have been receiving full-time instruction at an educational establishment, and in the subsection "educational establishment" was used in connexion with "university," "college," and "school."

The General Commissioners had said that the establishment of Miss Hasemer's teacher—that was to say, his house—and his arrangements for giving instruction in conjunction with home practice and study supervised and directed by him, were a school or educational establishment, and that Miss Hasemer had received full-time instruction at that school or educational establishment. That meant that the fact that the teacher told his pupils how to work after they had gone away at the end of their lessons made his establishment an "educational establishment" within the meaning of the subsection. He also gathered that the General Commissioners had found that Miss Hasemer had received full-time instruction because, when she was working at home, she was still constructively receiving instruction from her teacher.

In his opinion it was perfectly clear that the teacher's house was not an educational establishment at which Miss Hasemer received full-time instruction within the subsection. What she did was to take her turn with other pupils to have private lessons from a teacher at his own house.

The appeal was accordingly allowed, judgment being entered for the Crown, with costs.

K.B. Div. (Rowlatt, J.) 1927. Nov. 28.

WHITE v. WHITCHER.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Exemption, abatement and relief—Will—Direction to trustees to accumulate fund—Payment to beneficiary 20 years after death of testatrix—"Benefit . . . contingently on his attaining some specified age"—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 25.

Section 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, provides that: "Where in pursuance of the provisions of any will or settlement any income arising from any fund is accumulated for the benefit of any person contingently on his attaining some specified age or marrying, and the aggregate amount in any year of assessment of that income and the income from any other fund subject to the like trusts for accumulation and of the total income of that person from all sources (hereinafter referred to as 'the aggregate yearly income') is of such an amount only as would entitle an individual either to total exemption from tax or to relief from tax, that person shall . . . be entitled . . . to have repaid to him on account of the tax which has been paid in respect of the income during the period of accumulation a sum equal to the aggregate amount of relief to which he would have been entitled if his total income from all sources for each of the several years of the said period had been equal to the aggregate yearly income for that year. . . ."

"Specified age" in this section means an age expressed by a definite number of years and not an age which can be ascertained only by reference to some other occurrence as, for instance, the death of a testatrix who has directed that an accumulated fund shall be paid to a beneficiary 20 years after her death.

At a meeting of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the division of Brighton held at Brighton on January 13, 1927, the respondent, Edgar Balland Laurence Cuff Greenhill Whitcher, of 58, Lansdowne-place, Hove, appealed to the Commissioners against an objection made by the appellant (an inspector of taxes for the Brighton second district) to a claim made by Mr. Whitcher under section 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

The following facts were found or admitted.

By her will dated May 24, 1904, the Baroness Ublagger directed her executors to transfer to the Trustees Executors and Securities Corporation £4,659 Milford Docks "A" debenture stock to be held upon trust to invest the income thereof and to accumulate the income of the investments so made in the way of compound interest by from time to time similarly investing such income and the resulting income of investments and directed that the trustees should stand possessed of the said debenture stock and the accumulated fund arising from the income thereof upon trust after the expiration of 20 years from the date of her death to transfer or pay the same to the children of Ethel and Charles Edgar Whitcher, the sum being equally divided, and, if there should be only one such child, then the whole to such child. Mr. E. B. L. Whitcher was the son of Ethel and Charles Edgar Whitcher and was born on January 11, 1901. The Baroness Ublagger died on November 2, 1905, and Mr. E. B. L. Whitcher received the legacy on November 2, 1925, and he claimed repayment of tax for the period of 20 years to April 5, 1925, under section 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

Counsel for the appellant contended:—(1) that, the point being of some doubt, the interpretation of the Act must be in favour of the subject; (2) that the words "specified age" contained in section 25 of the Act of 1918 did not necessarily mean an age which at the time when the disposition was made could be precisely ascertained and he instanced the law of landlord and tenant where it had been held that distraint could be made for "specified rent" even where the rent was specified by reference to a formula and not to a fixed quantum; and (3) that the will became actively operative only when the testatrix died, at which moment the age at which the contingency might occur was precisely known, namely, the age of the appellant on that day, plus 20 years.

The Inspector of Taxes contended:—(1) that, for the purpose of the construction of a taxing Act, no subject must be charged unless the subject of charge was within the exact words of the taxing Act, and that, conversely, no relief from an admittedly correct charge should be given unless the relief could be granted under the exact words of some relieving section; (2) that the appellant must, therefore, show that the contingency was the attainment of a "specified age" and, not only was no age mentioned in the will, but, even if an age were contemplated, it could only have been an age relative to the beneficiary's age at the death of the testatrix; (3) that all contingencies occurred at some age or other and, if that particular contingency, which had no reference to age, was within section 25, then so were all contingencies and the mention in the section of two particular contingencies was superfluous; and (4) that, to establish the claim, it must be proved that in the mind of the testatrix there was a precise age at which the beneficiary was to inherit and that it was impossible for this to have been the case since the date of inheritance was only fixed relatively to the death of the testatrix which could not have been known to her.

The General Commissioners, after consideration of the above facts and arguments, decided that the period of 20 years mentioned in the will of the testatrix constituted a direction to accumulate for the benefit of the appellant contingently on his attaining a "specified age" and that the appellant was therefore entitled to the payment asked for.

The Inspector of Taxes, being dissatisfied with the decision of the General Commissioners as being erroneous in point of law, required them to state a case for the opinion of the High Court of Justice.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the appellant; Mr. Eric Neve for the respondent.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt read the following considered judgment:—In this case a fund was by will directed to be accumulated for 20 years from the death of the testatrix when it was to be divided among the then living children of a certain marriage. There was one such child living at the date of the will, and no more were ever born, although the parents survived the testatrix. The 20 years having expired, the above-mentioned child became entitled to the whole fund and the question is whether, within the meaning of section 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, it was accumulated for his benefit "contingently on his attaining some specified age or marrying." It may be a question whether, accurately read, the statute does not apply only to cases where there are these alternative contingencies, so that the respondent here, whose interest would not vest on marriage, is outside it on that ground. The common trust is for issue who, being sons, attain 21 years or, being daughters, attain that age or marry. If the statute only applies to the daughters in such cases, such a result is very remarkable. I express no opinion on this point, although I have thought it best to mention it.

In my view, the words "attaining some specified age" are not satisfied. I think that they mean living to a point of time defined by reference to the then age of the person and not to a point of time fixed by reference to other occurrences, although, of course, when the necessary data are ascertained, it will be known how old any given person will be at a given date. Age under the statute is of the essence. In connexion with the gift in the present case it is, as such, immaterial. The appeal must be allowed, with costs.

Divorce — Application to expedite — Wife's petition—Expected birth of child of woman named in petition—Public policy—Refusal.

The Court, on the ground of public policy, refused an application by a wife, petitioning for a divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery, that the trial of the suit in the undefended list might be expedited so that the decree might be made absolute, and the respondent might marry the woman named in the petition, before the birth of a child expected to be born as the result of the respondent's relations with that woman.

This was a summons by which a wife, petitioning for divorce, asked that an early date be fixed for the trial of the suit in the undefended list, so that the decree might be made absolute in time for her husband and the woman named to marry, and thus save their expected child from being illegitimate. The summons was adjourned into Court.

Mr. Noel Middleton appeared for the applicant.

The President.—This application has given a good deal of difficulty and a proportionate amount of concern. The facts are very remarkable. The parties in the case were young people at the time of the marriage in 1921. The husband was a man of some means and considerable expectations. A child was born in 1924. Last year the wife became aware of the relations between her husband and another young woman, who is the woman named in the petition. In November last year the husband left his wife, and there is no doubt that he had relations with the woman named. The wife did not know the full story until October of this year, when the husband wrote to her, giving her information for the purpose of a divorce. On October 25 she filed a petition for the dissolution of her marriage, and a solicitor's letter was written intimating that the husband had no intention of defending the case. This was a foregone conclusion, because the proceedings had been begun at the instance of the husband. There followed a petition for alimony pendente lite, which set out the husband's means. On November 10, when the case was pending, a summons was issued on the wife's behalf, asking that the hearing should be expedited. She stated that she desired the petition to be heard forthwith as an undefended suit, because a child was expected to be born some time this year as the result of her husband's relations with the other woman, and that on a decree nisi being granted she might make a further application in regard to expediting the decree absolute.

Anyone familiar with the administration of the divorce law and the procedure of this division will appreciate what an astounding proposition that was. It was, in fact, a proposal, at the instance of the wife, that this Court should take extraordinary steps by decreeing on a certain day that this man should cease to be the lawful husband of his lawful wife and be in a position to take another woman as his wife.

This summons was really taken out on behalf of the unborn child of this illicit alliance. It was quite clear that there would be most mischievous consequences if such an order were made in camera. I have to consider if such an order can be made at all. This application is one which cuts deep into the interests of the parties and affects matters of the very gravest public concern, and I came to the conclusion that the decision should be a public one. Very moving circumstances were presented to the Court by the petitioner in her compassion for the unborn child, and I hope that I have not been insensible to the arguments raised. It was pointed out that unless the present marriage were dissolved there would be no chance of applying the terms of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, as the child would be begotten of an adulterous association. I have considered the matter anxiously and have come to the conclusion that to grant the application would be against public policy and would impair all the safeguards with which administration of divorce is at present surrounded. The application will be refused.

His Lordship, in granting the petitioner the costs of the application, said that he did not suggest that there was any reflection upon the wife, who had taken this step as an act of compassion.

MONKS v. FOX'S EXECUTORS.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Estate duty—Payment—Surrender of Victory Bonds—Valuation—Accrued but unpaid interest taken into account—Whether interest subject to income-tax—Finance Act, 1917 (7 and 8 Geo. V., c. 31), s. 34 (4)—Finance Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 15), s. 42.

Where Victory Bonds are surrendered in payment of estate duty and the accrued but still unpaid interest is taken into account in the valuation of the bonds, the interest is not subject to income-tax.

This was an appeal by the Crown against a decision of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax by which it was held that interest accruing due in respect of Victory Bonds surrendered in payment of estate duty, and taken into account in the valuation of the bonds, was not income in the hands of executors subject to assessment to income-tax.

At a meeting of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax held on February 15, 1927, to hear appeals, the respondents, the executors of Sir Gilbert Wheaton Fox, sugar merchant, of London and Liverpool, who died on February 21, 1925, appealed against an assessment to income-tax in the sum of £704 for the year ending April 5, 1926, made on them under the provisions of the Income Tax Acts.

The appropriate amount of estate duty payable in respect of Sir Gilbert Fox's estate was £257,126 9s. 2d. A portion of his estate consisted of £100,000 Four per Cent. Victory Bonds. The prospectus relating to the issue of Four per Cent. Victory Bonds provided :—

"Bonds of this issue will be accepted at their face value by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue as the equivalent of cash, with due adjustment on account of interest, in satisfaction of amounts due on account of death duties, provided that the bonds surrendered have formed part of the estate passing on death of the deceased continuously up to the date of death from the date of the original subscription or for a period of not less than six months immediately preceding the date of death. Bonds surrendered under these provisions will be held for account of his Majesty's Government until drawn for redemption as provided in the preceding paragraph."

Section 34 of the Finance Act, 1917, provided for the acceptance by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue of any stock or bonds issued in connexion with the war in satisfaction or part satisfaction of any death duty and for the method of valuing such bonds. Subsection (4) enacted :—

"Stock or bonds so transferred shall for the purposes of this section be valued at the price of issue with the addition of any interest accrued due at the date of transfer but then remaining unpaid, after deducting the amount of any interest which may be receivable by the transferor after that date. . . ."

Subsection 5 of section 34 enacted :—

"For the purposes of this section interest shall be deemed to accrue from day to day."

Section 42 of the Finance Act, 1918, enacted :—

"Section 34 of the Finance Act, 1917, shall have effect as though there were inserted therein after the words "price of issue," in subsection (3) and subsection (4) thereof, the words "or such other price as was specified in the conditions subject to which the stock or bonds were issued as the price at which the stock or bonds were to be valued for the purposes of this section."

Victory Bonds fell within the above provisions. The transfer of the £100,000 Four per Cent. Victory Bonds in part satisfaction of estate duty on the estate of Sir Gilbert Fox took place on May 13, 1925, and at that date a sum of £800 had accrued due, but remained unpaid in respect of interest on the bonds. The £800 was added to the sum of £100,000, the face value of the bonds, and the bonds were accepted by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue at a total value of £100,800 in part satisfaction of the estate duty.

The assessment appealed against was made under Case III. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, on the respondents in the sum of £704, arrived at as follows :—

Victory Bond interest	£800
War Loan interest	2
	£802
Less bank interest on overdraft ..	98
	£704

The sole question for the opinion of the Court was whether the said £800 had been correctly included in the assessment.

Counsel for the respondents contended that subsection (4) of section 34 of the Finance Act, 1917, read in conjunction with section 42 of the Finance Act, 1918, provided the method of arriving at the value of the bonds transferred, and that, the value having been arrived at, nothing in the subsection made any part of that value income.

On behalf of the Crown it was contended (1) that by virtue of section 34, subsections 4 and 5, of the Finance Act, 1917, as amended by section 42 of the Finance Act, 1918, the £800 interest had been credited to the respondents and was by the terms of the section interest accrued due on Victory Bonds ; (2) that the respondents were liable to income-tax in respect of such interest and the fact that it had been credited to them as part of a statutory scheme for the surrender of Victory Bonds in satisfaction of death duties did not affect such liability ; and (3) that the assessment was correctly made and should be confirmed.

The Special Commissioners held that the £800 interest, which had accrued at the date of the transfer of the bonds but was then remaining unpaid, and which was included in and formed part of the valuation, was not income subject to income-tax in the hands of the respondents, and they accordingly discharged the assessment.

The Crown appealed.

Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the Crown ; Mr. Cyril King for the respondents.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt delivered the following judgment :—This is a curious and an interesting point, but I agree with the Special Commissioners. When a man owns a sum in the funds it increases in value from the day when interest is paid until the next interest day, apart altogether from its rise and fall in the market. The element of the value of the accruing interest is always there, adding to the value of the stock as the interest time wears on, and the holder does not pay income-tax on the interest until it has been paid. If the holder dies and holdings in the funds form part of his estate and his representatives realize them in the market to pay his death duties, they will get more or less for them according as they realize them at the beginning, or at the end, or in the middle, of the period which intervenes between the dates of the payment of interest. It is quite clear that, if they went into the market, they would incur no liability for income-tax in respect of interest accrued but not paid at the date of the sale.

The scheme contained in section 34 of the Finance Act, 1917, was brought forward during the war to make stock available to pay death duties at its face value. But if nothing more is said than that and if the stock is transferred immediately after an interest day, the whole difference between what the stock could have been sold for and the face value is saved to the taxpayer. If, on the other hand, the stock is tendered in payment of death duties at the end of the interest time then there is less, because part of its value is interest. It has gone up in value.

It seems to me that this machinery was designed to put the transaction on a basis comparable to that on which it would have stood if the executors had sold the stock in the market. If you sell the stock, you sell it for what the principal is worth and what the accrued interest, if any, is worth. You get more, as I have pointed out, if you sell late in the period during which interest is accruing than if you sell earlier. For what you get for the principal in the market, substitute in the present case the face value which the Government allows you. Therefore, the Government says that you can use the stock to pay your death duties to an amount consisting of the face value plus the accrued interest, bringing it into line with what would happen if the stock had been taken to the market and realized, in which case the accrued interest would, of course, have been allowed for in the price.

It is said, however, that that allowance in the value given by the Government for interest is taxable interest. I do not think that it is. I have endeavoured to show that I do not think that, on principle, it ought to be so, and I now turn to the Act. Section 34 (1) provides that the subject may pay death duties by means of the transfer of an appropriate amount of war stock "ascertained as hereinafter mentioned." Subsection (4) provides :—"Stock or bonds so transferred shall for the purposes of this section be valued at the price of issue with the addition of any interest accrued due at the date of the transfer but then remaining unpaid. . . ." I think that that means that the value of the stock is to be its face value plus the accrued interest. What is the accrued interest ? There is no way of ascertaining what that is unless you calculate it from day to day, so in subsection (5) it is provided that : "For the purposes of this section interest shall be deemed to accrue from day to day." Therefore, instead of going into the market and selling the stock there at a price which represents principal plus accrued interest, it is transferred at a value which is the sum of the face value representing the principal value of the stock and of the accrued interest representing the interest value. That is how I read the section. It seems to be in accordance with the principle of the thing.

When I look at the prospectus on which these bonds were issued, so far from its supporting the appellant here, I think that it supports the respondents, because it says : "Bonds of this issue will be accepted at their face value by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue as the equivalent of cash, with due adjustment on account of interest." "Adjustment" seems to me just to describe the process which I have endeavoured to indicate. It is : "with due adjustment." That is, the value is to be altered so as not to make it the face value but to make it the face value as modified by the accrual of interest, which modification would have taken place if the bonds had been offered on the market and had realized the market price.

In my opinion, the Special Commissioners were right in this case and this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Judgment was accordingly entered for the respondents, with costs.

K.B. Div. (Rowlatt, J.) 1927. Nov. 30.

GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.

ENGLISH BRANCH COUNCIL OF THE GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Charity — General Medical Council—Whether entitled to exemption—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 37.

The General Medical Council is not a body established for charitable purposes only, and therefore is not entitled, under s. 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, to exemption from income-tax on the income from its funds.

These were appeals by the General Medical Council and the English Branch Council of the General Medical Council against decisions by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax, who had held that the councils were not "established for charitable purposes only" within section 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and were, therefore, liable to assessment to income-tax in respect of income from funds belonging to them.

At a meeting of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax held on October 25, 1926, the General Medical Council claimed exemption from income-tax for the four years ending April 5, 1924, under section 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, on the ground that they were a charity within the meaning of the Income Tax Acts.

The Council, whose full name was the General Council of Medical Education and Registration of the United Kingdom, was first established under the Medical Act, 1858, and was incorporated by section 1 of the Medical Council Act, 1862. Its composition had been altered from time to time, and it now consisted of 38 members, of whom 18 were appointed by universities in the United Kingdom, nine by the medical corporations, and five by his Majesty in Council, while six were elected by members of the medical profession. From the establishment of the Council until April 5, 1924, all the members of the Council were members of the medical profession, but after April 5, 1924, a lay member was appointed by his Majesty in Council.

The preamble of the Medical Act, 1858, was as follows:—"Whereas it is expedient that persons requiring medical aid should be enabled to distinguish qualified from unqualified practitioners: Be it therefore enacted," &c. Section 3 of the Act established the Council, and section 6 set up branch councils for England, Scotland, and Ireland, to which branch councils the Council was empowered to delegate powers and duties, and through which the Council did a great deal of its work.

The chief duties imposed by the Act upon the Council were, (a) to keep and publish a register of qualified practitioners; (b) to exercise oversight of medical studies and examinations; and (c) to publish the "British Pharmacopœia."

Every person who possessed the required medical qualification was entitled on payment of certain fees to have his name entered on the Medical Register, which was published by the Council. The name of a practitioner might be struck off the register in certain circumstances.

By section 31 of the Act of 1858 and by section 6 of the Medical Act, 1886, it was provided that any person registered under the Act should be entitled, according to his qualifications, to practise medicine or surgery and to demand and recover in any Court of law reasonable charges for professional aid, advice, or visits, and for any medicines or medical or surgical appliance.

By section 34 of the Act "The words 'legally qualified medical practitioner' or 'duly qualified medical practitioner,' or any words importing a person recognized by law as a medical practitioner or member of the medical profession, when used in any Act of Parliament, shall be construed to mean a person registered under this Act."

An unregistered person was not prohibited from practising medicine, but he suffered certain disabilities. For example, he could not recover fees by legal process, he could not give a valid certificate, he was debarred from certain appointments, and he was unable to join in practice with a registered practitioner in such a way as to lead the public to believe that he was "covered" by the qualifications of the latter. By section 35 of the Act a registered person was, if he so desired, exempt from service on juries and at inquests.

Sections 18 to 21 of the Act gave power to the Council to require information from medical teaching and examining bodies regarding the courses of study and examinations to be gone through to obtain the qualifications granted by them and empowered a representative of the Council to be present at examinations. If it appeared to the Council that the course of study and examinations for any qualification were not such as to secure that the persons obtaining the qualification possessed the requisite knowledge and skill for the efficient practice of their profession, the Council was empowered to make representations to the Privy Council, and the Privy Council might order that the possession of the qualification in question should no longer confer a right on its holder to be registered under the Act. The powers given by the Act of 1858 to the Council in the matter of supervising medical examinations were expanded by sections 2, 3, and 4 of the Medical Act, 1886.

Mr. Norman Carew King, the registrar of the Council, gave evidence before the Special Commissioners regarding the activities of the Council. He said that the Council carried out their statutory duties of supervising and inspecting medical studies and examinations and reporting thereon; of preparing, revising, and issuing the "British Pharmacopœia," which was the statutory standard of reference for medicinal preparations throughout the Empire; of registering qualified practitioners and of sitting as a judicial body to hear complaints against practitioners in respect of alleged "infamous conduct in a professional respect," a phrase regarding the meaning of which the Council were the sole judges. A good deal of the time of the Council was taken up in hearing such complaints.

The expenditure of the Council consisted mainly of (a) fees and expenses paid to members of the Council and its committees; (b) the cost of inspecting examinations for medical qualifications; (c) printing (including the cost of printing the Medical Register); and (d) office expenses and sundries. The Council's income from registration fees in connexion with colonial and foreign qualifications, from interest on its investments, and from the sale of publications, fell far short of its expenditure, and that deficit was annually made up, and the account exactly balanced, by contributions from the English, Scottish, and Irish Branch Councils calculated on a basis proportionate to the incomes of these branch councils. The branch councils had ordinarily a considerable surplus of income over expenditure, because registration fees paid by English, Scottish, and Irish practitioners were paid directly to the respective branch councils and not to the General Council.

Counsel for the Council contended :—(a) That the purpose for which the Council was established as expressed by Parliament in the preamble to the Medical Act, 1858, viz., "to enable persons requiring medical aid to distinguish qualified from unqualified practitioners," was a charitable purpose and that there was nothing in that Act, or in any other Act, or otherwise, which had any effect other than to carry out the overriding object expressed in the preamble ; (b) that the Council was a body of persons established for charitable purposes only ; (c) that the income of the Council was applicable and had been applied to charitable purposes only ; and (d) that the Council was entitled to exemption from income-tax.

On behalf of the Crown it was contended :—(a) That the Council was a professional institution whose objects, aims, and activities were directed mainly to the interests of the medical profession ; (b) that the Council was not established for charitable purposes only ; and (c) that the income of the Council was not applicable to charitable purposes only and was not so applied.

The Special Commissioners held that the Council was not established for charitable purposes only, and they refused the claim.

The Special Commissioners also refused a claim for exemption, under section 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, by the English Branch Council of the General Medical Council.

The duties of a branch council were principally concerned with keeping registers of qualified practitioners. The councils also nominated members to serve on various committees of the General Council, conducted the election of direct representatives of the profession to serve on the General Council, and appointed assistant examiners to certain bodies in connexion with examinations for medical qualifications under section 5 of the Medical Act, 1896.

The contentions on behalf of the parties were substantially the same as those in the claim by the General Council.

Both the General Council and the English Branch Council appealed against the decisions of the Special Commissioners.

Mr. Vaisey, K.C., and Mr. Raymond Needham appeared for the councils ; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), Mr. J. H. Stamp, and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in delivering judgment, said that the question which he had to decide was whether the councils were bodies or persons "established for charitable purposes only," or whether the income which it was sought to tax was "applicable to charitable purposes only," and was so applied. The income which was the subject of the appeals was derived from the investment of a fund which had been formed as the result of an excess of income over expenditure. No provision was made by the Medical Act, 1858, for the holding by the councils of any capital funds, but by section 43 of the Act all moneys received by the treasurer were to be applied for the expenses of registration and of the execution of the Act.

It had been argued that the income of the invested fund had been "applied to charitable purposes only," since it had been applied in payment of the expenses of the execution of the Medical Acts. A body, to be a charitable body, must come within the analogy of the statute 43 Eliz., c. 4, which supplied the test. The contention of the appellants was that the objects which the General Medical Council had been constituted by Parliament to achieve were for the good of the public. It was clear on the cases that a mere statement of that kind would not bring a case within the Act. It was conceded that in the present case there was no trust for the improvement of the practice of medicine, but it was said that it was for the specific benefit of the public that there should be an authoritative list of good doctors and an authoritative list of drugs, and that that sufficed to make the Council a body which was "established for charitable purposes only."

He (his Lordship) did not take that view. It had been held in a number of cases which dealt with corporation duty, and in Miley v. Attorney-General for Ireland and Rooney ([1918] 1 I.R., 455), that societies for the benefit of professions or trades were not societies with charitable objects. These cases did not cover the present case, because in each of them the society was primarily for the benefit of the profession or trade and only secondarily for the benefit of the public, whereas in the present case the main object of the General Medical Council was to protect the public, and it was only because the public knew that they were protected against bad doctors that good doctors were benefited.

But what was the position of the Council ? What had occurred was nothing more than that the Legislature had thought that it was for the public advantage—as every Act of Parliament must be taken to be—that doctors should be registered, and that there should be an authoritative list of drugs, and that everything incidental to these things should be carried out, and they directed the Council to perform these functions. If that legislation had been passed nowadays the matter would probably have been put into the hands of a Government Department. Parliament might require all sorts of bodies to perform functions which were beneficial to the public, but they could not all be charities. There was no authority that a body such as the General Medical Council fell within the Act of Elizabeth, and the appeal, therefore, failed.

Judgment for the Crown was entered accordingly, with costs.

IN RE F. AND E. STANTON, LIMITED—HOGG v. MAULE AND ANOTHER.*

Company — Winding-up—Debenture—Fraudulent preference—Jurisdiction of County Court—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII., c. 69), ss. 131 (2), (3), and (6), 210, 212.

Less than three months before the commencement of its compulsory winding-up in a County Court, a company having a paid-up capital of less than £10,000 issued debentures to the extent of £4,500 in favour of two persons. The liquidator moved in the County Court for a declaration that the debentures were invalid either as a fraudulent preference under s. 210 or as a floating charge created otherwise than for cash under s. 212 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, and that the persons named in the debentures had no rights in respect of the sums expressed to be secured thereby except as unsecured creditors.

Held, that the deputy County Court Judge had jurisdiction to entertain the liquidator's application, and, as he had done so, his discretion could not be interfered with

In re Ilkley Hotel Company ([1893] 1 Q.B., 248) and In re Centrifugal Butter Company, Limited ([1913] 1 Ch., 188) distinguished.

This was an appeal by debenture holders from the decision of the deputy Judge of the Greenwich County Court, on a motion by the liquidator in the winding-up of F. and E. Stanton, Limited, in that Court, under an order dated February 19, 1926.

The capital of the company was less than £10,000. The motion asked that debentures for a nominal amount of £4,500 might be declared to be invalid under either section 210 or section 212 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. It was admitted that the winding-up was properly within the jurisdiction, but the debenture-holders took a preliminary objection to the motion on the ground that questions arising either under section 210 or under section 212 of the Act, where the amount involved exceeded £100, could not be, or alternatively ought not to be, tried in a County Court. The deputy Judge overruled the preliminary objection, but ordered that the hearing of the motion on its merits should stand over until this appeal from that decision had been disposed of. The other material facts appear from the judgments.

Mr. E. Clayton, K.C., and Mr. A. de W. Mulligan appeared for the debenture-holders, the appellants; Mr. H. B. Vaisey, K.C., and Mr. Oscar Kean for the liquidator, the respondent.

Mr. Justice Avory.—This was a motion in the County Court of Greenwich asking that it might be declared that debentures purporting to have been created by a company in favour of two persons, Harris and Maule, on January 20, 1926, for an aggregate sum of £4,500 were invalid either under section 212 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, or alternatively under subsections 1 and 2 of section 210 thereof, and that Harris and Maule had respectively no rights in the sum of £4,500 or any part thereof except as unsecured creditors in the winding-up of the company. The company in question was, at the time when the motion was made, being compulsorily wound up in the Greenwich County Court, and there is no dispute that the winding-up of this particular company was within the jurisdiction of the county court. The case was within subsections 2 and 3 of section 131 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. Subsection 6 of section 131 provides: "Every Court in England having jurisdiction under this Act to wind up a company shall for the purposes of that jurisdiction have all the powers of the High Court. . . ." The winding-up, therefore, was admittedly within the jurisdiction of the County Court in question, but upon this motion coming before the learned deputy County Court Judge objection was taken that he had no jurisdiction to entertain this application relating to these debentures. After hearing argument, he held that he had jurisdiction and this appeal arises upon this decision. A further point has been taken by Mr. Clayton and fully argued—namely that, even if the deputy County Court Judge has jurisdiction, he ought not, in the circumstances of this case, to exercise it, or, in other words, that he ought in the exercise of a judicial discretion to decline to exercise his jurisdiction. With all respect to the argument addressed to us, I am unable to follow how that proposition can be maintained. If in law a County Court Judge had jurisdiction in this matter, and if he were to say that in the exercise of his discretion he ought not to exercise that jurisdiction, it would be open to the liquidator to come to this Court and ask for a mandamus ordering the County Court Judge to exercise his jurisdiction, and to such an application there would be no answer. In my view, therefore, this question ought to be treated as the question whether in law the deputy County Court Judge had jurisdiction on this application.

The appeal is based upon section 210 and section 212 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. Section 210 (1) provides: "Any conveyance, mortgage, delivery of goods, payment, execution, or other act relating to property which would, if made or done by or against an individual, be deemed in his bankruptcy a fraudulent preference, shall, if made or done by or against a company, be deemed, in the event of its being wound up, a fraudulent preference of its creditors, and be invalid accordingly." Section 212 provides: "Where a company is being wound up, a floating charge on the undertaking or property of the company created within three months of the commencement of the winding-up shall, unless it is proved that the company immediately after the creation of the charge was solvent, be invalid, except to the amount of any cash paid to the company at the time of or subsequently to the creation of, and in consideration for, the charge, together with interest on that amount at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum." Now it is quite true, as Mr. Clayton has pointed out, that neither of these sections confers any express or particular power either on the County Court or on the High Court; all that they do is to declare that certain acts done by a company shall be invalid in law in certain circumstances. While that is true, it is also equally true that both of the matters dealt with in these sections are matters which arise and can arise only in the winding-up of a company; they are matters which cannot arise as a dispute between parties before a winding-up, but must arise and be dealt with in the course of a winding-up. The question, then, resolves itself into this, whether, when an allegation has been made that there has been an infringement either of section 210 or of section 212 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, a county court Judge has jurisdiction in the winding-up of a company to deal with such an allegation. It appears to me that in view of section 131, subsection 6, of the Act—I am speaking now apart from any decided cases and am looking only at the statute—unless it can be said that the High Court would have had no power and no jurisdiction to deal with this motion made in the County Court, the County Court also has jurisdiction.

Mr. Clayton has, however, invited us to hold, substantially on the strength of two decisions, either that the High Court had no jurisdiction or if it had, in view of the decision of Mr. Justice Neville in In re Centrifugal Butter Company, Limited ([1913]

1 Ch., 188), that Court ought not to exercise it. I confess that for some time during the argument I was inclined to the view that the decision of Mr. Justice Cave and Lord Chief Justice Coleridge in In re Ilkley Hotel Company ([1893] 1 Q.B., 248) did amount to a decision in favour of the appellants here, on the ground, to put it shortly, that the result would be, if the respondent were right, that the County Court Judge in such a case would be assuming jurisdiction to make orders without limit as to amount and in many cases without appeal, but upon closer consideration of this decision and the sections of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, I have come to the conclusion that this decision does not govern the present matter. It is perhaps to be regretted that the report of In re Ilkley Hotel Company (supra) does not state in what way exactly the question arose between the parties there, but it is abundantly clear that, in whatever way the transfer of the wine by the manager of the company came about, there was no decision by the Court on any matter of fraudulent preference or floating charge on the assets of the company, and Mr. Justice Cave expressly declined to express any opinion whether the County Court Judge had jurisdiction to declare the transaction to be a fraudulent preference. In other words, it appears to me that this decision is not a decision that a matter which arises and can only arise in the course of a winding-up and which ought to be dealt with by the tribunal that has charge of the winding-up is not within the jurisdiction of the County Court. It is quite true that Mr. Justice Cave founded his judgment to a great extent on the fact that there was in the Bankruptcy Act then in force a section giving certain powers to the County Court, but limiting the jurisdiction to a case where the amount in dispute did not exceed in value £200, and on the fact that there was no similar provision in the Companies Act then in force. I am unable, for myself, to say that the fact that there is no such provision in the Companies Act is of itself in any degree sufficient to take away the jurisdiction of the County Court expressly conferred by section 131, subsection 6, of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908.

But it is necessary that I should now say a word about the other case, In re Centrifugal Butter Company, Limited (supra), in which Mr. Justice Neville was dealing with a case which arose under section 193 (1) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, which provides: "Where a company is being wound up voluntarily the liquidator or any contributory or creditor may apply to the Court to determine any question arising in the winding-up, or to exercise, as respects the enforcing of calls, or any other matter, all or any of the powers which the Court might exercise if the company were being wound up by the Court. . . ." The section is, therefore, one which gives to the Court the same power in the case of a voluntary liquidation as exists where the liquidation is compulsory. In that case there undoubtedly was a question arising between the company and its directors, and the learned Judge said: "The real question in this case is whether the Court ought to allow section 193 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, to be used for the purpose of setting aside a contract between the company and third parties. I am not sure whether it is a question of jurisdiction or only one of discretion. I cannot in this case make any distinction between a contract with directors and a contract with other persons, because the original contract was clearly in order having regard to the constitution of the company. I cannot find the directors guilty of misfeasance until the contract is set aside, and I am doubtful whether I have jurisdiction to set aside the contract on this summons. In the case of In re Oakwell Collieries Co. ([1879] W.N., 65), which was relied on, the application was for delivery up to the company of possession of an estate to which they were prima facie entitled; that is quite a different case from the one before me. But if I have jurisdiction I am clearly of opinion that I ought not to exercise it. Before coming here for relief the applicants must bring an action for rescission of contract and succeed in it." That appears to me to be a decision that in the present case the deputy County Court Judge might, if he had been so advised, have said as Mr. Justice Neville did that this was a matter upon which there would be so much dispute of fact that it was one which ought not to be determined upon affidavit and that he ought not to determine it but ought to leave the parties to bring an action. I cannot hold that this decision made it imperative on the deputy County Court Judge to follow the same course as Mr. Justice Neville did, and therefore it does not appear to me to be an authority in support of the proposition that the deputy County Court Judge had here no jurisdiction to hear the application.

Reference has been made to certain rules of practice laid down by learned Judges having charge of the winding-up of companies for the convenience of the Court in dealing with disputed questions of fact. So far as I know, it is open to County Court Judges to lay down rules for their own guidance and convenience in such matters. If that be not so, that might form a ground for an application to remove a case from the County Court into the High Court; but, in my opinion, on this appeal we have simply to determine the bald question whether the deputy County Court Judge has jurisdiction to entertain the application. In my opinion he has, and we ought not upon this appeal to make an order for the transfer of the case to the High Court.

I am of opinion, therefore, for the reasons which I have stated, that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—I am entirely of the same opinion, but as this case appears to me to involve a question of some importance I will give my reasons. The County Court in question has undoubtedly jurisdiction under section 131 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, to wind up this company. Subsection 6 of section 131 of the same Act provides: "Every Court in England having jurisdiction under this Act to wind up a company shall for the purposes of that jurisdiction have all the powers of the High Court. . . ." We have to construe those words, and especially the words "for the purposes of that jurisdiction." The construction of this subsection seems to be almost entirely free from authority, and we have, therefore, first to construe the subsection for ourselves, and then to refer to such authorities as can assist us on the question. The section confers very wide powers on inferior Courts in the matter of the winding-up of a particular company, if the Court has jurisdiction to wind up. With regard to the particular company, the inferior Court is to have all the powers of the High Court for the purposes of winding-up jurisdiction. I think that means that the inferior Court is in that case clothed with all the powers of the High Court which are necessary for the purpose of winding up that particular company. Those would be powers to decide matters of administration and disputes, the power to decide disputes being limited to disputes which arise in and in consequence of the winding-up and which come into existence because the company is being wound up and which must be decided in order that the winding-up may be complete. That, I think, is the meaning of the subsection.

In this case the deputy County Court Judge was invited by the liquidator on motion to decide two disputes between himself and persons outside the company. One was that certain debentures issued by the company were alleged to be a fraudulent preference, and, in the other case, a certain charge was said to be a floating charge created on the eve of the winding-up in violation of section 212 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. The real question for us to decide is whether the determination of those matters is a thing necessary to be determined for the purpose of winding-up the company. I think the dispute is one necessary to be determined in order that the company may be wound up and, so far as we are free to construe the words of the subsection apart from authority, I think that the deputy County Court Judge was right.

We have, however, been referred to authority on both sides. On behalf of the appellants we were referred to the cases of In re New Par Consols, Limited ([1898] 1 Q.B., 573) and In re New Par Consols, Limited (No. 2) (14 The Times L.R., 287 ; [1898] 1 Q.B., 669). With regard to the first report, a Divisional Court had to construe subsection 6 of section 1 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, the words of which are practically identical with the words now in question ; but it was a case where the County Court had acted under an express power, and I do not think the observations of Lord Russell, C.J., are of any assistance in this case. In the second case, which came before the Court of Appeal, the question was one of prohibition. The County Court Judge had made a committal for disobedience to an order by him, and the Court of Appeal held that the County Court Judge was for the purposes of the winding-up a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, and therefore a prohibition to him could not be granted. The words in question were considered both by Lord Justice A. L. Smith and by Lord Justice Chitty. Lord Justice A. L. Smith said (14 The Times L.R., at p. 288 ; [1898] 1 K.B., at p. 672) : "By that enactment the County Court Judge is, for the purpose of winding-up companies, invested with all the powers possessed by the High Court in relation to a winding-up." Lord Justice Chitty said at the same page : "In this case the County Court Judge had jurisdiction to wind up the company in question under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, and the effect of section 1, subsection 6, of that Act is that he has conferred upon him for the purposes of such a winding-up all the powers of the High Court. . . ." Lord Justice Chitty, therefore, keeps more closely to the actual words of the subsection than does Lord Justice A. L. Smith, but I do not think those judgments throw any real light on the question whether matters of fraudulent preference and floating charges are matters in which the County Court has the powers of the High Court as matters necessary for decision for the purposes of winding-up jurisdiction.

Both sides have availed themselves of the analogy of bankruptcy, and reference has been made to the case of Ex parte Brown—In re Yates (11 Ch. D., 148). The headnote is as follows : "Where a trustee in bankruptcy claims only the same right as the bankrupt himself would have had, the Court of Bankruptcy ought not to assume jurisdiction, but ought to leave the matter to be dealt with by the ordinary tribunals. But where, by the operation of the law of bankruptcy, the trustee has a higher and better title than the bankrupt (where, for instance, a transaction is impeached as a fraudulent preference or an act of bankruptcy), the Court of Bankruptcy ought to decide the matter itself." There the order appealed against was made on the application of the trustee in bankruptcy and it directed that a mortgage executed by the bankrupt should be delivered up to be cancelled, on the ground that the deed was a contrivance to defeat the creditors of the bankrupt, and also that it was a conveyance of substantially the whole of his available assets to secure a pre-existing debt. It was argued that the Court of Bankruptcy ought not to exercise jurisdiction, the appellants being mere strangers to the bankruptcy. Lord Justice James said : "This point is really not arguable. Questions of fraudulent preference and acts of bankruptcy are the very things which were intended to be dealt with by the Court of Bankruptcy." So far as there can be any help from the analogy of bankruptcy, this case assists the respondent rather than the appellants : in both matters submitted to the deputy County Court Judge the liquidator was seeking to enforce rights which existed only by reason of the winding-up.

We were referred on behalf of the appellants to In re Ilkley Hotel Company ([1893] 1 Q.B., 248) and the judgment of Mr. Justice Cave therein. In that case the County Court Judge had been asked to rule on the question of fraudulent preference. He held that there was none, but had made an order that certain property transferred by the manager of the company to particular persons should be given back again, on the ground that the manager had no authority from the company to make the transfer. On appeal Mr. Justice Cave said ([1893] 1 Q.B., at p. 249) : "It appears to me to be quite clear that the County Court Judge had no jurisdiction to make the order which he has made in this case. An application was made to him to declare the transfer of certain wine to the appellant to be a fraudulent preference. The question was raised in argument whether he had any jurisdiction to accede to that application and declare the transaction to be a fraudulent preference. As to that question, I give no opinion. It is unnecessary to decide the point, because the County Court Judge came to the conclusion that there had been no fraudulent preference by the company, on the ground that what was done was done by the manager acting without authority, and therefore there had been no valid transfer of the wine ; and he thereupon ordered the delivery of the wine to the liquidator. The question to be decided is whether he had authority to make that order." So in that case Mr. Justice Cave expressly left open the matter which we have to consider. There is in that judgment nothing inconsistent with the view that we are expressing. The learned County Court Judge there decided a matter between the company and some other persons which had nothing to do with a winding-up.

We were referred also to In re Centrifugal Butter Company, Limited ([1913] 1 Ch., 188). There, after the company had gone into voluntary liquidation, the liquidators took out a summons to set aside an agreement between the company and third parties, and were not exercising any right created by the winding-up. The application was made under section 193 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, and the judgment of Mr. Justice Neville has been already quoted by my brother Avory. The decision appears to me to be in no way inconsistent with the view which we are expressing here.

Mr. Clayton then referred us to Buckley on Companies, 10th Edition, section 193 (p. 449) and section 215 (p. 504). We are not concerned to deal with those sections, but I do not think that the observations there to be found conflict with our view. Mr. Clayton also referred us to sections 163 to 172 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, which set out a series of powers for the purpose of winding-up, and he argued that, because those express powers were given, it therefore followed that not only had the County Court no power, but also the High Court had no power, to deal with questions of fraudulent preference or floating charge by way of motion in a winding-up. He admitted that it was often the practice for the High Court to do so, but agreed that it was essential to his argument that, if the point were taken, it must be decided that the High Court had no power. I think that we ought not to accede to an argument based upon what is inconsistent with ordinary practice.

For these reasons I am satisfied that the deputy County Court Judge has jurisdiction to deal with this matter. It was said, however, that, even if he had jurisdiction, he ought not to exercise it, in view of the large sum involved and the inadequacy of County Court procedure. If the County Court deals with the matter at all, it must be by motion. The comparative magnitude of this case and the inadequacy of County Court procedure might support an application to transfer the matter to the High Court, but we do not think that such a transfer can be made on this appeal, and that matter has been already dealt with by my brother Avory. On the question whether the deputy County Court Judge ought to exercise his jurisdiction, the difficulty is that, if the matter is within his jurisdiction, he has the right to deal with it and we cannot interfere.

For these reasons I agree that this appeal fails.

K.B. Div. (Rowlatt, J.) } 1927. Nov. 25.

GRAND COUNCIL OF THE ROYAL ANTEDILUVIAN ORDER OF BUFFALOES v. OWENS.*

Revenue — Income-tax—Exemption—Hospital —Convalescent home — Maintained by unregistered friendly society for its members— No payment by patients — Accommodation for small proportion of total membership— Eleemosynary character — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. A, No. VI., Rule 1 (c).

Rule 1 of No. VI. of Schedule A of the Income Tax Act, 1918, provides :—"The following further allowances shall be made under this Schedule :— . . . (c) the amount of the tax charged on any hospital, public school, or almshouse, in respect of the public buildings, offices, and premises belonging thereto. . . ."

An unregistered friendly society, of which there were over two million members, had for its principal objects the relief of distressed members and the widows and orphans of members and the promotion of social intercourse and recreation in its lodges. Members of the society paid a small subscription, which was divided and allocated to various benevolent funds.

A house and grounds were bought by the society for use as a convalescent home by its members. The purchase price was paid partly by the society and partly by contributions by its members. The home was maintained by the society and was furnished to accommodate 20 or 30 members. No expense was incurred by a member during his residence at the home, and medical men gave their services to it gratuitously.

Held, that the home was a hospital within Rule 1 (c) of No. VI. of Schedule A, and the society was, therefore, entitled to be allowed the amount of tax charged in respect of the premises of which the home was composed.

This was an appeal by the Grand Council of the Royal Antediluvian Order of Buffaloes against a decision of the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the Droitwich Division by which a convalescent home maintained for its members by the Order at Redditch was held to be assessable to income-tax under Schedule A.

At a meeting of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the division of Droitwich held at the Court House, Bromsgrove, on December 21, 1926, the Grand Council of the Royal Antediluvian Order of Buffaloes appealed against an assessment under Schedule A of the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the year ending April 5, 1924, in the sum of £180 gross (£146 10s. net) in respect of premises called "Holmwood" owned and occupied by the Grand Council. The appeal was on the ground that the premises, which were used as a convalescent home, were a "hospital" within the meaning of Rule 1 (c) of No. VI. of Schedule A. At the hearing of the appeal the following facts were admitted or proved :—

(a) The Royal Antediluvian Order of Buffaloes was an unregistered friendly society which had for its principal objects the relief of distressed members and of the widows and orphans of members and the promotion of social intercourse and recreation in the lodges.

The Order comprised minor lodges, grand lodges, and a Grand Council. The minor lodges were required to hold meetings at least once weekly. There were nearly 2,000 minor lodges and the membership of the Order (which was confined to men) was estimated at over two million persons. A man wishing to join the Order was proposed by a brother of the Order who vouched for his character and, after being duly proposed and seconded and a short period having elapsed during which the credentials of the proposed member were inquired into, initiation took place into a minor lodge. When the initiate had remained a member of the Order for 12 months and had attended 26 times in his minor lodge he was then entitled to participate in the full benefits of the Order.

The administration of the Order was vested in grand lodges and a Grand Council. The grand lodges met once monthly in the district to which they were allocated, and each minor lodge sent two delegates to the grand lodges. Each grand lodge in turn sent one delegate to the Grand Council, which was the supreme governing authority, meeting once quarterly.

(b) A brother of the Order on attending his lodge paid a registration fee of not less than 3d. unless his means were such as to make it impossible for this fee to be paid. Out of this fee the minor lodge contributed to the funds of the Order for each member as follows : ½d. for the Central Benevolent Fund ; ½d. for the Central Widows and Orphans' Fund ; ½d. for the Orphanage Fund ; and 1d. for the Fund of the Convalescent Home at Holmwood. These contributions were placed by the Grand Council in each separate fund and applied solely for the benefit for which each fund was established.

(c) In August, 1921, at a meeting of the Grand Council at Southampton, it was decided to negotiate for the purchase of certain premises at Redditch, called "Holmwood," then vacant, for the purposes of the institution of a convalescent home there for the use of members of the Order. Fully 90 per cent. of the members of the Order were working men and in case of sickness had little or no means to enable them to enter into a convalescent home for recuperation.

Negotiations were entered into, and as a result the mansion house of "Holmwood" and the grounds belonging to it were bought for the sum of £5,000. In addition, certain fixtures and fittings of the mansion house were bought for a further sum of £1,375. The completion of the purchase of the mansion house and grounds took place on December 27, 1921, and by a deed of conveyance of that date the premises were conveyed to trustees upon trust for the Order. £3,000 of the purchase money was allowed to remain on mortgage, and it was subsequently paid off by the Order. Further parcels of land were bought by the Order for the purposes of the convalescent home for the sum of £1,800, and by a deed of conveyance dated August 31, 1922, these parcels were conveyed to trustees, who, by declaration of trust dated August 31, 1922, covenanted to hold them upon trust for the Order.

To enable the Order to find the balance of the purchase money a general appeal was made by the Grand Council to all the members of the Order, and up to June 30, 1923, the sum of £5,242 2s. was voluntarily contributed, the donations being for the most part made up of small sums.

(d) A considerable amount of money was spent on the home before its opening and the Grand Council lent to the Holmwood account from time to time various sums to enable the home to be opened and carried on. Up to June 30, 1926, the sums so lent amounted to £4,750. The home was furnished with 20 beds to admit 20 patients. There was room for another ten beds as occasion required. The home was opened on August 6, 1923, and patients were immediately admitted and continued to be admitted from that date.

The method by which a brother of the Order was admitted into the convalescent home was as follows :—

(e) Application was made by the brother through his minor lodge to the Grand Lodge for admission to the home and a medical certificate was submitted. The Grand Lodge formed a local committee, and if the local committee sanctioned the application it was sent on to the general secretary of the Order, who notified the local committee on what date the brother could enter the home. After admission, the brother was allowed to remain at the home for one month. The local committee paid half the railway fare of the admitted brother and the Grand Council paid the other half of the railway fare. No charge or expense was incurred by the brother during his residence at the home.

The staff at the home consisted of a matron, who was a trained nurse, a master, four indoor servants, and certain outdoor servants. There were attached to the home two local medical men who gave their services gratuitously, and a qualified dentist who also gave his services gratuitously.

The Urban District Council of Redditch treated the home for the purpose of rating as being on a hospital basis and reduced the assessment from £138 per year to £67 per year.

The appellants contended that at all material times the home was a hospital within the meaning of Schedule A, No. VI., Rule 1 (c). They pointed out that the word "hospital" had a large meaning and was intended to exempt anything practically of the character of a hospital which was of an eleemosynary character. In that regard they relied in particular on the case of Cawse v. Nottingham Lunatic Hospital Committee ([1891] 1 Q.B., 585).

They further contended that a hospital had the following meanings :—(a) A house or hospital for the reception and entertainment of travellers and strangers ; (b) a charitable institution for the housing and maintenance of the needy or an asylum for the destitute, infirm, or aged ; (c) an institution or establishment for the care of the sick or wounded, or of those requiring medical treatment.

The appellants contended that a convalescent home was a home where an individual recovered from sickness, regained his health, and got better from ill health ; that the word "convalescent" connoted a gradual recovery of health and strength after illness ; that any institution which provided means for the reception and entertainment and care of a convalescent individual was a hospital ; and that, having regard to the fact that this hospital was maintained solely by the voluntary contributions of members of the Order, and that no contribution whatever was made to its upkeep by those received therein as patients, this convalescent home was a hospital within the meaning of the Rule in respect of the allowances referred to.

The following cases were referred to by the appellants :—Cawse v. Nottingham Lunatic Hospital Committee (supra) ; Needham v. Bowers (21 Q.B.D., 436) ; Trustees of Mary Clark Home v. Anderson (20 The Times L.R., 626 ; [1904] 2 K.B., 645).

Mr. P. D. Owens (H.M. Inspector of Taxes) contended (inter alia) :—(a) That "Holmwood" was not a hospital within the meaning of Rule 1 (c) ; and (b) that the assessment appealed against had been rightfully made and should be confirmed.

The General Commissioners were of opinion that the home was not a hospital within the meaning of Rule 1 (c), and they dismissed the appeal accordingly.

The appellants accordingly required them to state this case for the opinion of the Court whether that decision was right.

Mr. Latter, K.C., Mr. Neville Laski, and Mr. P. R. Barry appeared for the appellants ; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the respondent.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt delivered the following judgment :—The question which I have to consider in this case is whether the establishment maintained by the Grand Council of the Order of Buffaloes is entitled to exemption from tax on its premises under Schedule A as being a "hospital" within Rule 1 (c) of No. VI. of the Schedule. The establishment consists of a private house and its grounds which have been adapted for use as a convalescent home—that is to say, there are received there persons who are no longer in the grip of actual disease but require rest and treatment to restore them to full health and vigour. The Solicitor-General has admitted that, although the institution covers only a small field of hospital work, it is not prevented from being a "hospital" within the Rule. Of course, if it covered a wider field and was more strictly speaking a general hospital where persons could be treated for all sorts of ailments, or for illness of any particular kind, during the crisis of their complaints, it would present a different picture to the mind, but I can regard it as a hospital so far as the medical point of view is concerned and I have to say whether it has lost the benefit of the Rule by reason of the nature of its support or of the class of persons who are benefited by it. I have to decide whether there is any limitation which the Court must apply to the word "hospital" and which covers this case.

There is one limitation which appears established by authority, and that is that there must be some charitable—or, as I prefer it—eleemosynary element about the maintenance of an institution to constitute it a hospital within the Rule. If, as a whole, it is maintained by the payments of patients (whether some pay less than their cost and others more, or however it is) it is not entitled to exemption under the Rule. In the present case the premises constituting the home were bought by subscription which was very largely, if not entirely, inside the Order. The home is supported by the general funds of the Order and the patients at it must be members of the Order. Very few patients—about 20 or 30—compared with the total membership of the Order can be accommodated in the home.

The Solicitor-General argued that the home was really a private institution owned by the Order for the benefit of their members and that, in substance, it possessed no element of public charity in the technical sense of the word "public." On the whole, I do not think that I am justified in holding that the circumstances of the work and management of this home prevent its obtaining exemption under the Rule. I confess that I approach the matter from the angle that in the Rule there is a perfectly general word—"hospital"—and I must justify excluding this establishment from it. I do not think that, for an institution to fall within the Rule, it must possess a particularly charitable element. It is enough if it has an eleemosynary character in the sense that the patients get its benefits as the result of eleemosynary help by others.

The point has also been taken that no trust has been created under which the perpetual user of the premises as a home has been secured. That is true, but at the same time, as a practical matter, I fancy that it would be rather difficult, the funds to buy the premises having been obtained by subscription for a definite object, for the Order to wind up the activities of the home, dispose of the property, and to throw the proceeds into their general funds. The home will continue for an indefinite time to be used for hospital purposes.

Am I to regard the matter as if the opportunity of enjoying the amenities of this home was bought by a person who became a member of the Order? It cannot be said that the enjoyment of these amenities is to be regarded as something in the nature of an insurance benefit which the members of the Order obtain entirely by contract. In my opinion the true position is that the Order are able, by reason of their possession of the premises and sufficient funds, to confer an advantage on a few of their members who suffer from the kind of misfortune that the home has been established to alleviate. The home can be regarded as an eleemosynary establishment maintained by the Order for the benefit of a few members out of many. The patients enjoy the amenities of the home by the charity of the Order or of their fellow members. The mere circumstance that the recipients of the benefits of the home are limited to members of the Order makes no difference. An institution is not prevented from being a hospital within the Rule because it has been established for the members of a profession or trade or for some such large section of the community.

For these reasons—although the case is very near the line—I think that the appellants are entitled to succeed, with costs.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P.) 1927. Nov. 7.

GREENWAY v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL (GREENWAY AND OTHERS CITED).*

Legitimacy—Petition—Application for hearing in camera—Jurisdiction—Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858 (21 and 22 Vict., c. 93)—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 188—Legitimacy Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 60).

A petition filed under the Legitimacy Act, 1926, for the legitimation of a person who was born illegitimate, but whose parents were married subsequently to his birth, is not a proceeding which entitles the petitioner to a hearing in camera. There is no ground for departing from the general rule of judicial administration, specifically recognized in Scott v. Scott (29 The Times L.R., 520; [1913] A.C., 417), that justice in this country is to be administered publicly unless the Legislature shall otherwise direct.

This was the first petition heard in this Division under the Legitimacy Act, 1926, and the Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858, for a declaration that the petitioner had become legitimated by reason of the marriage of his parents subsequently to his birth. In his petition, dated February 14, 1927, J. D. Greenway said that he was born on March 28, 1896, at Melbourne, and that his parents, who were then unmarried, were married at St. Bride's Church, Fleet-street, on October 7, 1899; that there were three children of the marriage; and that the petitioner's father died on May 29, 1915. Paragraph 8 said: "That other than the said issue of the said marriage there are no persons affected and there is no property involved by the legitimation of your petitioner under the provisions of the Legitimacy Act, 1926." Further paragraphs set out that there was no collusion or connivance between the parties, that there had been no previous legitimacy proceedings, and that the petitioner was a natural-born subject of the King.

* Reported by WILLIAM LATEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The prayer asked for a declaration that the parents were lawfully married at the place and on the date mentioned above, "and that by such marriage and under and by virtue of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, your petitioner has been since January 1, 1927, the legitimate son of his said parents."

In his answer dated June 23, 1927, the Attorney-General said :—

"(1) That he leaves the petitioner to make such proof of the matters set forth in the said petition as the said petitioner shall be enabled.

"(2) That he claims on behalf of his Majesty all such right and interest as he on behalf of his Majesty shall appear to have in the premises, and in any matter arising out of the proceedings upon the said petition, and submits the same to the judgment, order, and direction of this Honourable Court."

Mr. F. R. Evershed appeared for the petitioner and other parties interested ; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Gervais Rentoul for the Crown.

Mr. Evershed raised a preliminary objection to the petition being heard publicly in open Court, and said that it was not the kind of proceeding to which Scott v. Scott (29 The Times L.R., 520 ; [1913] A.C., 417) applied. The petition was actually brought under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which re-enacted the Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858. Rules had been issued under the Legitimacy Act, 1926, for applications to the County Court, but not in regard to those in the High Court. Only private rights were in question here.

Lord Merrivale.—It had been thought that a practice that was growing up in nullity suits to hear them in camera was a proper one, and perhaps in regard to other classes of cases, but in Scott v. Scott (supra) it was decided that it could not be done. It is very important in questions of status that it should not be done.

Mr. Evershed.—This is not a question of public interest.

Lord Merrivale.—This is similar to a suit in which there are plaintiffs and defendants, and the Attorney-General represents the public interest.

Sir Douglas Hogg.—I do not propose to agree to this or to any other proceeding under this Act being heard in camera.

Mr. Evershed read passages from the speeches in Scott v. Scott (supra) to show that the decision did not cover this case, and he said that if it were not possible in many of these legitimacy suits to hear them in camera there would be a denial of justice because illegitimate people would refrain from exercising their rights under the law owing to the fear of publicity. He referred to proceedings which were held in camera.

Sir Douglas Hogg said that the question of status as well as the interests of other people were involved. Section 2 (1) of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, said : "A person claiming that he or his parent or any remoter ancestor became or has become a legitimated person may, whether domiciled in England or elsewhere and whether a natural-born British subject or not, present a petition under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858, and that Act, subject to such necessary modifications as may be prescribed by rules of Court, shall apply accordingly."

Section 8 of the 1858 Act said : "The decree . . . shall not in any case prejudice any person, unless such person has been cited or made a party to the proceedings, or is the heir-at-law or next of kin, or other real or personal representative of or derives title under or through a person so cited or made a party ; nor shall such sentence or decree of the Court prejudice any person if subsequently proved to have been obtained by fraud or collusion."

The Attorney-General said that Scott v. Scott (supra) required his Majesty's Courts to be open to the public and laid it down that publicity was necessary to the proper administration of justice. There were exceptions in regard to cases in which publicity would prevent the proper administration of justice, as for example in the case of an injunction to prevent the exploitation of a secret process the object of which would be defeated by publicity. Again, there was the case of particular evidence not being available if heard in open Court, and in this Division Sir Samuel Evans, President, in the case of Moosbrugger v. Moosbrugger (29 The Times L.R., 658), directed only that a particular matter should be the subject of evidence given in camera. He recalled cases of evidence being given in private at courts-martial following the Irish rebellion the embers of which were then still smouldering. If the names of any of the witnesses had become known they might have been assassinated. In such cases it was impossible to do justice unless the case were heard in camera. He cited passages from the speeches of Lord Halsbury and Lord Shaw in Scott v. Scott (supra) in support of his argument and said : "I am not here merely for the protection of property on behalf of the Crown. In legitimacy cases the Attorney-General represents the public to ensure that the purposes of the law and the interests of the public at large shall be observed. The fact that a case like this is heard in public is the best protection that the public can have. It would be a very serious thing if these cases were heard in camera and so those ends were defeated which only publicity can carry out. Your Lordship cannot make this order."

Lord Merrivale.—This is an application under the Legitimacy Act of 1926, whereby what has been for time whereof the memory of man, I suppose, runs not to the contrary the law of Scotland became the law of England—namely, that children begotten before marriage between parents who are capable of marriage at the time became legitimated by the subsequent marriage of their parents. It has been a matter of controversy for generations, and one might almost say for ages, in this country. At a very remote period in the legal history of the country those who exercised the powers of Parliament declared that in that matter they would not depart from the ancient law of England. The ancient law of England was that illegitimacy, when once it existed, remained permanently the status of the person concerned. The statute of 1926 has altered that, and it is said that it has created the status of legitimacy dependent upon the capacity of the parents to marry at the time of procreation and subsequent marriage. I am not concerned to examine that with any accurate minuteness.

So far as I know, speaking generally, it is true, but the statute has done something more. It has directed that a person claiming to be legitimated, or to have become legitimated, by the operation of this statute may proceed by a suit in one of his Majesty's Courts to obtain a declaration of his legitimacy, and the statute which confers that faculty upon a person asserting legitimacy directs that the provisions of the Legitimacy Declaration Act of 1858 shall apply to any proceeding which takes place under this power. I suppose there could not be a doubt in the mind of any man who had any familiarity with proceedings under the Legitimacy

Declaration Act of 1858 that these proceedings took place invariably in open Court. It never occurred to any person, so far as I am aware, that the jurisdiction of the Court could be exercised otherwise than upon a public trial of the cause. Such public trials took place from time to time, and sometimes in them matters involving great pain to the parties and to witnesses were the subjects of discussion. That is the situation of the matter upon the Act of Parliament.

The general law of England was long ago declared to be that the Courts of this land exercised their powers in public, unless by some means they are directed to exercise them otherwise. The passage was cited by Lord Halsbury in Scott v. Scott (29 The Times L.R., 520; [1913] A.C., 417) from the judgment of very learned Judges long years before that case was heard in which three learned Judges determined that the Divorce Court had no power to sit otherwise than with open doors. That was founded upon an ancient principle of law. I think that ancient principle is hardly contested on the part of the present litigant, but the application is made that this case shall be heard in camera upon grounds founded on passages in the speeches in Scott v. Scott (supra) which are supposed to limit the generality of the rule that they recognize.

As to the generality of the rule there can be no question, and the House of Lords decided that an Ecclesiastical Court could not proceed in camera. But the noble and learned Lords who decided the case of Scott v. Scott (supra) had sundry matters brought to their attention, and they made very guarded limitations. It was said to them that in certain proceedings in respect of infants and in respect of the property of lunatics the High Court exercised its discretion in camera. That is quite true. Their Lordships justify that procedure, but it has nothing to do with this case.

Their Lordships said that where a question of mere status was concerned it was essential that there should be publicity as a general rule. That does not weaken the authority of the Court as a general proposition. It is said that there is no question of status in this case, and therefore in this particular case the rule could be relaxed on other grounds. The other grounds were grounds which were much discussed. There is the class of cases in which property, which it is the object of the litigation to protect, would be destroyed by public inquiry, and the noble and learned Lords withheld any declaration which would preclude a proceeding in camera in such a case. This is not such a case.

But Lord Loreburn also instanced a possible ground of limiting the operation of the general rule which required publicity, in cases in which, as that noble and learned Lord said, publicity would in the circumstances reasonably deter a party from seeking redress, and he guardedly refrained from excluding the power to sit in camera if such circumstances were found to operate. In the judgments of the general body of the Lords, and more particularly in the judgment of Lord Halsbury and in the judgment of Lord Shaw, it is made abundantly apparent that the grounds on which it could be held as a reason for the private sitting of a Court that publicity would in the circumstances reasonably deter a party from seeking redress are so difficult to define safely as a matter of general rule that the question must be left to be dealt with as it arises.

I myself do not regard it as part of the law laid down by Scott v. Scott (supra) that if publicity will deter a litigant from proceeding to obtain redress he should be allowed to bring his suit in camera. I do not believe that that is the law, and I know no ground for supposing that there is any such general principle of law.

It was said that no question of status arises, and that, therefore, many of the observations in Scott v. Scott (supra) do not apply with their full effect. Undoubtedly a question of status arises. Legitimacy is status. Illegitimacy is status. The question here is as between legitimacy and illegitimacy.

As to the other matters, it seems to me that, apart from Scott v. Scott (supra), it must be recognized here that the general rule of judicial administration in this country is that justice is to be administered publicly unless the Legislature shall otherwise direct.

The Attorney-General in the few observations which he addressed to the Court withheld his assent to the suggestion that he is a party to these proceedings merely to protect the proprietary interests of the Crown in case of escheat. I endorse these observations fully. The Attorney-General is here representing the Crown in a matter in which the judgment has effects of some public consequence—a consequence beyond the effect which it has between the actual litigants, and of the class bearing upon the interests of the community which were recognized in the Legitimacy Declaration Act of 1858, and reinforced by the consideration peculiar to the Act of 1926 in which the procedure of the Legitimacy Declaration Act of 1858 is preserved.

I think there is no ground in this case upon which a Judge would be warranted in saying that he may proceed in camera. Some observations were founded upon remarks of learned Judges with regard to cases in which the parties had referred the matter to an arbitrator agreed upon by the parties and were bound by his award. It was said that in these cases it was at the option of the parties and their agreed arbitrator to proceed without publicity. This is not a case of that kind, and I can only say that for my own part I should not dream of resigning to an arbitrator functions which the statute has directed that I should exercise, if at all, judicially. The application for a hearing in camera fails.

The suit then proceeded, and his Lordship granted the declaration asked for, subject to its being prefaced by a recital correcting an error in the petition concerning a detail in the property affected.

Mr. RENTOUL said that the Attorney-General did not ask for costs, and no order was made as to costs.

FRANCE v. J. COOMBES AND CO.*

Master and Servant—Minimum wage—Trade board — Employment both on work of "specified trade" and on other work—Claim for wages at minimum rate during whole time of employment—Trade Boards Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 8.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants as "working manager" of a branch shop. During about half of the business hours he was employed in working at a trade for which minimum rates of wages had been fixed under the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918. During the rest of those hours he was engaged in cleaning the shop, keeping the books, selling goods by retail and performing other duties under his contract of service for which no minimum wage had been fixed.

Held, that the plaintiff was not, by s. 8 of the Trade Boards Act, 1918, to be deemed to have been employed during all the business hours on work for which a minimum rate of wages had been fixed, since the defendants had proved that he was present on their premises during those hours for some purpose, (a) unconnected with the work for which a minimum rate of wages had been fixed, and (b) other than that of waiting for work to be given to him to perform.

This action raised the question what rate of wages employers were liable to pay to workers employed by them partly on work for which minimum rates of wages had been fixed under the Trade Boards Acts and partly on work which did not come within those enactments. It was stated that it was a test case.

Mr. Herbert France, a Manchester boot and shoe repairer, claimed from Messrs. J. Coombes and Co., boot and shoe repairers, of Harrogate, Yorkshire, £363 odd which he said was owing to him as wages.

For about three years the plaintiff was employed by the defendants as "working manager" of a branch shop at Openshaw, Manchester, under an agreement by which he agreed "to do all kinds of boot repairing and other work" required by the defendants; to be responsible for all moneys and goods at the branch; to render to the defendants all accounts as required; to account for and pay over all moneys of the employers; to keep all books and documents; and to keep open the branch shop and remain in attendance at it during business hours. The parties also signed a document headed "Rules for Managers of Branch Shops," which specified the business hours and provided that the shop must be cleaned before 10 o'clock, that cash must be balanced and the day-book entered up nightly, and that a balance-sheet must be completed every week.

During the currency of the agreement the defendants paid to the plaintiff the full amount of the wages provided for in it. After he had left their employment, however, he brought the present action, alleging that the amount of wages due to him was regulated by the Trade Boards Acts, that he had not received the sums provided by those Acts in respect of all the time during which he was present on, and therefore was by section 8 of the Trade Boards Act, 1918, to be deemed to be employed at, the defendants' premises, and that the defendants were liable to pay him the balance.

The primary purpose of the branch shop of which the plaintiff was manager was to repair boots and shoes brought there for that purpose by customers, but there was also a retail trade of selling blacking, laces, and other "sundries." The plaintiff was employed, on the average, during about half the business hours in actually repairing boots and shoes. During the rest of the time he served in the shop, attended to it, kept the books and accounts, and performed his other duties under the contract.

The boot and shoe repairing trade was a trade for which minimum piece rates and time rates had been fixed by the trade board for the industry under the Trade Boards Acts.

Section 8 of the Trade Boards Act, 1918, provides:—

"For the purpose of calculating the amount of the wages payable in the case of a worker employed on any work for which a minimum rate of wages has been fixed under the principal Act [the Trade Boards Act, 1909] the worker shall be deemed to have been employed during all the time during which he was present on the premises of the employer, unless the employer proves . . . that he was so present for some purpose unconnected with his work and other than that of waiting for work to be given to him to perform. . . ."

The plaintiff contended that, in view of that section, during the whole time that he was in the defendants' shop he was to be "deemed to have been employed" there in repairing boots and shoes, and that he was entitled to time and overtime minimum rates in respect of all the business hours which he spent at the shop.

The defendants contended that the plaintiff was not to be deemed to have been acting as a boot and shoe repairer during all the time when he was at the shop, but that he was only employed on that work during the actual periods in which he was repairing boots and shoes, and for that he had been paid the minimum rates fixed for workers of his class by the trade board.

Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. Malcolm Hilbery appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske for the defendants.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon.—The question which I have to decide is whether the plaintiff can say with truth that he was employed in the trade of boot and shoe repairing during the whole time during which he was in the defendants' shop, or whether the defendants can say with truth that he was only so employed during that part of the day in which he was actually repairing boots and shoes. I should not have had very much difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the defendants were right in that but for the provisions of section 8 of the Trade Boards Act, 1918.

All the time-rates and piece-rates of wages laid down by the Orders of the Minister of Labour are subject to the proviso that they are "based on a week of 48 hours and are subject to a proportionate reduction according as the number of hours of employment in any week is less than 48." If a man is employed partly in repairing boots and shoes in a small shop like that in the present case and partly in selling articles by retail, partly in keeping the shop in order, and partly in making up the accounts, I should have thought that he was employed in various tasks and that only part of his time—in the present case less than 48 hours a week—was actually occupied in repairing boots and shoes. But I have to take into account section 8 of the Act of 1918, which, in my opinion, supplies the most difficult and important point in the case. It is obvious that the plaintiff was present on the defendants' premises for more than 60 hours each week. He is, therefore, to be "deemed to have been employed" on the work of boot and shoe repairing during all that time, "unless the employer proves . . . that he was so present for some purpose unconnected with his work and other than that of waiting for work to be given to him to perform."

Several questions arise on the section. Do the words in it "his work" mean in this case the plaintiff's work of boot and shoe repairing, or his work for the defendants whatever it might be. Having regard to the whole purpose of these Acts,

I think that "his work" means here "his work of boot and shoe repairing." Considering only that part of the section which says, "unless the employer proves . . . that he was so present for some purpose unconnected with his work," the defendants have, in my opinion, shown that the plaintiff was present at their shop for some purpose unconnected with the work of boot and shoe repairing, because he was only repairing boots and shoes during about one-half of the business hours and during the rest of that time he was cleaning the shop, selling "sundries," making up the books, eating his meals, and, possibly, during a considerable number of hours, doing nothing at all.

But the defendants, to succeed, have to do something more. They have also to show that the plaintiff was present "for some purpose . . . other than that of waiting for work to be given to him to perform." Can the defendants say that the plaintiff, when not repairing boots and shoes, was in the shop for some purpose other than that of waiting for work to be given to him to perform. He was undoubtedly waiting there for work to be given to him to perform in the sense that if, while he was either doing nothing or was performing some of his other duties, a customer came in with a pair of boots or shoes for repair, he would be given work to perform. I do not think, however, that it would be proper to construe this section in favour of the plaintiff in the present case. In my opinion, the section contemplates the case of a time-worker who is definitely employed during the whole of his time to do work for which minimum rates of wages have been fixed. If, through no fault of his, but owing to the delay of some fellow-worker employed in bringing him the raw material, or owing to the absence of raw material on which he can work, he is unable to work for a given period, he is not to be prejudiced in his right to payment in respect of that period. I think that the defendants here can say that the plaintiff was at their shop for a purpose other than that of waiting for work to be given to him to perform, that purpose being to look after the shop and so on. Doubtless it is true that the main purpose of the business and of his employment was the repairing of boots and shoes, but other things were involved in his employment. He was employed, not only as manager in the sense of the definition of "manager" by the trade board, but also as the manager of all the business carried on at the shop, in which capacity he had to do a number of things.

Taking a more general view of this legislation and these Orders, I do not think that their purpose was to entitle a man who has become a member of a privileged class, for which minimum rates of wages have been fixed under the Trade Boards Acts, to be paid the minimum rate applicable to him whatever may be the work on which he is employed. Their whole purpose is to ensure that any man, during the time that he is doing work for which minimum rates of wages have been fixed, is paid the minimum rate applicable to him. It is necessary to take that view in the present matter if the case is considered of a man in an ordinary boot shop part of whose time is spent in repairing leather footwear and the rest of whose time is spent in retailing boots and shoes.

In my view, therefore, section 8 is not decisive of this case in favour of the plaintiff. The defendants have proved that during about half the time when he was employed at the shop he was "present for some purpose unconnected with 'his work' [of boot and shoe repairing] and other than that of waiting for work to be given to him to perform." During the time when he was actually repairing boots and shoes he was paid the proper minimum rate and, therefore, his claim fails.

Had I decided otherwise I should have held that the meal-times enjoyed by the plaintiff must be deducted from the total number of hours a week during which he was present at the defendants' shop, because proviso (b) in section 8 enacts that "a worker while present during normal meal times in a room or place in which no work is being done shall be deemed to be present for a purpose unconnected with his work." It is, however, unnecessary to discuss that.

The claim fails, and there must be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

K.B. Div. (Rowlatt, J.) 1927. Dec. 2.

JONES v. WRIGHT.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Profits and earnings of employment — Solicitor-trustee — Power to charge — Remuneration by percentage of trust funds — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Case II.

Case II. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, provides that income-tax "shall extend to every employment by retainer in any character whatever, whether such retainer shall be annual or for a longer or shorter period, and to all profits and earnings of whatever value arising from employments, and shall be computed on the full amount of the balance of the profits, gains, and emoluments of the professions, employments or vocations upon a fair and just average of three years. . . ."

A solicitor-trustee was empowered by clauses in the instruments creating the trusts to charge for work done by him in connexion with the trusts. By agreement between himself, his co-trustees, and the beneficiaries his remuneration was calculated as a percentage of the annual income of the trust funds, which income had already been brought into charge to tax.

Held, that this remuneration was chargeable to income-tax on the solicitor under Sched. D, Case II., of the Income Tax Act, 1918, as his profits or earnings arising from an employment and was not constituted of annual payments payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax within Rule 19 of the General Rules applicable to All Schedules of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

In re White (14 The Times L.R., 503; [1898] 2 Ch., 217); In re Brown ([1918] W.N., 118); and Baxendale v. Murphy (40 The Times L.R., 784; [1924] 2 K.B., 494) distinguished.

This was an appeal by the Crown in a case which raised the question of the liability of a solicitor-trustee to pay income-tax on his remuneration for professional services, that remuneration being calculated as a percentage of the annual trust income.

At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on July 12, 1926, to hear appeals, the respondent, Mr. Charles Hadfield Wright, a solicitor, of 34, Clement's-lane, E.C.4, appealed against an assessment to income-tax for the year ending April 5, 1926, made on him under Case II. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of the profits arising from his profession.

In the computation of the assessment there were included sums purporting to represent charges of the respondent in respect of work done in relation to three trusts created by instruments under which the respondent had been appointed a trustee, with power to charge under two of the instruments as follows :—

"Provided also and it is hereby agreed and declared that any trustee for the time being under these presents being a solicitor or other person engaged in any profession or business shall be entitled to charge and be paid all usual or professional charges for business done by him or his firm in relation to the execution of the trusts of these presents whether in the ordinary course of his profession or business or not and although not of a nature requiring the employment of a solicitor or other professional person."

The power to charge in the third instrument was as follows :—

"The said Charles Hadfield Wright or any other executor or trustee hereunder being a solicitor or other person engaged in any profession or business may be so employed or being a sole executor or trustee may so act and shall be entitled to charge and be paid for all work done and time expended by him or his firm in relation to the executorship or trust including acts which a trustee not being in any profession or business could have done personally."

The respondent acted as trustee under the three instruments, and, in addition to his ordinary duties as executor and trustee, he kept the books and accounts of the trusts and supervised the receipt of the income from the trust funds and the distribution of that income to the persons entitled under the trusts. In respect of the work done by him he did not charge his usual or proper professional fees, but, by arrangement with the other trustees and the beneficiaries, received or retained a small sum a year calculated as a percentage of the amount of income received on the investments representing the trust funds.

During the years ending April 5, 1923, 1924, and 1925, that is to say, during the years falling into the average for the purposes of the assessment under appeal, the respondent received or retained sums amounting in all in each of those years to about £26, £30, and £28, resulting in an average of £28 over those years. All those sums were paid to or retained by him out of the income of the trust funds which had already been brought into charge to income-tax.

No deductions in respect of income-tax were made from the sums paid to the respondent, but, in the event of his contentions being upheld, he was prepared to make all necessary adjustments by way of repayment to the executors and trustees of the appropriate sums in respect of income-tax.

In the foregoing circumstances the respondent claimed that the sums in question should be excluded from the computation of the assessment. It was contended on his behalf that :—(a) the sums paid to him were annual payments, payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge within the meaning of Rule 19 of the General Rules applicable to Schedules A, B, C, D, and E of the Income Tax Act, 1918 ; (b) in making the payments the executors or trustees should have deducted therefrom income-tax at the rate of tax in force during each of the years in question ; and (c) the sums were not chargeable under Case II. of Schedule D as profits or gains arising to the respondent from his profession as a solicitor.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the sums paid to the respondent were properly chargeable on him under Case II. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and that the assessment under appeal should accordingly be confirmed.

The Special Commissioners held that the sums in question were annual payments payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge within Rule 19 of the General Rules applicable to Schedules A, B, C, D, and E of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and that they were not chargeable on the respondent under Case II. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918. They, accordingly, reduced the assessment under appeal.

The Crown appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the Crown ; Mr. Raymond Needham for the respondent.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt.—In this case the question for my decision is whether a solicitor is bound to include for income-tax purposes among the receipts from the exercise by him of his profession three sums which he has arranged with the trustees of three trusts and with the beneficiaries, he himself being one of the trustees, to receive by way of commutation of his charges for work done by him as a solicitor which he was entitled to make under the clauses giving him power to charge in the several instruments creating the trusts. Is he so bound, or are the sums in question to be treated as annual payments payable out of profits or gains which belong to the cestuis-que-trust and are therefore liable to suffer deduction in their hands under Rule 19 of the All Schedules Rules under the Income Tax Act, 1918 ?

I do not think that it makes any difference that we have here to deal with sums resulting from a commutation calculated as a percentage on the annual incomes received by the trusts instead of payments on a quantum meruit or sums made up according to a scale of charges which would vary from year to year according to the work done.

Clearly a payment out of profits or gains does not suffer deduction of income-tax unless it is by way of division of profits. If it is a payment by way of spending it is not a division of profits, but a spending which creates a new profit taxable in the hands of the recipient. The Special Commissioners decided this case on the authority of my own decision in Baxendale v. Murphy (40 The Times L.R., 784 ; [1924] 2 K.B., 494). In that case a trust had been created by a separation deed and two trustees were appointed, the settlement providing that each of them should be entitled to remuneration for his services at the rate of £100 a year. I held that they took the money under the trust as an "annual payment . . . payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax" within Rule 19 and that it was not a payment in respect of an employment so as to be the subject of direct assessment under Schedule D, Case II. I decided that on the authority of In re Thorley (7 The Times L.R., 479 ; [1891] 2 Ch., 613) and other cases, although it arose under a settlement and not under a will. The view which I took in Baxendale v. Murphy (supra) was that there was no employment available at £100 a year to anyone to do the work in question. Either the trustees named in the settlement acted as trustees or they did not. If they acted as trustees they received the £100 a year each; if they did not so act they did not receive the money.

The Attorney-General has reserved the point whether Baxendale v. Murphy (supra) should have been decided the other way on the ground that the trustees came in quite voluntarily. It may be that that is so. But, in any case, I do not think that Baxendale v. Murphy (supra) covers the present matter. Here there is simply a common clause in each of the instruments creating the trusts and that clause empowers any trustee who happens to be a solicitor to make his ordinary charges for the professional services rendered in respect of the trust. Although he is a trustee he need not act as a solicitor. If he refuses to do so another solicitor is employed. The respondent came into this matter because he was willing to act as solicitor and because the other trustees were agreeable that he should do so. Therefore, there seem to me to be the elements of a contract between the trustees and the solicitor-trustee. All that the latter gets under the clauses which give him power to charge is the removal of a disability which would otherwise prevent him from entering into an ordinary contract of service with the trustees in consideration of remuneration.

I think that he did enter into such a contract, subject to the difficulty of pleading at common law a contract to which he was a party as his own employer. I do not think, however, that, for income-tax purposes, a man can be absolved from including in the profits and gains of his profession that which he has undoubtedly earned in the course of his professional employment—perhaps by serving a firm in another line of business in which he is a partner as solicitor or accountant—because of a technical difficulty in a matter of common law pleading. It is true that Lord Justice Lindley, in his judgment in In re Thorley (supra)—where there was a bequest by will of an annual sum to trustees while they carried on the testator's business—said (at p. 624) that the trustees could not frame declarations to recover their annuities based on implied contracts of payment because they were both "paymasters and payees." But In re Thorley (supra) was extremely like Baxendale v. Murphy (supra) except that the trust was created by a will and not by a settlement. In neither case was there any question of anyone getting the annual sum—£250 in one case and £100 in the other—unless he was a trustee of the will or of the settlement. No employment was generally available. Here, as I have said, the respondent need not act as solicitor to any of these trusts. If he wishes to do so he finds himself free to enter into a bargain. If he does not do so another solicitor can be employed.

So far I should have thought that it was clear—for income-tax purposes and I am not concerned with anything else—that the sums received by the respondent from the trusts in the present case were profits and earnings arising from his employment as a solicitor and that it could not be said that those sums, or his share of them if he had been acting in partnership with another solicitor, were annual payments "payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax." But I was pressed with, and impressed by, the cases of In re White (14 The Times L.R., 503; [1898] 2 Ch., 217) and In re Brown ([1918] W.N., 118). Nothing could be clearer and more helpful than the argument which was founded on those authorities, but I do not think that they cover the present case. In In re White (supra) a will contained a clause empowering a solicitor-trustee to charge for professional work. The estate proved to be insolvent and the solicitor-trustee sought to claim profit costs against it. It was held that he could not do so on the ground that a trustee must give his services gratuitously and that anything given to him is given as a bounty by the testator, and that that bounty cannot give the object of it an advantage which he would possess if he were a creditor. In In re Brown (supra) the testatrix made a number of bequests and declared that every trustee of her will who might happen to be a solicitor should be entitled to be paid all usual professional charges for advice given and business done with reference to her will. The total estate amounted to a less sum than the legacies so that an abatement became necessary. It was held that the power to charge in the will was in effect a bequest to the solicitor-trustee of a legacy conditional on his doing certain work, the amount of the legacy to be ascertained when the work had been done and the profit costs arrived at, and that, therefore, the amount of it must be abated proportionally. I do not know whether a solicitor-trustee who is empowered to charge is charged with legacy duty. There must be great difficulties in doing so. If, for instance, the solicitor-trustee is a partner he has to be charged on his share under the partnership agreement. Or, if another solicitor-trustee comes in, then the legacy must be treated as springing up again in his favour.

But, however that may be, I do not think that those cases cover the present matter, because I do not think that they mean that a bequest of profit costs is a bequest of a bounty which is not earned. Profit costs are earned in such a case as the present and it is right to charge them with income-tax under Schedule D, Case II. They remain remuneration and must be treated as profits and earnings arising from employment. This appeal must, therefore, be allowed, with costs.

CATTON v. ASHWELL AND NESBIT, LIMITED.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident — Weekly payments — Alleged recovery of workman—Stoppage—Application by employers for review — Denial of liability—Payment into Court of amount up to date fixed for hearing—Alleged breach of statutory duty—Tribunal to determine question of incapacity—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 84), ss. 12, 21.

The plaintiff, a workman in the employment of the defendants, was injured by an accident, and the defendants admitted liability and made a weekly payment of compensation. Ultimately a doctor reported that the plaintiff had recovered, and the defendants stopped the weekly payments and applied to the county court for a review thereof, and, when a date had been fixed for the hearing, they paid into Court, with a denial of liability, the amount of the weekly payments up to that date. While the county court proceedings were still pending, the plaintiff brought this action, alleging that he had not recovered from his injury, and claiming (1) a declaration that under section 12 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, the defendants had committed a breach of their duty by stopping the payments otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration, and (2) an injunction restraining a continuance of the breach.

Held, that under section 21 of the Act the only tribunal to determine the question of incapacity was the county court, and as that question had not yet been determined by that tribunal the plaintiff could not show that his incapacity was continuing since the date when the defendants stopped the weekly payments, and therefore the action failed.

This action raised the question whether a workman, who was in receipt of weekly payments as compensation for an injury sustained during his employment, could claim that the payments must be continued until the issue whether he had recovered was decided, and that the money could not be paid into Court pending the decision.

The plaintiff, Mr. Joseph Catton, a pipe fitter, was injured on August 1, 1925, while in the employment of the defendants, Ashwell and Nesbit, Limited, engineers, who carried on business at Leicester. He was paid £1 10s. a week as compensation. By this action he claimed a declaration that the defendants, by stopping the weekly payments of compensation on June 24, 1927, otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement, or arbitration, had committed a breach of their statutory duty under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. He also claimed an injunction restraining the defendants from continuing the breach, and damages.

The plaintiff injured his heel by falling from a platform 3ft. high. The defendants admitted liability. In May, 1927, the plaintiff was examined by a doctor, who reported that he had recovered from the injury.

On June 24 the defendants filed an application in the Greenwich County Court, in pursuance of section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, for a review of the weekly payments which they were making to the plaintiff, asking that they should be terminated or diminished. On June 27 the Registrar gave notice that the application would be heard on October 14, 1927. The defendants thereupon paid into Court £24, the amount of the weekly payments up to October 14, 1927. That payment was made with a denial of liability, on the ground that the plaintiff, having entirely recovered, could no longer claim to be paid compensation up to the time when an award should be made in the county court, in view of the recent decision of the House of Lords in Ocean Coal Company, Limited v. Davies (43 The Times L.R., 108; [1927] A.C., 271).

The plaintiff pleaded that he had not recovered from his injury. He said that in Ocean Coal Company, Limited v. Davies (supra) the workman admitted that he had entirely recovered from his injury, but claimed, nevertheless, that under section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, now section 12 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, the payment of compensation could not be ended until the county court judge had made an award on the application to review.

Section 21 of the Act of 1925 provided that any question arising in any proceedings under that Act should be settled by an arbitrator or by a county court judge. Section 12 provided that an employer should not be entitled otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration to end or diminish a weekly payment except in certain cases, which did not apply here.

Sir Henry Slesser, K.C., and Mr. C. S. Rewcastle appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Edgar T. Dale and Mr. J. Alun Pugh for the defendants.

Sir Henry Slesser, in opening the plaintiff's case, said that the principle was well established that a right of action for damages for a breach of a statutory duty would lie where, as here, there existed no alternative remedy and the right attached to a particular class of persons, such as workmen. See Phillips v. Britannia Hygienic Laundry Company, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 530; [1923] 2 K.B., 832, at p. 837).

Before the Act of 1923 was passed if employers applied for a review of weekly payments, they could immediately and without waiting for the decision of the county court stop the payments, thereby leaving the workman for some weeks without compensation and without employment. To remedy that state of affairs, section 14 of the Act of 1923, now section 12 of the Consolidating Act of 1925, provided that the payments could not be so stopped, and could only be ended in the events therein set out. The defendants had attempted to evade section 12 by a payment into Court. The defendants relied upon section 21 of the Act of 1925, but, in fact, there had been no proceedings under that Act, as the weekly payments were made voluntarily without proceeding to arbitration. The plaintiff was not here asking for compensation. The House of Lords, in Ocean Coal Company, Limited v. Davies (supra), held that if a workman admitted that he had recovered he was not entitled to receive any further compensation from the time of that admission. Here the workman denied that he was no longer incapacitated.

Mr. Justice Clauson.—The only damages which you can recover, if any, are confined to the interest on the weekly payments which have been withheld. That is clear from the decision in Graham v. Campbell (7 Ch. D., 490), and that sum would be trivial, something like 27s.

Sir Henry Slesser.—That is so; but this is a question of principle whether it is lawful to do what has been done, and it is desired to know the position in law. If the workman here shows that he is receiving weekly payments, he can claim, under the provisions of section 12 of the Act of 1925, that they can only be ended in accordance with the manner provided by the section. The whole of my contention in this case is contained in what Lord Wrenbury said in the Ocean Coal Company case (supra), that section 12 "may be nothing more than an enactment that until the question whether his liability to pay is a continuing liability or not is decided he shall go on paying de facto, and that if it shall be decided that he was not under a continuing liability he shall be left entitled to recover. In my opinion, this is the effect of the section."

Mr. Justice Clauson.—You read section 12 as though the words were "during the period during which capacity to work has not been proved"?—Yes.

Sir Henry Slesser referred to Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company, Limited v. Dee ([1927] A.C., 299) which, he contended, did not touch the point as to the right de facto to the weekly payments. In the Ocean Coal Company case (supra) Viscount Dunedin, who dissented, held that though the workman had admitted that he was capable of working, still the terms of the section required that the employers must continue the weekly payments up to the time of the award by the county court judge.

Mr. DALE, for the defendants, said that this was an attempt to get the weekly payments by way of a dole, but that had been tried in the Ocean Coal Company case (supra), and had been disallowed. The defendants were entitled to stop the weekly payments and pay the money into Court on the authority of the decision in that case, as interpreted by the decision in Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company, Limited, v. Dee (supra).

SIR HENRY SLESSER replied.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON, in giving judgment, stated the facts, and said that the application to review the weekly payments which was made by the defendants on the footing that the plaintiff's incapacity in fact ceased on May 30, 1927, was still pending. On his view of section 21 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, it was clear that the only tribunal to determine the question of fact whether on May 30 the plaintiff was incapacitated was the county court. The plaintiff could not, and did not, say that the question of his incapacity on May 30 had been determined.

The question now for determination was the true construction of section 12 of the Act of 1925. The plaintiff contended that, although the issue whether there was continuing incapacity was sub judice, there was a duty on the defendants under section 12 to continue to make the weekly payments to him. The difficulty was that it had been determined by the House of Lords in Ocean Coal Company, Limited v. Davies (43 The Times L.R., 108; [1927] A.C., 271) that, from the date when incapacity was found to have ceased, there was no liability on the employers to pay the workman compensation under the Act. But the plaintiff contended that the employers must still continue payments pending the determination of the question of incapacity.

There appeared to be three constructions which could be put upon section 12. First, there was that which Lord Dunedin, who dissented from the decision of the majority in the Ocean Coal Company case (supra) placed on it—namely, that until it was determined whether the incapacity had ceased the employers must continue the weekly payments. On that construction the plaintiff would have been right, but that construction could not be upheld, as the majority of the House of Lords decided the other way. The second possible construction was that the employers were bound to continue the weekly payments until an award was made, provided that it was ultimately found, in fact, that the incapacity continued. There was at present no cause of action which the plaintiff could maintain in that Court, because, before he could prove a breach of statutory duty by the defendants, he must prove that incapacity during the relevant period existed. That issue that Court had no jurisdiction to try. The third possible construction was that the defendants were bound to pay the plaintiff the weekly sums, though they were to be made on the footing that, if the issue as to incapacity were decided against the plaintiff, he would have to return the money. Two of the Lords in the above case were for the second construction and two were for the third.

But there was a case recently decided by the House of Lords, Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company, Limited v. Dee ([1927] A.C., 299), which was an appeal from Scotch decisions. Their Lordships' decision in that case was inconsistent with any other construction of section 12 than what he (his Lordship) had called the second construction, which was founded on the opinions of Lord Atkinson and Lord Shaw in the Ocean Coal Company case (supra). Therefore he (his Lordship) on that construction held that it was not established that the defendants had committed any breach of statutory duty, as it had not been shown that the plaintiff's incapacity was a continuing incapacity since the defendants had ceased the weekly payments.

The plaintiff's claim for a declaration therefore failed, and the action must be dismissed, with costs. Section 115 of the County Courts Act, 1888, did not apply.

CAERPHILLY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. GRIFFIN.*

Electricity — Local authority — Monopoly in area — Exception — Supply by person not having primary business of supplying electricity — Application of the expression "primary business" to the particular facts — Electric Lighting Act, 1909 (9 Edw. VII., c. 34), s. 23.

The plaintiffs, a local authority empowered to supply electricity within a certain area, sought an injunction under s. 23 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1909, to restrain the defendant from supplying electricity to certain consumers in the area. By that section the plaintiffs had a monopoly in the area, subject to the proviso that "this section shall not prevent any company or person from affording a supply of electrical energy to any other company or person where the business of the company or person affording the supply is not primarily that of the supply of electrical energy to consumers."

Held, on the facts, that as the supply of electrical energy was not the defendant's primary business, the action failed.

This was an action by which the plaintiffs, the Caerphilly Urban District Council, sought an injunction to restrain the defendant, Mr. Victor George Griffin, from supplying electricity to certain consumers. The plaintiffs, as undertakers for the purposes of the Caerphilly Electricity Special Order, 1922, were authorized to supply electricity for all public and private purposes as defined by the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 to 1909, in the area of supply mentioned in the first Schedule to the Order. The defendant was the owner of the premises 75 and 77, Cardiff-road, Caerphilly, within the said area, where he formerly lived and carried on business as a draper.

On those premises the defendant erected an electric generating plant and used it to light his shop and residence. He then acquired a plot of land in Pentrebane-street, adjoining his old premises, and proceeded to develop it. He erected a number of buildings and a covered market, transferred his shop and residence from Cardiff-street to 1 and 3, Pentrebane-street, leased another shop to F. W. Woolworth and Co., Limited, and made an agreement to supply them with electric light. F. W. Woolworth and Co., Limited, had refused to become customers of the council. In the market the defendant erected 60 stalls which he let to tenants. The market, the stalls, his own premises, and Messrs. Woolworth's premises were lighted by electricity from new plant which the defendant erected on his new premises.

The plaintiffs alleged that in supplying electric current the defendant had infringed section 23 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1909, and they asked for an injunction to restrain him from supplying electricity within their area. The defendant contended that the section did not apply "where the business of the person affording the supply was not primarily that of the supply of electrical energy to consumers," and that his business was that of a draper.

Mr. Bennett, K.C., and Mr. R. W. Turnbull appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Gavin Simonds, K.C., and Mr. A. P. Vanneck for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Russell, in giving judgment, said that the case depended entirely on the application of section 23 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1909, to the particular facts. The section provided:—

"Where in any area a local authority, company, or person is authorized to supply electricity under Act of Parliament or under licence or Provisional Order granted under the Electric Lighting Acts it shall not, after the passing of this Act, be lawful for any other local authority, company, or person to commence to supply or distribute electricity within the same area unless such supply or distribution is authorized by Act of Parliament, or by licence or Provisional Order granted in terms of the Electric Lighting Acts: Provided that this section shall not prevent any company or person from affording a supply of electrical energy to any other company or person where the business of the company or person affording the supply is not primarily that of the supply of electrical energy to consumers. . . ."

The question was whether on the facts of the case the defendant came within the proviso. There was no authority on the point. In Southport Corporation v. Attorney-General (40 The Times L.R., 736; [1924] A.C., 909) the proviso was not considered. When that case was in the Court of Appeal (39 The Times L.R., 347; [1923] 1 Ch., 548, at p. 563) Lord Justice Warrington said that the provision seemed to recognize the right of companies or persons to supply electricity for their own use, and even to supply it to others in the circumstances there mentioned. The plaintiffs in this case asked, by their statement of claim, that the defendant should be restrained from generating electricity for the purpose of lighting his own shop and residence, but their counsel, while making no admission, had now withdrawn that claim. It would be startling if, as the result of a local authority being authorized to supply electricity within a particular area, a private individual could not install a plant to light his own house. The plaintiffs now asked for an injunction to restrain the defendant from supplying electrical energy to Messrs. Woolworth and to the market and the stalls.

Section 23 was a monopoly section and had, therefore, to be construed strictly. Was the business of the defendant primarily that of the supply of electrical energy to consumers? In his (his Lordship's) opinion, on the facts of the case, it was not. The defendant primarily had two businesses, his draper's business and the business of developing his property. In the course of those businesses the defendant provided plant to light his shop and residence, and he afforded the supply of electrical energy to Messrs. Woolworth and the market to attract tenants and develop his property. The supply of energy was only incidental to the defendant's two businesses and was not his primary business. On the facts of the case the action failed, and must be dismissed.

K.B. Div. (MacKinnon, J.) 1927. Dec. 5.

GOOLE AND HULL STEAM TOWING COMPANY, LIMITED v. OCEAN MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Marine)—Particular average damage—Ship in collision—Both to blame—Amount recoverable from insurers.

The defendants insured the plaintiffs' steamer against the usual marine risks, the steamer being valued in the policy at £4,000. During the currency of the policy the steamer collided with another steamer. The ship was repaired at the cost of the plaintiffs, and a collision action by the plaintiffs against the owners of the other steamer was settled on the basis of both ships being to blame. The owners of the other steamer then paid over to the plaintiffs £2,500 as being half the damages, and for the purpose of the argument of the present case the amount of the damages was assumed to be £5,000.

The plaintiffs brought this action against their marine insurers to recover whatever amount the Court might hold to be due to them under the policy, and the plaintiffs contended that as the balance of their loss was £2,500 they were entitled to recover this amount, it being less than the value of £4,000 put on the steamer in the policy. The defendants contended that they were liable only for £1,500, being the difference between £4,000 and £2,500, the amount recovered by the plaintiffs from the owners of the other ship.

Held, that the contention of the defendants was correct.

The plaintiffs in this case, the Goole and Hull Steam Towing Company, Limited, claimed from the defendants, the Ocean Marine Insurance Company, Limited, under a policy of marine insurance.

Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. A. T. Miller, K.C., and Mr. Mitchison for the defendants.

There were no pleadings in the case, no evidence was called, and the case was argued on an agreed statement of facts.

The material parts of the agreed statement of facts were as follows:—

By a policy dated June 5, 1924, the defendants insured the plaintiffs, the owners of the s.s. Goole, for 12 months from May 31, 1924, to May 31, 1925, against the usual marine risks, subject to the Institute Time Clauses annexed to the policy. In the policy the steamer was valued at a total of £4,000—being £2,500 as to hull and materials and £1,500 as to engines and machinery.

During the currency of the policy the Goole, having loaded a cargo of salt, went on a voyage on January 21, 1925, from Middlesbrough to London, and while proceeding up the River Thames came into collision with another steamer, the Delphinus, near King George's Dock pierhead. The Goole received considerable damage and had to be beached on the mud at the lower end of Woolwich Arsenal.

The Salvage Association, acting for the defendants, were advised of the accident by the plaintiffs' brokers, but they had already instructed Captain Shotton to attend and arranged for Messrs. Fletchers to proceed to the Goole and take pumps, &c., and this arrangement was made on the time and lime basis. Later the owners' superintendent arrived in London and his approval was obtained for this course.

On January 24, 1925, the Goole was towed off and proceeded under her own steam into Fletcher's Dry Dock.

On January 23, 1925, an action was commenced in the High Court against the owners of the Delphinus, and they were notified of the survey which was then taking place on the Goole. The owners of the Goole were represented by their superintendent, Mr. Glentworth, and the Delphinus was represented by Messrs. Camps. The underwriters of the Goole were represented by Messrs. Joseph Blackett and Sons, and Lloyd's Register surveyors were also in attendance. Messrs. Fletchers proceeded with the work on the time and lime basis as agreed.

When the work had been in progress for some time it was found that the condenser bed plate was broken; it was condemned and a new one was supplied. The repairs were eventually completed on April 1, 1925, and the cost of same was agreed at £4,285, and with salvage and other expenses in connexion with the accident brought the total up to more than £5,000.

The owners of the Delphinus put forward a counterclaim, and on April 28, 1925, the solicitors acting for the owners of the Goole reported on the collision case by letter addressed to the owners and underwriters, and their report was submitted to underwriters, who approved the proceedings but desired to be kept fully advised; on the advice of counsel, however, the case was settled in Court on the basis of both ships being equally to blame.

The claims of each steamer were dealt with by the Registrar. The owners of the Delphinus contended on the reference that the damage to the condenser was not caused by the collision, and alternatively that the vessel was in fact a constructive total loss and should not have been repaired. Both these contentions were disallowed by the Registrar and he assessed the damages against the Delphinus at the sum of £5,994 17s. 3d., which, however, included crew's effects, detention, and loss of cargo and freight. Having regard, however, to the fact of both vessels being to blame, only half of the damages so assessed was recoverable from the Delphinus.

In December, 1925, the solicitors acting for the Delphinus paid over the amount due from them, and the owners of the Goole thereupon handed to Messrs. Manley, Hopkins, Son, and Cookes, average adjusters, the whole of the documents in order that they might ascertain the owners' loss and then show the claim against the various underwriters concerned.

The principle adopted by the average adjusters was as follows:—In the first place they proceeded to allocate the expenditures to the various interests and to distinguish between items which were general average and items which were particular average. They took the accounts as allowed by the Registrar and apportioned them in the same way. Then, by taking 50 per cent. of the amounts thus shown in each column, they arrived at the amount paid by the Delphinus. The total expenditure allocated to the various interests was then brought forward and each column was credited with its proportion of the recovery from the owners of the Delphinus after deducting its proportion of the costs, thereby arriving at the loss sustained by the owners. Having done that, the average adjusters then applied that loss to the policies, and as the net loss as ascertained was less than the insured value of £4,000, they charged the underwriters with the general and particular average.

The owners claimed from the underwriters their loss after deducting the amount recovered from the owners of the Delphinus, and, that sum being less than the £4,000 value of the Goole as stated in the policy, they contended that they were entitled to be indemnified to the full amount of their loss—i.e., the loss incurred through the faulty navigation of their own captain, that caused by the Delphinus having been paid by that vessel.

The defendants contended that that method of adjustment was incorrect, and that, as their limit of liability as stated in the policy was £4,000, the adjusters should take the gross figures without deduction of the recovery from the Delphinus and then state the claim against the underwriters, limiting it to £4,000 and charging the balance to the owners. After that had been done the amount recovered should, they contended, be credited up to £4,000 to the underwriters.

The question for the opinion of the Court was the correct way of adjusting the claim.

Mr. Raeburn submitted that the right method by which to ascertain the sum to be paid by the underwriters was to find the total amount by which the owners were out of pocket, say £5,000, and deduct from that sum the amount recovered from the other ship, £2,500, and then let the owners recover from the underwriters the balance of their loss—namely, £2,500—which they could claim because it did not exceed the £4,000 insured. The underwriters contended that, as the Goole was only insured for £4,000 and the owners had recovered £2,500 from the other ship, the underwriters were only liable for the difference between those two sums—namely, £1,500. Another view was that the £2,500 recovered from the Delphinus should be apportioned as to one-fifth to the owners and four-fifths to the underwriters, that being the proportion between the insured value, £4,000, and the cost of repairs, £5,000. That method would apportion £2,000 to the underwriters and leave them liable to the insured for the remaining £2,000. The action was a friendly action, and was brought to obtain the guidance of the Court, for there appeared to be no direct authority on the matter.

He referred to Oppenheim v. Fry (3 B. and S., 873; 5 B. and S., 348); North of England, &c., Association v. Armstrong (L.R., 5 Q.B., 244); *Burnand v. 511) ; and to Arnould on Marine Insurance, sections 1,225 and 1,226, and to the Marine Insurance Act, 1906.

Mr. MILLER submitted that the underwriters need only pay so much as was needed to make up, with the amount recovered from the other ship, the total of £4,000 for which the Goole was insured. The plaintiffs' contention was, in effect, that, having insured for £4,000, they were entitled to be indemnified as if they had insured for £5,000 and had paid the higher premiums for that amount. The converse of this case was seen in The Commonwealth (supra, at pp. 217-8). The value of the vessel having been agreed, the underwriters, if they paid the insured that value, were entitled to be subrogated in respect of all the insured's interest to the extent of the indemnity given.

He referred to Halsbury, Laws of England, Vol. XVII., p. 540. Where an underwriter had paid the full amount of the agreed value, anything which the insured might recover from third parties must go in reduction of the loss of the underwriter.

Mr. RAEBURN replied. For the purposes of partial loss it did not matter whether the policy was a valued policy or not, and in case of a partial loss there was no reason why the insured should not say that the actual loss which he had sustained was more than the sum insured.

MR. JUSTICE MACKINNON, in giving judgment, stated the facts, and said that the logical course would be to see what the parties had agreed by the policy, but the time had long passed when one could construe a policy of marine insurance otherwise than in the light of decided cases, the results of which had been crystallized in the Marine Insurance Act, 1906. The insured vessel had suffered particular average damage, and by section 69 (1) of the Act the assured were entitled to the reasonable cost of the repairs, not exceeding the sum insured—namely, £4,000. The repairs, in fact, cost more than that sum. Taking hypothetical figures which had been accepted for convenience of argument, the repairs cost £5,000. That being so, the assured could only have recovered £4,000 from the underwriters and would have to bear the balance themselves as expenditure incurred by them outside their insurance. But in the events which happened the assured recovered £2,500 from the other ship, and the question was, What was the effect of their receipt of that £2,500 on their claim under their £4,000 insurance ? For how much must the assured give credit to the underwriters on the ground that they had been indemnified aliunde ?

The assured contended that, as they had spent £5,000 and had received £2,500, they were £2,500 out of pocket ; and that, as that sum was less than £4,000, the amount for which they were insured, they were entitled to be paid the £2,500 in full. The underwriters contended that, as they were liable for £4,000 and no more, and the assured had already received £2,500, they were only liable for the difference—namely, £1,500. They said that the extra £1,000 which the assured had spent was outside the insurance altogether.

There was also a third course suggested—that the £2,500 should be divided on an apportionment basis. He could not see any legal ground for that third view, and he would not, therefore, discuss it.

In his opinion, the contention of the underwriters was right. The contract of marine insurance was said to be a contract of indemnity, though it was not an ideal indemnity, but only an indemnity in accordance with the conventional terms of the bargain. It might happen that an assured could recover more than, or less than, his actual loss ; and by section 79 (2) the insurer who had paid for a partial loss was subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the assured. The words of that subsection were "indemnified according to this Act," not "indemnified" generally, and for the £4,000 here paid the underwriters were entitled to be subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the plaintiffs. In the case of a total loss their right would have been clear from North of England, &c., Association v. Armstrong (L.R., 5 Q.B., 244) and Thames and Mersey Insurance Company v. British and Chilian Steamship Company (31 The Times L.R., 275 ; [1915] 2 K.B., 214), and he could not see any difference in principle between the case of a total loss and a partial loss. If the assured in this case had recovered the whole £5,000 from the owners of the other ship, the underwriters would only have been able to claim £4,000 under their right of subrogation. They were here only liable for the balance of the £4,000 after the £2,500 recovered had been taken into account.

There must, therefore, be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. METROPOLITAN WATER BOARD.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Water authority—Interest on stock and debentures—Deduction and retention of tax—Whether interest paid out of profits not brought into charge—Liability to account for tax—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), All Schedules Rules, Rules 19, 21.

The profits of the Metropolitan Water Board are assessable under Schedule A, No. III., Rule 3, of the Income Tax Act, 1918, by reference to the profits of the year preceding the year of assessment. The accounts of the Board for the year ending March 31, 1922, showed a loss, and therefore no assessment was made on the Board under Schedule A, No. III., for the year ending April 5, 1923. The accounts for the year ending March 31, 1923, showed a profit of over two millions, out of which the Board paid over one million interest on water stock and debentures, deducting and retaining the income-tax thereon. On an information claiming that under Rule 21 of the All Schedules Rules the Board was liable to account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the amount of the tax so deducted, the Board contended that the interest paid for the year 1922-23 was payable out of profits brought into charge for 1922-23 within Rule 19 of the All Schedules Rules and was in fact paid out of the profits for 1922-23, and that, although the income-tax for 1922-23 was to be measured by the profits of the preceding year, the profits for 1922-23 were profits "brought into charge," and Rule 21 did not apply.

* Reported by G. T. WHITFIELD-HAYES and H. LANGFORD LEWIS, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

Held, that as the Board had been assessed at zero under Schedule A for 1922-23, the interest had not been paid out of profits brought into charge, and the Crown was entitled to succeed.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 656), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 656).

The Attorney-General, by an information, claimed £409,060 2s. 11d. from the Metropolitan Water Board, being the amount of tax on interest paid on water stock and on other annual payments made in the year ending April 5, 1923. The amount of the payments was £1,668,351, and the sum claimed represented income-tax at the rate of 5s. in the pound, the rate in force at the time when the interest was paid, less £8,027 odd, tax on profits and gains otherwise brought into charge.

By Rule 3 of No. III. of the Rules applicable to Schedule A of the Income Tax Act, 1918, it is provided that "In the case of . . . waterworks . . . the annual value shall be understood to be the profits of the preceding year."

For the year ending March 31, 1922, the Metropolitan Water Board made a loss of £57,366, and, therefore, by reason of the above Rule, no assessment was made upon the Board for the year ending April 5, 1923. For the year to March 31, 1923, the Board, owing to the coming into force on April 1, 1922, of the Metropolitan Water Board (Charges) Act, 1921, made a profit of £2,481,085, out of which the interest payable by the Board on water stock issued by them or on redeemable debentures in respect of which they had assumed liability and certain other annual payments due from them amounted to £1,730,751 16s. 10d. Part of that sum was paid without deduction of income-tax, but from the remainder—£1,668,351—£435,617 3s. was deducted and retained as representing the tax thereon at the rate or rates in force during the period through which the interest and other annual payments of which the sum of £1,668,351 0s. 7d. was composed was accruing due. Income-tax on £1,668,351 0s. 7d., at the rate of 5s. in the pound, being the rate in force during the year ending April 5, 1923, amounted to £417,087 15s. 2d. That figure made the basis of an assessment upon the Board for the year ending April 5, 1924.

Rule 21 of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, enacts :—

"(1) Upon payment of any interest of money, annuity, or other annual payment charged with tax under Schedule D . . . not payable or not wholly payable out of profits or gains brought into charge, the person by or through whom any such payment is made shall deduct thereout a sum representing the amount of the tax thereon at the rate of tax in force at the time of the payment.

"(2) Any such person shall forthwith render an account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue of the amount so deducted . . . and every such amount shall be a debt from him to the Crown. . . ."

The Attorney-General, by this information, claimed :—

Tax at the rate of 5s. in the £ in respect of interest and annual payments	£417,087	15 2
Less tax on taxed income, £32,110 9s. 0d.	£8,027	12 3
	£409,060	2 11

The Board contended that the interest on the water stock and on the redeemable debentures and the annual payments referred to paid by the Board for the year 1922-23 were payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax within Rule 19 of the All Schedules Rules ; that the profits or gains of the Board brought into charge to tax for the year 1922-23 were the profits of the Board of that year (namely, the said £2,481,085), though the liability to income-tax for that year was to be measured by the amount of the profits of the preceding year, and that was so whether there were profits of the preceding year or not ; that the profits or gains of the Board brought into charge to tax for the year 1922-23 were sufficient in amount to meet the interest and annual payments payable for that year, and the interest was in fact paid and the annual payments were in fact made out of those profits or gains ; that the fact that no assessment was or could be made on the Board for the year 1922-23 was irrelevant ; that the Board was entitled, under Rule 19 of the Rules, to retain for itself the income-tax deducted on payment of the interest and annual payments ; and that Rule 21 of the Rules had no application to this case.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt gave judgment for the Crown.

The Board appealed.

Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. Latter, K.C., Mr. Cyril King, and Mr. F Grant appeared for the appellants ; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

The Master of the Rolls.—The Metropolitan Water Board appeal from a judgment given by Mr. Justice Rowlatt on June 16, 1927, in favour of the Crown upon this information. It was brought to recover from the appellants a sum of £409,060 2s. 11d., which was the balance in their hands after adjustment, in respect of sums deducted by them at the rate of 5s. in the pound from a total of £1,668,351 0s. 7d., distributed by them by way of interest on stocks of the appellants in the year of assessment 1922-23. No question arises upon the figures. The question is one of principle—whether the appellants can rightly claim to hold this sum of £409,060 2s. 11d. against the claim made to it by the Crown. The facts are fully set out in the statement of facts. It is only necessary to recapitulate some of them for the purpose of this judgment.

For the purpose of the income-tax the undertaking of the appellants falls to be assessed as "waterworks," that is to say : "(7) The profits of the Board are assessable under Schedule A in accordance with Schedule A, No. III., Rule 3, Income Tax Act, 1918, by reference to the profits of the year preceding the year of assessment. For the year to March 31, 1923, the Board's accounts relating to the said undertaking showed (after adjustment for income-tax purposes) a profit of £2,481,085, out of which the Board paid the interest referred to in paragraph 6 hereof." I am reading the statement of facts. "This figure formed the basis for an assessment under Schedule A, No. III., made upon the Board for the year ending April 5, 1924, against the amount of which assessment an allowance (including sums carried forward from previous years) in respect of wear and tear of plant and machinery fell to be made to the amount of £798,328, leaving a net figure of £1,682,757 for that year. The accounts relating to the undertaking of the Board for the year to March 31, 1922, disclosed (after adjustment for income-tax purposes) a loss of £57,366 3s. 2d., and therefore no assessment was due to be made or was made upon the Board under Schedule A, No. III., for the year ending April 5, 1923. (10) The Attorney-General contends that for the year ending April 5, 1923, the Board is liable to account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under Rule 21 of the General Rules applicable to all Schedules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the sum of £409,060 2s. 11d. (11) The Board contends : (a) That the interest on the water stock and on the redeemable debentures and the annual payments referred to paid by the Board for the year 1922-23 were payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax within Rule 19 of the said Rules. (b) That the profits or gains of the Board brought into charge to tax for the year 1922-23 were the profits of the Board of that year (namely, the said £2,481,085), though the liability to income-tax for that year was to be measured by the amount of the profits of the preceding year, and this was so whether there were profits of the preceding year or not. (c) That the said profits or gains of the Board brought into charge to tax for the year 1922-23 were sufficient in amount to meet the said interest and annual payments payable for that year and the said interest was in fact paid and the said annual payments were in fact made out of these profits or gains. (d) That the fact that no assessment was or could be made on the Board for the year 1922-23 is irrelevant."

The point, therefore, to be determined is whether the sum claimed is included within the words "payable out of profits or gains brought into charge" in Rule 19 so as to justify its retention by the appellants. Are these words to be interpreted as meaning "profits or gains that have in fact actually been brought into charge," or do they mean "profits and gains that are subject to charge and will in due course become factors in the assessment of the liability of the appellants to tax" ?

By reason of the trading in the previous year 1921-22 resulting in a loss, the appellants pay no income-tax for 1922-23, for the assessment upon them works out at nil ; yet they claim that the substantial profits of £2,481,085 for the year 1923, out of which the interest referred to was in fact paid, are to be treated as brought into charge for this same year, and so form the fund contemplated in Rule 19 as the source out of which the interest of £1,668,351 0s. 7d. was paid, and £409,060 2s. 11d., part of the latter sum, was retained by the appellants.

Rules 19 and 21 do not contain new matter. They reproduce section 102 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, section 40 of the Act of 1853, together with section 24 (3) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888. We have to construe the Rules which have the force of the statute in which they are found, regardless of the curiosities in taxation which ingeniously may be suggested to arise as the result of a particular rendering of the statute. I respectfully agree with what Lord Sumner said in Watney, Combe, Reid and Co., Limited v. Berners (30 The Times L.R., 577 ; [1914] 3 K.B., 288, at p. 297) : "We are not entitled to make any assumptions about the policy of the sections, but have simply to construe them."

This sum of £409,060 2s. 11d. has been stopped in the appellants' hands because they were required to be tax collectors for the Crown—to use Lord Loreburn's phrase in Attorney-General v. London County Council (23 The Times L.R., 390; [1907] A.C., at p. 133). It is an obligation that has been imposed upon those who make payments of any interest of money or annuities charged with income-tax under Schedule D since section 24 (3) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act was passed in 1888. That section embraces what is now split up into Rules 19 and 21. Its terms make it plain that the person who is told to deduct the income-tax chargeable upon the payee to whom the interest of money is paid in certain events must render an account of the amount so deducted. If the whole of the interest has not been paid out of profits or gains brought into charge, then the account must be of the whole amount deducted. If part only of the interest has not been paid out of profits or gains brought into charge, then the account must cover that part. The section makes it clear that the collector for the Crown will have to pass on the sum collected, either by the means of his profits and gains brought into charge, or by rendering an account of the sum deducted which will not be subjected to charge in the collector's hands.

Looking at the Rules in the Consolidating Act of 1918, there is in my judgment good ground for the Attorney-General's argument that in Rule 19 the words "payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax" do not mean payment out of a fund that may be brought into charge, or is, or will be, a factor for the purpose of charge, but refer to a fund brought into charge out of which tax is payable and to be paid ; so that in an account between the Crown, the appellants, as tax collectors for the Crown, and the stock holders it would be clearly seen that the sum deducted from the payments to the stock holders was passed on to and reached the Crown. The appellants pay income-tax. But their assessment is measured by annual value, and that annual value is "understood to be the profits of the preceding year." See Schedule A, No. III., 3. That was in fact nil for the year preceding 1922-3. True, income-tax, charged under the respective Schedules, is the same tax. But the appellants have to justify the retention by them of this sum collected for the Crown by deduction. That can be done where the yearly interest of money is payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax. The appellants cannot alter their assessment to this tax which stands for this same year at nil, and for the purpose of the Rule rely on a charge which does not exist for this year. No tax for this year, 1922-3, has been paid by the appellants to the Crown. This reading of the Rule is, in my judgment, confirmed by the passage in the speech of Viscount Haldane in Sugden v. Leeds Corporation (29 The Times L.R., 402 ; [1914] A.C., at p. 491) : "In each case the question is whether the annual payments taxed are actually and properly payable out of the profits. If they are, these profits are treated by the Acts as diminished pro tanto in the hands of the owner, and he, having paid once for all on the whole, is thus entitled to retain for his own benefit the amount of tax he deducts from the annual payments before making them, as being tax that he has already paid." See also per Lord Mersey ([1914] A.C., at p. 509). Upon this principle it is no answer to the Crown to say that the profits of this year will in the next year "be understood to be" the annual value on which we will pay tax.

The case of London County Council v. Attorney-General (17 The Times L.R., 131 ; [1901] A.C., 26) has a close application to the present case. Lord Macnaghten's observations (at [1901] A.C., at p. 40) are in point. Dealing with the Act of 1888, which left the deduction of income-tax no longer optional, he said : "He is bound to make the deduction, and bound to pay over to the Crown the amount deducted unless the payment comes out of income which has already paid the duty." I do not think that he intends to lay emphasis on the word "paid," for it may well be that chronologically the tax is deducted from a yearly payment, or half-yearly payment, when the tax charged upon the person who deducts would not fall to be actually paid till a few months later; "which has already paid the duty" may be treated as equivalent to brought into charge for the payment of duty upon it. Lord Davey's words are to the same effect. Inter alia, on page 46 he says: "But the mortgagor cannot, of course, retain against the Crown more income-tax than he has paid."

Both Lords Macnaghten and Davey intended that the right to retain was co-extensive only with the liability to tax of the fund out of which the interest is paid.

For these reasons I think that the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt was right. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Sargant.—The sum involved in this appeal is a large one. But the facts on which our decision depends are extremely simple, since we have not to deal with any question of precise figures, but only to decide a point of general principle.

Under the Act by which the appellants, the Metropolitan Water Board, were established—namely, the Metropolis Water Act, 1902—provision was made for the establishment of a water fund to which all receipts of the Board have to be carried and out of which all payments by the Board have to be made. The Board had power to borrow money and to create and issue water stock the principal and interest whereof are charged upon the water fund and on the revenues of the Board. By virtue of the issue of such water stock, and also by virtue of the assumption by the Board of liability under debentures issued by water companies whose undertakings had been acquired by the Board, there became charged upon and payable out of the water fund large annual sums, which in the year ending April 5, 1923, amounted to some £1,730,000. Much the greater portion of these sums amounting to over £1,668,000 was paid by the Board, after deducting therefrom income-tax, which at the then rate of 5s. in the £ amounted to over £417,000. But as against this sum there has to be set off a sum of over £8,000 in respect of income which the Board received after the deduction of income-tax. And ultimately the net amount of income-tax deducted by the Board, in respect of the balance of the payments made by the Board, less income-tax, over the payments received by the Board less income-tax, has been agreed in these proceedings at the sum of £409,060 2s. 11d.

The accounts relating to the undertaking of the Board for the year ending March 31, 1922, disclosed (after adjustment for income-tax purposes) a loss of over £57,000; and therefore under the rules relating to the assessment of waterworks no assessment was due to be made or was made upon the Board under Schedule A, No. III., for the year ending April 5, 1923. The large profit made by the Board in that year was due to the Board's having been empowered under the Metropolitan Water Board (Charges) Act, 1921, to raise their charges to the public.

The question to be determined in these proceedings is whether the Board are entitled to retain the above-mentioned sum of £409,060 2s. 11d. for their own benefit, or are bound to account for it and pay it to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. The solution of this problem depends almost entirely upon the meaning of the phrase "brought into charge" in Rule 19 of the General Rules applicable to the Schedules of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The Crown contends that in the year in question, though profits and gains had in fact been made and would no doubt in ordinary course be "brought into charge" in the succeeding year, no profits and gains at all were brought into charge in the year in question, since for purposes of assessment they were based on the previous year and were assessed at nil. The Board contend that the phrase profits and gains "brought into charge" means profits and gains of a kind which is liable to be brought into charge, and accordingly that the actual profits and gains in the year of assessment are those to be considered for the purposes of deduction, since they will in their turn be brought into charge in the following year.

It is curious that the precise point has never been decided, but this is probably due to the fact that in ordinary cases, where there is but little variation in the profits and gains in two succeeding years, it is of comparatively little importance which standard is adopted. And it may be that the practice of different surveyors of taxes has not been uniform. In the case of Sugden v. Leeds Corporation (29 The Times L.R., 402; [1914] A.C., 483) it appears that the figure taken for the purpose of deduction was that derived from the assessable figures based on previous years. In Rex v. Special Commissioners of Income Tax—Ex parte Shaftesbury Homes and Arethusa Training Ship (38 The Times L.R., 860; [1922] 2 K.B., 729, and 39 The Times L.R., 99; [1923] 1 K.B., 393) it would seem from an examination of the affidavit of the secretary, Mr. Coupland, that for a year or two the figure taken was that of the actual profits or gains in the year of assessment, but that subsequently the figure taken was that of the assessment based on previous years. In the result little, if any, assistance is to be derived from previous practice. The question has to be decided as a fresh question and on the words of the statute.

In my opinion the words "brought into charge" are more naturally and properly satisfied by the meaning placed on them by the Crown. The past participle "brought" naturally refers to something that has been completed in the year in question, if not by actual payment, at any rate by accrued liability to pay. It is only in a looser sense that it can be applied to a payment or liability to pay in respect of a succeeding year. And this latter construction would involve the anomaly that, if the undertaking ceased at the end of the year of assessment, a deduction would be allowed to the Board for which they would never have to account at all.

Further, I think that the Attorney-General was right in his submission that, when once you have ascertained under the Income Tax Act, 1918, the annual value of the undertaking of the Board for the year 1922-23, you must use the basis of that value for the other purposes of income-tax for that year. The Board here are claiming, on the one hand, to escape any direct assessment of tax on the undertaking on the ground that their profits are to be taken as nil for the year 1922-23, and, on the other hand, to escape the obligation to hand over the income-tax, deducted from the holders of water stock, on the ground that profits were brought into charge for that year to an extent exceeding the amount of the interest on the water stock. This involves using one basis of ascertainment for one purpose and another basis for another purpose, and seems to me to involve an inconsistency. This inconsistency is not cured, though in many cases its results may be minimized, by the consideration that there may be compensating inconsistencies in other years which may ultimately prevent any considerable loss on balance to the Revenue.

The case of London County Council v. Attorney-General (17 The Times L.R., 131; [1901] A.C., 26)

tends strongly in the same direction. It is not conclusive against the Board here, because the actual decision was that the income-tax paid under any of the various statutory Schedules was essentially a single tax, and that, in calculating the amount of the deductions in respect of dividends on their stocks, which the London County Council were entitled to retain for their own benefit, the London County Council could take into account any income-tax paid either under Schedule A or under Schedule D. But it is impossible to read the judgments in that case, and particularly those of Lord Macnaghten and Lord Davey (see particularly [1901] A.C., at pp. 39, 40, 42 and 45-6), without observing that attention is throughout directed to the actual sums paid in or for the year of assessment whether under Schedule A or under Schedule D. No doubt there are certain slight differences between the Income Tax Act then in force and the present Act, and the earlier Act is somewhat clearer on the point than the present. But this fact does not aid the appellants, and indeed may be slightly against them. For the differences between the two Acts are in respect of arrangement only and not of substance, and it cannot be seriously suggested that the present Act was intended to make any alteration of the earlier Act with regard to the substance of the matter now in question.

Finally, the attitude adopted by the Board is, in my judgment, inconsistent with the view of the legislation so clearly recognized in London County Council v. Attorney-General (supra) that in making compulsory deductions from the dividends due to their stockholders and handing these deductions to the Crown the taxpayer is acting merely as a tax collector for the Crown. If that is so, it is strange that his obligation to pay what he has collected should be cancelled to any extent exceeding his actual payment of income-tax (including an accrued obligation to pay) for the same period. A statutory set-off would naturally be of like against like, not of a deduction or accrued right to deduct against an expectation merely of an obligation to pay income-tax in a future period.

In my opinion, therefore, the learned Judge was quite right, and the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—The validity of the claim of the appellants to retain against the Crown the sum which they have deducted in respect of income-tax from the interest paid by them to their stockholders during the year of assessment 1922-23 depends upon whether they are right in their contention that the expression "profits or gains brought into charge to tax" in Rule 19 of the All Schedules Rules in the Income Tax Act, 1918, means the profits or gains actually earned in the year of assessment, and not, as the Crown maintains, the profits or gains in respect of which income-tax for that year has been assessed and charged on the appellants by virtue of the Act.

In order to determine what is the true meaning of the expression "profits or gains brought into charge to tax" in Rule 19, it is necessary to refer shortly to the relevant provisions of the Act. Section 1 of the Act provides (so far as material for the purposes of this case) that income-tax shall be charged in respect of all property described or comprised in Schedule A in accordance with the Rules applicable to that Schedule. Schedule A provides that tax under that Schedule shall be charged in respect of the property in all lands, tenements, hereditaments and heritages in the United Kingdom for every twenty shillings of the annual value thereof. Part No. III. of the Rules applicable to Schedule A provides (inter alia), by Rule 3, that in case of waterworks the annual value shall be understood to be the profits of the preceding year, and, by Rule 4, that tax under the preceding Rule shall be assessed and charged on the body of persons carrying on the concern. The effect of these provisions as applied to the facts of the present case is that income-tax for the year 1922-23 is assessed and charged on the appellants in respect of the annual value of their undertaking in that year, and that the factor for ascertaining that annual value is the profits made by the appellants in 1921-22. In other words, the practical result is that the taxable income of the appellants for the year 1922-23 is the income of the appellants for the year 1921-22. This is plain and not disputed : it is the basis on which the appellants have returned their taxable income for the year 1922-23 at nil.

Rules 19 and 21 are mere machinery for facilitating the collection by the Crown of the income-tax imposed by the Act, and it would be a singular thing to find that in such Rules there had been introduced for the first time, and without any explanation, a reference to profits or gains calculated on a basis entirely different from the basis laid down in the earlier provisions of the Act and Rules ; moreover, without any provision enabling the Crown to demand a return of or otherwise ascertain such profits or gains. In the circumstances I should have thought that it was not really open to doubt that the qualifying words "brought into charge to tax" in the expression "profits or gains brought into charge to tax" in Rule 19 were inserted expressly to denote that the profits or gains there referred to were the profits or gains in respect of which a charge to income-tax had been imposed on the appellants by virtue of the Act—that is to say, the taxable income and not the actual income. Sir John Simon, however, strenuously contended that so to construe the expression was to confuse the subject matter of the operation of assessment with the result of the operation of assessment, and that the real subject matter of assessment was the actual income earned in the year of assessment, although that income had to be computed for the purpose of the charge to tax by reference to the income of the preceding year. In my judgment this contention is not well founded. Regard being had to the scheme of the Act and Rules, and particularly to the provisions to which I have referred, the words "brought into charge to tax" would be wholly inept as applied to the profits actually earned by the appellants during the year of assessment. Such profits form no factor in ascertaining the taxable income for the year of assessment, and the Act imposes no charge to tax on the appellants in respect of them ; they do not constitute the annual value of the appellants' works within the meaning of the Act, and are in no way "brought into charge" under any of the provisions of that Act.

Sir John Simon placed considerable reliance upon the introductory words of Rule 19 : "Where any yearly interest of money, annuity, or any other annual payment . . . . is payable wholly out of." His contention was that this phrase necessarily carried with it the implication that the profits or gains brought into charge which immediately follow were the actual profits or gains earned in the year of assessment, as no annual payments could properly be said to be payable out of income computed on an artificial basis. The phrase so relied upon is perhaps not very happily worded, but in my judgment its meaning is plain. It is used for the purpose of defining the character of the annual payments to which Rule 19 is applicable, and not for the purpose of denoting the moneys out of which the annual payments will in fact be made. The words "payable out of" are there used as equivalent to "properly chargeable against." The meaning and effect of the Rule is that, in order to come within its scope, the annual payments must be of such a character that they can properly be charged against the taxable income—e.g., if the taxable income consists of the profits of a business, the annual payment must be one that is charged upon the profits of that business, and not a payment unconnected with it. That this is the correct reading of the Rule is, I think, borne out by the remarks of Lord Watson and of Lord Herschell in Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Styles (8 The Times L.R., 618; [1892] A.C., at pp. 320 and 324), and of Lord Davey in London County Council v. Attorney-General (17 The Times L.R., 131; [1901] A.C., at p. 46). In the latter case Lord Davey, after stating that it is not necessary that the interest or annual payment should be exclusively charged upon or payable out of profits or gains brought into charge, proceeds in these words: "It is enough if the interest is charged upon or payable out of taxable income, though there may be other subjects of charge," which words in my opinion show that Lord Davey read the phrase relied upon by Sir John Simon in the sense in which I have endeavoured to explain that it ought to be construed.

Some stress was laid by counsel for the appellants on the fact that the actual profits for the year 1922-23 would form the basis of taxation for the following year 1923-24, as showing that in this and all similar cases matters will ultimately be adjusted, and that therefore no weight ought to be attributed to the argument of the Crown that on the appellants' construction of Rule 19 the appellants would, in the events which have happened, become tax collectors for their own benefit. The plain answer to this, however, is that income-tax is a tax for a year, and that it is immaterial to consider what may or may not happen in the year or years following the year of assessment. The words "brought into charge" cannot properly be held to refer to profits which are only liable to be brought into charge in the future, and in my opinion they mean profits brought into charge in the year of assessment.

In the result I have arrived at the conclusion that the expression "profits or gains brought into charge to tax" in Rule 19 means the taxable and not the actual profits or gains in the year of assessment. It follows that under the provisions of Rules 19 and 21 no taxpayer can retain against the Crown any more income-tax deducted by him in any year of assessment than he has himself paid or become liable to pay to the Crown for that year. This construction, besides giving proper effect to the particular language of the Rules in question, seems to me entirely to accord with the intention of the Legislature as appearing from the Act and Rules as a whole. It avoids the incongruity which would result from the construction contended for by the appellants, of a taxpayer using one basis for the ascertainment of his taxable income and then turning round and using another basis when confronted with a claim by the Crown under Rule 21. It also avoids the anomaly of a taxpayer whose taxable income for the year of assessment is nominal, but whose actual income for that year is substantial, becoming entitled to retain for his own benefit income-tax collected by him from the persons to whom he has made annual payments, and who, but for the provisions of Rule 19, would have had to pay their income-tax to the Crown direct. It also avoids the further anomaly of a taxpayer whose taxable income for the year of assessment is substantial, but whose actual income during that year is nominal, from being exposed to a double charge of tax in respect of the annual payments which he has had to make during that year.

For the reasons stated, I think that the decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt is right, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

THE RIVERMAN.*

Ship—Collision—Tug and tow—Towage contract—Indemnity clause—Third party action.

The plaintiffs' keel, while at anchor, was damaged by collision with a lighter, which, with five other craft, was being towed by the defendants' steam tug. The collision was caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants. Proceedings were instituted by the plaintiffs against the defendant tug owners for the damage which their keel had sustained, and thereupon the defendants obtained leave to serve third party notices upon (1) the owner (who was also the master) of the lighter, and (2) the hirers of the lighter, claiming to be indemnified, under the conditions of the towage contract, in respect of any sum which they might be found liable to pay to the plaintiffs.

The towage contract in question contained the following conditions:—

"That on the hiring or employment of the steam tug, the master and crew thereof shall be held to become the servants of and identified with the vessel or craft being towed, and under the control of the person in charge of such vessel or craft during the performance of the contract. The steam tug owners are not responsible for the acts, neglect, or default of the masters, pilots, or crews of the steam tugs . . . or for any loss of life or injury to persons or for any damage or loss that may arise to any vessel or craft being towed, or about to be towed, or having been towed, or cargo on board of same, or any other ship or cargo . . . through collision or otherwise, whether such damage arise from or be occasioned by any accident, or by any omission, breach of duty, mismanagement, negligence, or default of the steam tug owners, or any of their servants or employees, or by any defect or imperfection in the steam tugs or their machinery or the towing gear . . . whether such defect or imperfection is in existence before or at the commencement of the towage or arises during or after the performance thereof . . . and the owners or persons interested in the vessels or craft so being towed, or about to be towed, or having been towed, or the cargo on board of the same, shall and do undertake to bear, satisfy and indemnify the steam tug owners against all liability for the above mentioned matters and against all costs and charges in respect of any law expenses or actions that may arise or be brought against the said tug owners in relation to any such loss or damage, actual or alleged."

The hirers of the lighter, with whom the Court found that the towage contract had been made, contended, inter alia, that the towage conditions as worded were so ambiguous as to be inapplicable where a tug was towing more than one vessel or craft at the same time, e.g., the master and crew of the tug could not be held to become the servants of and identified with all the vessels being towed, and under the control of the persons in charge of all such vessels; and that the words "or persons interested in the vessels or craft so being towed" were not sufficiently clear and unambiguous to cover hirers of such vessels.

Held, without deciding whether the whole of the phraseology used in the towage conditions was applicable in cases where a tug was towing more than one vessel, that the hirers of the lighter, as "persons interested" in the vessels being towed, had clearly undertaken to indemnify the tug owners in respect of the matter in question, and judgment must be given against them, with costs.

Held, further, that under the towage contract the tug owners were entitled to recover from the hirers of the lighter their costs as between solicitor and client of defending the collision action from the date on which the hirers were joined as third parties.

This case arose out of a collision between the plaintiffs' keel Elma and the lighter Blenheim, and came before the Court for the trial of third party issues.

On the evening of January 6, 1927, when the Elma, a wooden keel, was lying at anchor in the River Trent, the lighter Blenheim came into collision with her and did her so much damage that she sank. The lighter was at the time, together with five other craft, in tow of the steam tug Riverman, owned by the United Towing Company, Limited. By writ dated February 10, the owners of the Elma (and her master suing for his lost effects) commenced an action against the owners of the Riverman for the damage caused by the collision. On May 21 the owners of the Riverman delivered their defence, denying liability, but in the meantime, on April 30, they had served a third party notice on Herbert Hinchsliff, owner and master of the barge Blenheim, claiming to be entitled, under the conditions of the towage contract, to be indemnified by Hinchsliff in respect of any sum or sums that they might be adjudged to pay to the plaintiffs. On June 10 Hinchsliff delivered a defence in which it was pleaded, inter alia, that the Blenheim was at the time of the collision on hire to Furley and Co., Limited, river carriers, under an agreement in writing, that Hinchsliff was merely acting as her master and as a servant of Furley and Co., and that the towage contract was in fact made between Furley and Co. and the owners of the Riverman. In these circumstances the owners of the Riverman on June 30 joined Furley and Co. as additional third parties, and on July 13 admitted liability to the plaintiffs. The towage conditions, under which the tug owners claimed an indemnity, are sufficiently set out in the head-note.

Mr. G. P. Langton, K.C., and Mr. E. W. Brightman appeared for the owners of the Riverman; Mr. E. A. Digby, K.C., and Mr. R. H. Balloch for Hinchsliff; and Mr. C. R. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. H. Stranger for Furley and Co.

Mr. Justice Hill.—On January 6, 1927, the lighter Blenheim, which was in tow of the defendants' tug Riverman, was in collision with the plaintiffs' keel Elma. The collision was caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants in charge of the tug. The defendants were sued by the owners of the Elma and her master and have admitted liability. The defendants allege that they are entitled to be indemnified either by the third party, Mr. Hinchsliff, who is the owner of the Blenheim, or by Furley and Co., Limited, for whom the Blenheim was working under an agreement between Hinchsliff and Furley and Co., Limited, or by both.

The defendants set out to prove a contract of indemnity. The questions are: Had they a contract with Hinchsliff? Had they a contract with Furley and Co.? Did that contract contain a term that the party contracting with the defendants should indemnify the defendants against liabilities to the plaintiffs incurred by reason of the negligence of the defendants' servants in charge of the tug Riverman while towing the Blenheim? It is, of course, for the defendants to prove a contract, and to show that, in clear and unambiguous terms, it shifts on to the other contracting party a liability which otherwise would rest upon the defendants alone. There is no question that there was a contract that the tug should tow the Blenheim. With whom was it made? Furley and Co., Limited, carried on business as river and canal carriers and forwarding agents. They owned a number of keels or barges, they hired others. Inter alia, by an agreement dated August 16, 1926, and made between themselves and Hinchsliff, they hired the Blenheim for 12 months. From time to time they furnished the defendants with a list of the "boats owned and hired by them." There was an arrangement, current at the material times, between the defendants and Furley and Co. that in respect of towages of all such boats the defendants should debit Furley and Co. and render accounts to Furley and Co. and be paid by Furley and Co. The Blenheim is among the boats in the accounts so rendered and paid in respect of towages in August, September, October, November, and December, 1926, and also in an account rendered on November 14, 1927, and paid on March 25 in respect of January, 1927, towages which include the towage of the Blenheim on January 6, 1927. The voyage on January 6, 1927, was from Hull to Gainsborough, from the dock in Hull. The defendants' managing director, who was called, was unable to say how the order for this particular towage was given; he said that in the ordinary course of business orders were given by telephone from the office of Furley and Co., or by the master of the craft calling at the defendants' office, or by the defendants' manager at the dock, who saw that a boat was ready, applying to Furley and Co. or to the master, and receiving an order. No other evidence was called by the defendants. Mr. Hinchsliff was called on his own behalf, and said that he did not give the order on January 6, 1927. He said that he loaded and went to Furley and Co.'s office and obtained a bill of lading and that they rang up the defendants and told them that the Blenheim was for Gainsborough. I disregard that as evidence against Furley and Co., but it is evidence that Hinchsliff did not give the order. Mr. Beaver, a director of Furley and Co., was called and said that he had no knowledge as to how the particular order on January 6, 1927, was given. I find that the order was not given by Hinchsliff. But it undoubtedly reached the defendants, and was accepted and carried out, and Furley and Co. were debited with the charge for the work done and paid it.

I find therefore that, immediately, Hinchsliff was no party to the contract. I find also that, immediately, Furley and Co. were parties to the contract. It is, I think, a necessary conclusion from the facts already stated that Furley and Co. contracted as principals and not merely as agents for Hinchsliff. It was submitted for Furleys, but not strenuously argued, that Hinchsliff was liable, and I must therefore consider whether there is any ground for saying that Furley and Co. contracted on behalf of themselves and Hinchsliff. Hinchsliff gave no express authority to contract on his behalf. If authority there was, it must be extracted from the agreement between Hinchsliff and Furley and Co.

This contract is with Hinchsliff as owner of the Blenheim for 12 months, and Hinchsliff undertakes to keep in repair the Blenheim at the disposal and under the control of Furley and Co. and to carry cargo within certain areas as ordered by Furley and Co. and the agreement provides that Furley and Co. shall pay hire at the rate of £155 per annum which shall be the owner's sole remuneration and that in certain events Hinchsliff, as owner, shall discharge himself as master and appoint a fresh master. As master the Hinchsliff contract is that "the captain . . . shall work her on the third system usual and customary in the trade, and that the rate of freight shall be the usual and current rate of freight at the present time paid by the hirers on similar cargoes." This requires some explanation. Furley and Co. received freights. They did not account for them to Hinchsliff. They took a fixed rate of freight, as provided by the agreement, and multiplied it by the amount of cargo and debited themselves with that. Against the amount so ascertained they credited themselves with "brokerage," bill of lading stamp, advances to the master for the ordinary working expenses of the voyage, and the amount due for towage; and the balance was divided one third to Furley and Co. and two-thirds to Hinchsliff as master, and the master paid the crew, that is, the mate. In view of these facts it cannot be said that Hinchsliff was a partner of Furley and Co. in the running of the ship. He did not share in the profits. Nothing at all was said about the losses. He received two-thirds of a sum ascertained at a fixed rate less certain deductions. It was a method of ascertaining his remuneration varying with the work done. I therefore cannot hold that the contract made by Furley and Co. was made for themselves and Hinchsliff. It was made for Furley and Co. only.

Did Furley and Co.'s contract with the defendants contain the indemnity clause relied on? The defendants printed at the head of a printed tariff and towage rates, which they circulated to their customers, a notice that they would tow vessels on the following conditions only, setting out the terms. They say that they sent this document to Furley and Co., and it is highly probable that they did so. The defendants also printed at the head of all the accounts rendered to Furley and Co. a notice in the same terms. Furley and Co.'s manager said that they knew that the words so printed contained conditions, and that they had tried to understand them. When Furley and Co. bespoke the services of a tug to tow the Blenheim they were offering to enter into a contract at the rate mentioned in the defendants' tariff and on the terms which the defendants had said were the only terms upon which they would tow, and that offer was accepted by the defendants sending the Riverman. I therefore hold that the contract must be construed as incorporating those terms.

The next question is, Did those terms, in clear and unambiguous language, impose upon Furley and Co. as the contracting parties the obligation to indemnify the defendants?

It is said that the first sentence of the conditions is quite inapplicable to the case where more ships than one are in tow. That may be. But because that sentence is inapplicable, it does not follow that the remainder is not applicable. The next sentence is a very long one and is in two parts—the first part is an exception clause. Then follows an indemnity clause, "The owners or persons interested in the vessels or craft so being towed, or about to be towed, or having been towed, or the cargo on board of the same, shall and do undertake to bear, satisfy, and indemnify the steam tug owners against all liability for the above mentioned matters and against all costs and charges," &c. The "above mentioned matters" are the matters mentioned in the exception clause and include damage to tug or ship or other property through collision, whether occasioned by the negligence of the servants of the tug owners or otherwise.

Furley and Co. were not the owners of the Blenheim, but when they, being hirers of the Blenheim, entered into a contract for her towage they were persons interested in the Blenheim, at least for the period of the performance of this contract.

I therefore hold that they entered into the contract of indemnity.

In the pleadings something is said about a term of the agreement between Hinchsliff and Furley and Co. as to Hinchsliff being liable for all damage done by the Blenheim. This is irrelevant to the question that I have to decide. And as to whether Furley and Co. have any claim against Hinchsliff I say nothing. Nothing was said in argument as to a particular point raised in the pleadings as to the defendants' right being only for a partial indemnity on the ground that it ought to be split up among the owners of the six craft in tow. There was nothing in that and I am not surprised that very little was said about it. If Furley and Co. contracted to indemnify, they contracted to indemnify, whatever other persons contracted to do. Of course the defendants could not be indemnified twice over. The result is judgment for Hinchsliff against the defendants, with costs, and judgment for the defendants against Furley and Co., with costs.

On the application of Mr. Brightman, the learned Judge directed that the costs incurred by the tug owners in defending the action by the owners of the Elma from the date when Furley and Co. were joined as third parties should be paid by Furley and Co. "as between solicitor and client."

Court of Appeal. (Scrutton, Sargant, and Greer, L.JJ.) 1927. Nov. 25.

GOSSE MILLARD, LIMITED v. CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE, LIMITED.*

Contract — Carriage of goods by sea — Obligations of shipowners—Alleged breach of duty —Repair of ship—Hatches left open—Damage to cargo—Negligence—Exception—"Management of ship" — Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 22), Schedule, Art. IV. (2) (a).

The plaintiffs had a quantity of tinplates shipped for conveyance by the defendants' steamer from Swansea to Vancouver, and, after the tinplates had been taken on board, the ship went to Liverpool and had to be detained there for repairs. For this purpose part of the cargo had to be shifted, and through the negligence of the ship's officers the hatches were left open with the result that rain got into the hold, and when the tinplates were discharged at Vancouver they were found to have been damaged by rust. In an action for damages for breach of duty in the carriage of the tinplates,

Held (Greer, L.J., dissenting), that as the negligent management of part of the ship, namely, the hatches, caused the damage, and as this management was in the course of repairing the ship for the voyage, there was "management of the ship" within the exception in Article IV. (2) (a) of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, and the action failed.

Decision of Wright, J. (43 The Times L.R., 544 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 432), reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendants, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, from a judgment of Mr. Justice Wright (43 The Times L.R., 544 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 432) in favour of the plaintiffs, Gosse Millard, Limited.

The plaintiffs were engaged in the canning industry in Vancouver, and in February, 1925, they ordered a quantity of tinplates from Baldwins, Limited, in South Wales. The plates were shipped at Swansea in a steamer, the Canadian Highlander, belonging to the defendants. After the plates had been taken on board, the steamer went to Liverpool to discharge certain other cargo. While at Liverpool the steamer was damaged by collision with a dock wall, and when the defendants began to do the repairs necessitated by that collision they found that a shaft was defective and must be repaired also. In the result, part of the cargo had to be shifted, and the steamer was detained at Liverpool for ten weeks. She eventually went to Vancouver and discharged the plaintiffs' tinplates, which, it was found, were to a large extent ruined by rust.

Another action, brought by the American Canning Company, raised a similar claim in respect of a consignment of tinplates shipped from the works of Richard Thomas and Co. to Vancouver by the same steamer on the same voyage. The two actions were heard together.

The plaintiffs contended that the plates were in good condition when shipped, and had been damaged owing to the negligence of the defendants in allowing fresh water to reach the cargo ; that the defendants loaded and/or stowed the boxes containing the plates so negligently that many of them were broken and their contents exposed ; and that the defendants had also been negligent in shifting and re-stowing the boxes in order to carry out the repairs to the steamer at Liverpool.

By their defence the defendants put in a general denial and referred to conditions in the bill of lading :—to the words (a) "shipped in apparent good order and condition," which, they said, only amounted to a description of the goods by the shippers and did not constitute an acknowledgment by the carriers ; (b) "tinplates to be deemed insufficiently packed unless in boxes tin-lined and iron-hooped" ; and (c) "any statement herein that metal goods of any description have been shipped in apparent good order and condition does not involve any admission by the carrier as to the absence of rust or fresh water damage or other deterioration between tinplates . . . for which the carrier accepts no responsibility."

They pleaded further that if the plates were damaged it was due to inherent vice or to insufficient packing, because the boxes containing the plates were not tin-lined and were made of unseasoned wood ; and that the plaintiffs themselves had been negligent in shipping the goods in wet weather. They further relied on Article IV., rule 2 (a), (c), (d), (i), and (q), of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924.

By their reply the plaintiffs pleaded that the delay at Liverpool constituted a deviation and that the defendants could not, therefore, rely on the exceptions ; and that the defendants had been negligent in not taking care that the plates should not be damaged while the repairs were being carried out.

Mr. Justice Wright held that the defendants had failed to carry out the obligation imposed on them by Article III., rule 2, of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, carefully to stow, keep, and care for the goods, and that, even if the cause of the damage was unexplained, the onus was not on the cargo-owners to prove negligence, but on the shipowners to prove that neither they nor their servants had been guilty of negligence contributing to the loss. He held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

The defendants appealed only against the decision in favour of Gosse Millard, Limited.

Mr. Miller, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. Pilcher for the respondents.

Lord Justice Scrutton delivered the following considered judgment :—This appeal raises an important question under the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924. Fortunately the facts raising it can be shortly stated. A large quantity of tinplates was shipped at Swansea in the defendants' steamship Canadian Highlander for carriage to Vancouver. They were shipped in good condition, but they arrived in Vancouver seriously damaged by fresh water, of which, judging by the extent of the damage, a large quantity must have entered the hold in which they were stowed. At the trial two theories were put forward to explain this fresh water damage.

* Reported by T. W. Morgan and E. J. M. Chaplin, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The shipowners alleged that the water came from the unseasoned timber of the boxes in which the tinplates were packed. The Judge was not satisfied of this and found that the boxes were "good average normal boxes." The cargo-owners alleged that the fresh water causing the damage was rain entering through the shelter deck and the 'tween deck hatches of Hold No. 5, left open by negligence of the ship's officers and their deputies while it was raining. The Judge accepted this view and found that, while damage to the stern by collision was being examined, cracks were found in the lines of the tail shaft, which had to be taken out and replaced. This involved the presence of a considerable number of surveyors and workmen in No. 5 Hold, where the tinplates were stowed on the square of the hatch, and the constant passing of men and material through the hatches. The Judge found that there was default of the ship's officers in leaving the hatches open so that rain entered. In fact, it must have entered in considerable quantities to cause the very extensive damage ; the Judge found that enough rain entered during this period of repair (during which also the crew were scaling and painting in No. 5 'tween decks, which they entered through the shelter deck hatch) to account for all the damage found. He also found that it was probable that some rain had entered earlier on a day when lumber was being discharged from the No. 5 'tween decks. On that day the shelter deck hatch was open, and the Judge has found that the lower deck hatch was not protected, as it should have been, by any tarpaulin. This appears to be a small matter, the rain entering during the period of repair, when the 'tween or lower deck hatch was open, being found sufficient to account for all the damage to the tinplates. No attempt was made on the hearing of the appeal to challenge these findings of fact.

The next question is : "Do these facts bring the damage within any exception protecting the shipowners" ? These exceptions are to be found in the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, and in the bill of lading, if the bill of lading provisions do not weaken the protection given to the cargo-owners by the Act. Article III. of the Schedule to the Act describes the obligation of the shipowner to be to "properly and carefully load, handle, stow, carry, keep, care for and discharge the goods carried." This obligation replaces the previous obligation of a common carrier and improves the position of the shipowner. This obligation, moreover, is subject to the provisions of Article IV., which is also introduced by the provision in Article II. and which is headed, "Rights and Immunities." Exception (a) of paragraph 2 of Article IV. reads as follows : "Act, neglect, or default of the master, mariner, pilot, or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship." While this partially follows the wording of the United States Harter Act of 1893, which reads "shall not be responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of the said vessel," that wording was derived from earlier English bills of lading. It could not have come from United States bills of lading, for the United States Courts took the view that all negligence clauses in contracts of affreightment were void as contrary to public policy, a conclusion which the English Courts were not able to adopt. The question, therefore, is whether the facts found by the Judge amount to "neglect or default of the servants of the carrier in the management of the ship." Unassisted by authorities I should have felt no doubt that they did. Assuming that the words deal with the management of the ship as a physical entity, and not with the management of the cargo-carrying adventure on which the shipowners and the cargo-owners have agreed to use the ship, what has been managed here is the hatches of No. 5 Hold, an essential physical part of the ship. For the purpose of repairing damage to the ship in order that she may resume her voyage, those hatches have been physically dealt with and dealt with so negligently that, during their absence in rainy weather, such quantities of rain have entered the hold as to damage the cargo in the hold. I cannot understand why on the words themselves, without reference to any authorities, this is not negligence in the management of the ship, or a substantial physical part of the ship.

The words to be construed occur in a statutory contract between shipowner and cargo-owner relating to the carriage of goods in a ship. The cargo-owner has no interest in an empty ship or its management. The shipowner undertakes to use due diligence to provide a ship fit for the carriage of goods (including proper propelling and pumping machinery and, where the cargo requires it, proper refrigerating and ventilating appliances) and in such a proper ship properly to carry and deliver a cargo, and he is exempt from liability for negligent management of such a ship by his servants. Why it should be an objection to management of part of the ship coming within the exception, that it is being primarily managed for the benefit of the cargo, I do not understand. That is what the ship is to be used for. It is "navigated" to direct the ship, and so carry the cargo safely, to its proper destination. It is as a physical entity "managed" for the same purpose. Some portion of the management may not preserve the physical ship, but is still carried out to preserve the cargo. I cannot see any difference between negligently leaving partly open a port or sea cock, whereby water enters which is no danger to the ship but damages the cargo, negligently managing the pumping apparatus with the same result, and negligently leaving hatches off, whether to repair the ship or to ventilate the cargo, whereby salt water at sea, or fresh water in rainy weather in port, enters the hold and damages the cargo.

Negligent management of the propelling machinery, which is hardly "navigation," and negligent management of the refrigerating or ventilating or pumping machinery, seem all equally to be management of the ship. Most modern steamers have masts with no yards, but derricks for loading and unloading cargo attached to them. I do not understand why the derricks are not part of the ship. But it is said that the authorities compel me to hold that a part of the ship primarily used for the benefit of the cargo, if negligently managed, does not come within the exception. It might be enough to say that these hatches were primarily taken off to enable the ship to be repaired and prosecute the contract voyage. But the contention is so important that it is well that the authorities, which are supposed to support it, should be considered.

The authorities fall into three classes : (1) The decisions of the English Courts on bills of lading ; (2) the decisions on the Harter Act of 1893, either by the American Courts construing their own statute, or by the English Courts construing the words of the statute as incorporated in a bill of lading made in the United States ; and (3) the decisions on the English Act of 1924.

The original wording of English bills of lading was either "perils of navigation," "negligence in navigation," or "negligence in the course of the voyage."

Questions arose under this wording whether negligence in the conduct of the ship while loading or discharging was covered. Laurie v. Douglas (15 M. and W., 746), where loss during discharge was held covered as a peril of navigation, may be compared with The Accomac (6 The Times L.R., 482 ; 15 P.D., 208), where the Court of Appeal held negligence in removing a bilge pipe during discharge not to be "navigation," though it might be in the course of the charterparty "voyage." This latter view was also taken by Sir James Hannen in The Carron Park (6 The Times L.R., 474 ; 15 P.D., 203). Probably to meet this difficulty the word "management" was added after "navigation." I have not found, and counsel could not refer us to, any case using the word "management" earlier than The Ferro in 1892 ([1893] P., 38), but I think it had been used for some years before. That was a case of bad stowage of cargo by the stevedores, not involving any movement of parts of the ship. Sir F. Jeune thought that such stowage was not management of the ship, but suggested that removal of the hatches for the purpose of ventilation would be. Mr. Justice Barnes agreed that bad stowage was not "management of the ship," words which he did not think "went much, if at all, beyond the word 'navigation.'" Oddly enough, when three years later the same two Judges considered the words of the Harter Act (The Glenochil [1896] P., 10), each slightly altered his view in The Ferro (supra). Sir F. Jeune thought that his illustration of removal of the hatches for ventilation was "not a happy one." I do not know why, as I should have thought that, like pumping the bilges, it was a typical case of "management of the ship." The President made the distinction between "want of care of cargo" and "want of care of vessel indirectly affecting the cargo." I do not understand why want of care in dealing with the vessel or part of it should not be management of the vessel, whether it affects the cargo directly or indirectly, so long as a physical part of the vessel is affected or manipulated. Mr. Justice Barnes held that "management" certainly added something to "navigation" and applied to the proper handling of the vessel for her own safety and not primarily to the safety of the cargo, though done when the ship was not being navigated. Again, I do not understand why a negligent handling of part of the vessel should not be management of the ship because it is primarily done for the protection of the cargo. Take failure to pump water out of a cargo-hold, the water not being sufficient to affect the safety of the ship, but enough to damage the cargo. Why should not this be "management of the ship" in a contract which is concerned with safe carriage of cargo ? Anyhow, in The Glenochil (supra) negligently running water into a tank to stiffen the ship while discharging, without discovering a broken pipe through which the water ran into the cargo-hold, was held to be "management of the ship." In The Rodney (16 The Times L.R., 183 ; [1900] P., 112), also a Harter Act case, the boatswain, in clearing a drainage pipe, poked a hole in it, whereby water entered a cargo space, and this was held to be "management of the vessel." The President treated the words as covering "keeping the vessel in a proper condition," and Mr. Justice Barnes defined them as "improper handling of the ship, as a ship, which affects the safety of the cargo." These definitions seem to me to cover the present case. The ship was being repaired, "kept in a proper condition." To effect the repairs part of the ship, the hatch, was being handled, removed, and replaced. This was done so negligently that, through the open hatch, rain entered the hold and damaged the cargo. The definition of Mr. Justice Barnes was accepted by Lord Justice Stirling in Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company (19 The Times L.R., 668 ; [1903] 2 K.B., 666, at p. 681), a Harter Act case, and by Lord Justice Bankes and Lord Justice Atkin in R. F. Brown and Co., Limited v. T. and J. Harrison (43 The Times L.R., 633), a case on the English Act.

Some of the trouble in the case arises from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Rowson's case (supra). Nowadays, many ships are built with insulated holds, the walls of which are thickly lined with charcoal. This does not refrigerate them, but, like a Thermos flask, keeps a hot hold hot, and a cold hold cold. Refrigeration is effected by very elaborate pipes and machinery, sometimes built into the hold, sometimes connected with it, but as much a part of the ship as the propelling machinery, the pumping machinery, and the ventilating machinery. Indeed the English Act of 1924 speaks of all these refrigerating holds as "parts of the ship" to be made fit for the carriage of goods. As explained, no hold is refrigerating without elaborate machinery. In Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company (supra) the engineer mismanaged the refrigerating machinery, whereby the cargo was damaged. Mr. Justice Kennedy held that this was mismanagement of the ship, of which this machinery was a part. I quite agree with him. The Court of Appeal, while affirming him, had doubts about the matter till they discovered that the refrigerating machinery, which cooled the cargo of butter, also cooled the ship's butter, which was then being carried in another insulated compartment that might be used for either cargo or ship's provisions. Lord Justice Vaughan Williams used the phrase "management of the vessel qua vessel." I do not see how you can manage the vessel except as a vessel ; and in a contract between shipowner and cargo-owner the vessel is a cargo-carrying vessel, and the management of the vessel is the management of a cargo-carrying vessel—not an empty vessel. Some higher tribunal may feel strong enough to treat the words "management of the ship" as management of the cargo-carrying adventure carried on in the ship, which is the purpose of the contracting parties. I should welcome such a decision. This meaning would cover bad stowage, and the management of the crew and stevedores. But, without going so far as this, "management of the ship" must include management of parts of the ship which, incidentally, damages some of the cargo, and, if it is necessary that the management should be primarily intended to keep the ship fit, that condition is fulfilled when the management of part of the ship, the hatches, is for the purpose of repairing damage to the ship itself in the course of her contract voyage.

It is difficult to reconcile the decisions of the United States Courts with themselves or with the English decisions ; and the Harter Act itself differs widely from the English Act. This arises partly from the fact that the United States Courts treated all negligence clauses in contracts of affreightment as contrary to public policy, and the Harter Act was therefore an allowance of clauses which were contrary to public policy, and as such were to be restricted ; while the English Courts allowed freedom of contract and limited provisions which restricted that freedom. From this point of view, sections 1 and 2 of the Harter Act were treated as the fundamental purpose of the Act, and, as Mr. Justice Holmes said in The Germanic (196 U.S., at p. 597), removed matters which would otherwise be within the exceptions of section 3 from its operation. The English Act, on the other hand, expressly makes the obligations of Articles II. and III. subject to the immunities and exceptions of Article IV.

In The Germanic (supra) a combined operation of loading coal for ship's use and of discharging cargo was conducted so negligently that the ship lost her trim and capsized. This was held not to be management of the ship. I should have thought that it clearly was such management, just as the provision of ballast would be. The United States Courts have held management of the ship not to include :— Insufficient covering of the hatches (The Jeannie, 236 Fed., 463) ; failure to open hatches to ventilate cargo (The Jean Bart, 197 Fed., 1002) ; failure to close during rough weather hatches which had been opened to ventilate cargo (Andean Trading Company v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company, 263 Fed., 559) ; negligent management of refrigerating machinery (The Samland, 7 Fed., 2nd series, 155). I should have decided all these cases differently.

They have held management of the ship to include :—Failure to pump water out of bilges, causing damage to cargo (The Merida, 107 Fed., 146, and other cases) ; mismanagement of seacocks, whereby cargo is damaged (American Sugar Refining Company v. Rickinson, 124 Fed., 188) ; failure to cover ventilators, or sounding pipes, or to close portholes (The Hudson, 172 Fed., 1005 ; The Newport News, 199 Fed., 968 ; The Carisbrook, 247 Fed., 583 ; The Silvia, 171 U.S., 462). I refer to an excellent summary and discussion of the American cases in the third edition of Mr. Robert Temperley's work on the English Act, pp. 46-61.

I appreciate the desirability of getting uniformity of decision in maritime cases, as pointed out by Lord Justice Atkin in R. F. Brown and Co., Limited v. T. and J. Harrison (supra), though the cogency of these remarks is somewhat weakened by the learned Lord Justice's view in the same judgment, with which I agree, that negligence in managing machinery built into the ship for the purpose of protecting the cargo is probably management of the ship. The United States Courts had decided the other way. But on this question of harmony of decisions, I have always thought that the words of Lord Esher (then Sir Baliol Brett, M.R.) in Svensden v. Wallace (13 Q.B.D., 69, at p. 72) are of great value. He says :—

"It was urged that even if the proposition is stated in terms larger than have hitherto been recognized in English law, yet it ought now to be adopted in order to bring the principle of English law on the subject into consonance with the laws of all other countries. But to this I cannot agree. It is useless to inquire whether the law is, as stated, the same in all European countries. For if it is, yet no English Court has any mission to adapt the law of England to the laws of other countries ; it has authority only to declare what the law of England is, and even if we could do what is suggested, I should doubt the expediency of making the law of the greatest commercial and maritime country in the world bend to the law of other countries where commercial operations are far less extensive, and where commercial adventure is far more timid. As to the cognate law of America, it has been declared over and over again that the English and American Courts have diverged upon this particular head of law, the law of general average. The question, therefore, must be, what is the law of England in this matter."

For reasons which it is unnecessary to indicate, the United States of America have not been—except in some exceptional periods—a shipowning country, and they have approached shipping matters from the point of view of the cargo-owner. I cannot think that their decisions, while treated with great respect, should necessarily control the shipping decisions of the Courts of the greatest shipowning country in the world.

There is only one relevant decision in the English Courts. In R. and F. Brown and Co., Limited v. Harrison (supra) this Court decided that thefts by stevedores in Mexico, which the officers apparently could not stop, were not defaults in the management of the ship. The Court accepted Mr. Justice Barnes's definition in The Rodney (supra), but confined the exception to management of the ship, and declined to include in it management of the business of the ship, a management solely relating to the goods. This decision prevents us from holding, (1) that "management of the ship" in a contract between shipowner and cargo-owner about carriage of goods in the ship covers management of the cargo-carrying adventure ; but does not, as I understand it, prevent a decision, (2) that where part of the ship is managed, even primarily, for the purpose of protecting the cargo, still more, (3) where part of the ship is managed primarily for the purpose of making the ship fit for the adventure, with secondary results on the cargo, there is negligent management of the ship within the exception.

As my view of the facts is that, to repair the ship for the voyage, part of the ship (the hatches) was managed, but managed so negligently that cargo was damaged by rain, I think the case falls into the third class above and is covered by the exception of negligence of the servants of the carrier in the management of the ship.

The learned Judge below devoted the greater part of his judgment to the facts and dealt with the point under consideration in a few lines. He apparently thought that the hatches were not a part of the ship and that managing them for the purpose of the ship was not management of the ship. He said that the case fell within Article III. (2) and not Article IV. (2) (a), but, as Article III. (2) is expressly said to be subject to the provisions of Article IV., I do not understand that observation. The obligation properly to keep and care for the cargo is expressly said to be subject to the "immunity" that if cargo is damaged by careless management of the ship the shipowner is freed from liability ; and the hatches, ventilating, pumping, and refrigerating machinery and ship's derricks seem to be clearly part of the ship.

After dealing with a small point which arose on a clause in the bill of lading his Lordship concluded his judgment by saying that the exception of negligence in the management of the ship protected the shipowner and therefore the appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants, with costs here and below. They must, however, pay the costs of the issues of fact on which they failed in the lower Court.

Lord Justice Sargant.—In this case both the appellants and the respondents have accepted the findings of fact of Mr. Justice Wright, and therefore we must take it that the damage to the respondents' tinplates was due to the penetration of rain water into No. 5 hold where the tinplates were stowed ; that only trifling, if any, damage was so caused during the one day, February 9, on which the ship was discharging in an ordinary dock at Liverpool certain lumber which had been shipped at Swansea and stowed between decks immediately above No. 5 hold ; and that the substantial damage was caused during the seven or eight weeks between February 10 and an early date in April, while the ship was in dry dock at Liverpool and undergoing repairs which had been occasioned by a collision with the dock-head as she was coming out on February 10. During this period the tail shaft had to be taken out, repaired, and replaced, and there was a necessary accompanying shifting of some of the cargo of tinplates in Hold No. 5. There was also some scraping and painting of the 'tween decks, together with a constant coming and going of workmen, and, as I understand the learned Judge, he has found that, in the course of these operations, the lower hatch above Hold No. 5 was from time to time removed, and the hatchway was left insufficiently protected against the heavy rain which occurred during this period, with the result that, to quote his exact words, "during that period rain did get into the lower hold and did get in in sufficient quantity to explain and to account for the damage which was observed."

In these circumstances the question arises whether the appellants are freed from their prima facie liability to the respondents by reason of the provisions of Article IV., rule 2, of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, which, so far as material, are "2. Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from (a) Act, neglect, or default of the master, mariner, pilot, or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship." Or, accepting what I think must be accepted, that there was some neglect or default in the supervision of the operations by the officers of the ship, was it a neglect or default in the management of the ship?

The learned Judge's decisions in this action and in a similar action by other claimants in respect of a similar consignment of tinplates are reported so far as questions of law are concerned in 43 The Times L.R., 544; [1927] 2 K.B., 432. The principal part of this report is occupied with a discussion of the question of liability on the hypothesis that the cause of the damage to the respective consignments of tinplates had not been ascertained. This was his finding of fact with regard to the other consignment and was mentioned by him, though not adopted, as a possible alternative finding in the case of the appellants' consignment. On the present appeal it is unnecessary to consider this part of the report. The only material part of the judgment as reported is to be found in the last paragraph, where the learned Judge says: "But if the tinplates were damaged through the negligent admission of rain water into the hold at Liverpool, I do not think that that constituted a case of management of the ship. These words refer to matters affecting the ship as a ship—for instance, its safety, which might incidentally affect the cargo, such as the improper opening of sea connexions so as to prejudice the ship's safety while also damaging the cargo."

The brevity of the learned Judge's judgment on this point is probably due to the fact that it formed one only of a number of questions of both fact and law with which it had to deal; and no doubt he had not the advantage of so full a discussion and examination of the numerous authorities as we have had. And further, since the date of his judgment, there has been the decision in this Court of this very question of the scope of Article IV. (2) (a) in the important case of R. F. Brown and Co., Limited v. T. and J. Harrison (43 The Times L.R., 633). Not only was the attention of the Court in that case solely occupied with this question, but most of the previous English decisions and one or two important United States decisions were referred to in the judgments of Lords Justices Bankes and Atkin. We are therefore in a better position to solve the present problem than was Mr. Justice Wright.

Now, with great respect to the learned Judge, he seems to me to have paid too little attention to the occasion, scope, and purpose of the operations in the course of which the negligent acts or omissions took place. In my opinion, if these operations are operations with regard to the ship as a whole and for ship's purposes, and are not merely operations in relation to the cargo, then any negligence in conducting those operations is within Article IV. (a) (2), although the result of the negligence may be limited to damage to cargo and may not imperil or injure the ship at all. And I think that this view underlies all the decisions, and is, if not expressed, at any rate implied in the language of most, if not all, of the judgments.

For instance, in R. F. Brown and Co., Limited v. T. and J. Harrison (supra) Lord Justice Bankes says at page 635: "In order to bring any particular matter within the exception it must be something which can be said to be in the management of the ship." And again: "The more one looks into the authorities the more authority one finds for the proposition that such an act as this, a mere discharging of the cargo, cannot properly be said to come within the expression 'management of the ship.'" And Lord Justice Atkin says (at page 639): "The stevedores brought in were employed by the ship for the purpose of discharging the cargo, and that which was done was not a defect in the ship or a defect in the management of the ship as defined, but merely a default of a person dealing with the cargo." And on the same principle in The Ferro ([1893] P., 38), Sir Francis Jeune and Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes held that an act of damage done merely in the stowage of the cargo and apart from anything done in reference to the ship could not be held to be mismanagement of the ship.

Again in The Glenochil ([1896] P., 10) Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes applied the same test. He said at page 18: "It certainly seems to me to be a fault in the management of the vessel in doing something necessary for the safety of the ship herself"; and again, (at p. 19): where the act "is done for the safety of the ship herself, and is not primarily done at all in connexion with the cargo, that must be a matter which falls within the words 'management of the said vessel.'" Further, in Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company (19 The Times L.R., 67; [1903] 1 K.B., 114, at p. 117) there is an adoption by Mr. Justice Kennedy of the language of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes in The Rodney (16 The Times L.R., 183; [1900] P., 112, at p. 117): "I think that the words 'faults or errors in the management of the vessel' include improper handling of the ship, as a ship, which affects the safety of the cargo." And in the Court of Appeal in the same case (19 The Times L.R., 668; [1903] 2 K.B., 666) the reasoning proceeds on the same lines, particularly in the elaborate judgment of Lord Justice Stirling.

To the same effect is the judgment of Mr. Justice Holmes in a case in the Supreme Court of the United States, The Germanic (196 U.S., 589), where after referring to The Glenochil (supra) and to a case of The Silvia (171 U.S., 462) he said at p. 597: "If the primary purpose is to affect the ballast of the ship, the change is management of the vessel, but if, as in view of the findings we must take to have been the case here, the primary purpose is to get the cargo ashore, the fact that it also affects the trim of the vessel does not make it the less a fault of the class which the first section" (of the Harter Act) "removes from the operation of the third. We think it plain that a case may occur which, in different aspects, falls within both sections, and if this be true the question which section is to govern must be determined by the primary nature and object of the acts which cause the loss."

Now in the present case it is clear that the operations on the Canadian Highlander, in the course of which the hatchway leading to Hold No. 5 was left wholly or partially open and so allowed the penetration of rain into that hold, were operations for the purpose of repairing damage to the structure of the ship, and of scraping and painting parts of the ship, and had nothing at all to do with the case of the cargo. Had the 'tween decks hatch been removed for cargo purposes, as, for instance, for the ventilation of the cargo, and had there then been negligence in replacing the hatch or otherwise covering the hatchway, the result might have been different (see, for instance, Andean Trading Company v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company, 263 Fed., 559), though I express no definite opinion on the matter in view of the remarks of Lord Justice Scrutton to the contrary effect. But, as things stand here on the findings of fact of the learned Judge, I have come to the conclusion that the primary, or rather the sole, nature and purpose of the operations in which the negligence occurred concerned the ship as a whole; and accordingly that the appellants are protected from liability by Article IV., 2 (a).

In the view which I have taken it is not necessary to deal with the second defence of the appellants, based on the particular language of the document in this case, which is said to be rendered void by Article III. (8). I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Lord Justice Greer.—This is an appeal by the defendants, who are the owners of the s.s. Canadian Highlander, from a judgment of Mr. Justice Wright awarding the plaintiffs damages for breach of contract, evidenced by a bill of lading of which the plaintiffs were the holders.

The question raised by the appeal is whether the defendants are entitled to be relieved from liability to compensate the plaintiffs for the damages which they sustained through injury to a quantity of tinplates shipped in the Canadian Highlander under the contract of carriage, on the ground that they are protected by the words of Article IV., 2 (a), of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924.

The defendants also relied on a clause in the bill of lading which reads as follows:—

"18. The following are to be deemed insufficiently packed, (a) tinplates in boxes unless tin-lined and iron-hooped. . . ."

Other questions were involved in the action when heard by Mr. Justice Wright, but the above were the only ones that survived and were argued in the Court of Appeal.

The first question may be stated broadly thus. Is the failure to utilize the hatch covers or tarpaulins of the ship with care for the protection of the cargo an act, neglect, or default in the management of the ship within the meaning of the said rule, when it cannot be said to be, or at least has not been proved to be, an act, neglect, or default with regard to the safety, or with regard to the condition or purposes of the ship itself? The learned Judge held that the act, neglect, or default proved by the evidence was not an act, neglect, or default in the management of the ship, within the meaning of the said rule.

The material facts may be quite shortly stated. The tinplates were shipped at Swansea, under a bill of lading dated February 6, 1925, for carriage to Vancouver. The bill of lading had pasted on it the paramount clause giving effect to the provisions of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, and the rules comprising the Schedule thereto. By section 3 of the Act it is necessary for every bill of lading to contain a clause to this effect. The vessel sailed from Swansea, and on her way to Vancouver arrived at Liverpool to discharge some lumber and take in additional cargo. The tinplates in question were in No. 5 lower hold, and the lumber was stowed in the 'tween decks of that hold. The lumber was discharged on February 9 through the hatchway of No. 5 hold. A good deal of rain fell during part of the time occupied by the discharge. As I understand the learned Judge's findings of fact, he decided that the 'tween decks hatches were insufficiently protected by tarpaulins, and some rain penetrated to the lower hold and caused some damage to the plaintiffs' tinplates.

The vessel was moved on February 10 and unfortunately met with an accident by striking the pierhead. She was found to be damaged, and was taken to dry dock for repairs. It was then discovered that in addition to the repairs necessitated by the accident she required a new liner to the tail shaft. This made it necessary for the repairers to descend into No. 5 lower hold and do a good deal of work there, the nature of which it is unnecessary to describe in detail. While the repairers were at work, the defendants' sailors seized the opportunity of doing some painting in the 'tween decks. There was rain on some of the days when the work was being done, and the rain somehow or other fell on the plaintiffs' boxes of tinplates, which extended about halfway across the lower hatchway from the after end towards the forward end. The ladder leading to the hold was at the after end of the hatch, and the learned Judge came to the conclusion that at some time or other either the defendants' employees on board the ship must have negligently omitted to see that the hatch covers or tarpaulins were replaced after the men descended to their work, or that the opening in the hatch was not covered by a tarpaulin. He did not find, and on the evidence, in my opinion, he could not find, that there was any neglect of the safety or of the condition of the ship itself, or any negligence towards the ship itself or any part of it. I treat his judgment as meaning that, if there was no cargo to be considered, the occasional omission completely to cover the hatchway would not have constituted negligence at all. I agree with this view.

The conclusions of the learned Judge are stated as follows:—

"The conclusion, therefore, I arrive at .... is that rain did get into the hold during the period of the repairs at Liverpool and also during some part of the discharge of the lumber at Liverpool and that rain accounted for the exceptional damage.

His final conclusion is stated as follows:—

"Mr. Miller further relied on Article IV., 2 (a), and contended that if there was neglect on the part of the defendants' servants, it was 'in the management of the ship,' so that the defendants would be excused. But if the tinplates were damaged through the negligent admission of rain water into the hold at Liverpool, I do not think that that constituted a case of management of the ship. These words refer to matters affecting the ship as a ship—for instance, its safety, which might incidentally affect the cargo, such as the improper opening of sea connexions, so as to prejudice the ship's safety while also damaging the cargo. The principle was so stated in Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company (19 The Times L.R., 668 ; [1903] 2 K.B., 666), where it was somewhat subtly applied to the management of refrigerating machinery, but on the ground that its functions were not limited to cooling cargo. I think that in the present case the protection of the tinplate cargo fell under Article III., 2, and not Article IV., 2 (a). Any other view would in effect nullify the former provision." In my judgment the learned Judge was right.

The material rules in the Schedule to the Act are Articles II., III., 2, and IV., 2 (a).

In interpreting these rules it is not immaterial to consider the circumstances which gave rise to the enactment of the statute which gives the force of law to these rules.

In 1893 the Congress of the United States of America passed the Harter Act. This Act provides by section 2 that it shall not be lawful for any vessel transporting merchandise or property from or between ports of the United States and foreign ports to insert in any bill of lading or shipping document any covenant or agreement "whereby the obligations of the master, officers, agents, or servants, to carefully handle and stow her cargo, and to care for and properly deliver the same, shall in anywise be lessened, weakened, or avoided." As pointed out by Mr. Jowitt in his argument for the respondents, this is not a provision imposing a duty to take care, but is a declaration that the shipowner is not to limit his common law obligation to carry and deliver the cargo by exceptions relieving him, his master, officers, servants, or agents from the duty of exercising care in the handling, stowing, caring for, and delivery of the cargo.

Section 3 then proceeds to provide "that if the owner of any vessel transporting merchandise or property to or from any port in the United States of America shall exercise due diligence to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied, neither the vessel, her owner or owners, agent or charterers, shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation, or in the management of the said vessel."

After the Harter Act was passed, several other countries, including some British Colonies, legislated on similar lines, but not in every case using similar words. It was felt by a large number of shipowners, merchants, and bankers in this and other countries that it was desirable to make the law of the countries interested in international trade as nearly as possible uniform with regard to the matters dealt with by the Harter Act, and recommendations were made by an international body to the British Legislature which resulted in the passage of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924.

It seems clear that section 3 of the Harter Act when incorporated in a British bill of lading ought to be read as a limitation of the liability of the shipowner as a common carrier, and ought to be interpreted as an exception clause, and any decision of our Courts as to its meaning is an authority which can be properly applied to the similar exception clause in the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924. Further I think it is incumbent on the Court not to attribute to Article IV., 2 (a), a meaning that will largely nullify the effects of Article III., 2, unless they are compelled to do so by clear words.

The words "act, neglect, or default in the management or navigation of the ship," if they are interpreted in their widest sense, would cover any act done on board the ship which relates to the care of the cargo, and in practice such an interpretation, if it did not completely nullify the provisions of Article III., 2, would certainly take the heart out of those provisions, and in practice reduce to very small dimensions the obligation to "carefully handle, carry, keep, and care for the cargo," which is imposed on shipowners by the last-mentioned rule. In my judgment a reasonable construction of the rules requires that a narrower interpretation should be put on the excepting provisions of Article IV., rule 2 (a). If the use of any part of the ship's appliances that is negligent only because it is likely to cause damage to the cargo is within the protection of Article IV., rule 2 (a), there is hardly anything that can happen to the cargo through the negligence of the owner's servants that the owner would not in actual practice be released from. To hold that this is the effect of Article IV., rule 2 (a), would reduce the primary obligation to "carefully carry and care for the cargo during the voyage" to a negligible quantity. In my judgment the reasonable interpretation to put on the rules is that there is a paramount duty imposed safely to carry and to take care of the cargo, and that the performance of this duty is only excused if the damage to the cargo is the indirect result of an act or neglect which can be described as either (1) negligence in caring for the safety of the ship, or (2) failure to take care to prevent damage to the ship or some part of the ship, or (3) failure in the management of some operation connected with the movement or stability of the ship or otherwise for the ship's purposes. It is worth while noting that Article IV., rule 2 (a), is not directed to acts, neglects, or defaults in the course of management of the ship, but to acts, neglects, or defaults in the management of the ship. All the cases in our Courts where the ship has been held to be excused come under one or other of these heads.

The decisions of the English Courts on the meaning of the Harter Act (when made part of an English bill of lading) and on the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, seem to me to be in accord with the view of the law above stated. In The Glenochil ([1896] P., 10), the President, Sir F. H. Jeune, and Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes held that the shipowner was protected from liability for damage caused by the negligent way in which the process of filling the water ballast tanks to stiffen the ship during discharge was carried out. The stiffening was done in order to keep the ship afloat in proper trim, and was for the benefit of the ship, as a ship. It was held that the negligence complained of was negligence in the management of the ship within the meaning of section 3 of the Harter Act, which had been incorporated in the bill of lading contract. That case is distinguishable from the present in that the act complained of was the negligent management of an operation done for the purposes of the ship, as a ship, and, as this negligence resulted in damage to the cargo, the ship was held to be protected by section 3 of the Harter Act. The negligence complained of was negligent treatment of the ship as a ship indirectly affecting the cargo. In giving judgment the President pointed out ([1896] P., at p. 16) that the words "management of the said vessel" were not merely co-extensive with navigation but at any rate went "far enough to take in this very class of acts which do not affect the sailing or movement of the vessel, but do affect the vessel herself," and after referring to the judgment in The Ferro ([1893] P., 38), he uses these words: "The distinction I intended to draw then, and intend to draw now, is one between want of care of cargo and want of care of vessel indirectly affecting the cargo." If this is the correct way of describing the legal effect of the material words in the Harter Act, it seems to me to mean this, that the shipowner has to prove two things in order to bring himself within the protection of section 3, (a) that there was some act or neglect that can be described as want of care of the vessel, and (b) that damage to the cargo was indirectly caused thereby. As I have already indicated, the evidence in this case failed to establish any want of care of the vessel, but only want of care of the cargo, consisting of a failure to use the hatch covers and tarpaulins sufficiently to afford adequate protection of the cargo. Lord Gorell (Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, as he then was), in giving judgment said ([1896] P., at p. 19) : "I think that where the act done in the management of the ship is one which is necessarily done in the proper handling of the vessel, though in the particular case the handling is not properly done, but is done for the safety of the ship herself, and is not primarily done at all in connexion with the cargo, that must be a matter which falls within the words 'management of the said vessel.'" Having regard to the words which I have quoted from the judgments it seems to me that The Glenochil (supra) is an authority in favour of the plaintiffs' contentions in the present case.

The facts in the next case, The Rodney (16 The Times L.R., 183 ; [1900] P., 112), were that during the voyage the vessel met with heavy weather, and, the forecastle becoming flooded, the boatswain, whilst endeavouring, with the aid of a poker, to clear a pipe used to carry off the drainage, drove a hole through it, thereby admitting water into the forehold and damaging a portion of the cargo. It was decided that there was a fault or error in the management of the vessel, and the shipowner was protected by section 3 of the Harter Act, which had been made part of the contract of carriage. Here it is clear that the negligent act complained of which damaged the cargo was an act done for the purposes of the ship, which actually damaged part of the ship. The negligence was negligence in respect of the ship which indirectly damaged the cargo. In giving judgment, Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes said ([1900] P., at p. 117) : "Practically there is very little difference, if any, between the case of The Glenochil (supra) and this case, except that in the former case there are to be found some expressions referring to the act as being done for the safety of the ship, but those expressions were not intended to limit the meaning of the words 'management of the ship.' I think that the words 'faults or errors in the management of the vessel' include improper handling of the ship, as a ship, which affects the safety of the cargo."

The next case to be considered is the case of Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company (19 The Times L.R., 668 ; [1903] 2 K.B., 666). This is the authority referred to by Mr. Justice Wright in support of his judgment. The actual decision in that case was that the negligent management of the refrigerating apparatus, which was installed in the ship partly to preserve the cargo, and partly to preserve the food used by the crew, amounted to a fault or error in the management of the ship, and therefore the shipowner was protected by section 3 of the Harter Act, which was incorporated in the contract of carriage. But it is clear that the ground for the decision was that as the apparatus was used not merely for the purpose of the preservation of the cargo, but also for the purposes of the ship herself as a ship, the negligence was accordingly negligence in the management of the ship. Lord Justice Vaughan Williams states his view of the proper construction of section 3 by saying ([1903] 2 K.B., at p. 675) that the words "in the management of the said vessel" mean "in the management of the vessel qua vessel." Lord Justice Romer in his judgment asks himself the question whether the negligent engineer was acting in the ordinary course of his duties and on behalf of the vessel regarded as a whole, or was he acting solely, or in particular, in looking after the cargo and for the purposes of the cargo, and as he came to the conclusion that he was acting on behalf of the vessel regarded as a whole, and not merely or particularly on account of the cargo, he came to the conclusion (at p. 678) that "the mismanagement of the pipe was a mismanagement of it in working the pipe qua pipe, as I have said, and as part of the vessel." Further on he says, "In any point of view it was, in my judgment, an act of negligence by an officer of the ship in the performance of his duties to the ship as a ship, not with regard to any particular cargo, and was such an act as really concerned the management of the vessel as a whole, and, therefore, in my opinion, really came within the express limitation in section 3 of the Act." Lord Justice Stirling in his judgment says (at p. 682), "If the refrigerating chambers or refrigerating machines were entirely devoted to cargo, and the neglect had been, as it was in the present case, the act of turning a handle which intercepted the supply of oil to this particular spot in the machine, I should have felt very great hesitation in saying that was not neglect in taking proper care of the cargo ; and for a long while I was under the impression that that really represented the state of things here, and that the negligent act had nothing to do really with the general management of the vessel, but simply with the management of a portion of the vessel which was exclusively appropriated to the cargo. But it now turns out that the refrigerating portion of the vessel does include chambers which are applied and used for carrying provisions for the ship, and these are worked with precisely one and the same apparatus as the chambers which are devoted to the preservation of the cargo. The duties of the particular engineer in charge were not limited, as I understand, to taking care of the cargo, or indeed to this particular portion of the refrigerators ; and although I think the case very near the line, it does seem to me that I ought to come to the conclusion that the fault or error was committed in the management of the vessel within the meaning of section 3 of the Harter Act."

The only other case that I think it necessary to consider is R. F. Brown and Co., Limited v. T. and J. Harrison (43 The Times L.R., 633). The actual question involved in that case was whether theft by the stevedore's men at Mexican ports amounted to mismanagement of the ship within the meaning of Article IV., rule 2 (a), of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924. The decision is a decision of the Court of Appeal, and though the facts of the case are not in any way similar to the facts in the present case, it seems to me that the judgments of Lord Justice Bankes and of Lord Justice Atkin are only consistent with the construction of a contract similar to that decided in Rowson's case (supra) with regard to the construction of the Harter Act, and similar to the construction which I have indicated in an earlier part of this judgment. Lord Justice Bankes quotes with approval the passages from the judgment of the President in The Glenochil (supra) which I have cited above, and also the judgment of Lord Justice Vaughan Williams in Rowson's case (supra). He cites with approval the judgment of Mr. Justice Holmes in the case of The Germanic (196 U.S., at p. 596), including that part of the judgment which approves the words of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes in The Glenochil (supra), that in order to be within the protection of section 3 of the Harter Act the faults or errors should be primarily connected with the navigation of the vessel, and not with the cargo, and Lord Justice Atkin says (43 The Times L.R., at p. 638) : "It appears to me that here we are not dealing with anything which is or can be said to be part of the ship as a ship," and earlier on the same page he says, "I do not propose to add anything at any length to what has been said by my Lord, with whose judgment I entirely agree, but I think perhaps one might point out this, that in this statute it is plain that a very clear distinction is drawn between dealings with goods and dealings with ships, and that 'ship' is defined in the Act. 'Ship' is defined as being 'any vessel used for the carriage of goods by sea'; and it is quite plain that what is meant by 'ship,' when the word is used, is the actual vessel, the res, the actual thing itself. One will find in Article IV., rule 1, that 'Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be liable for loss,' and in rule 2 that : 'Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss'; that means that the ship as a res shall not be responsible for loss ; and while it is quite true that, in general language, in another context, 'management of the ship' might be construed as meaning management of the business of carrying goods by ship, it seems to me plain that that is not the meaning here, but that there is a clear distinction drawn between goods and ship, and when the Act uses the word 'ship' it means the management of the ship, and does not mean the general carrying on of the business of transporting goods by sea. The effect of it is that, in the words of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, in The Rodney (16 The Times L.R., 183 ; [1900] P., 112, at p. 117) : 'Faults or errors in the management of the vessel include improper handling of the ship, as a ship, which affects the safety of the cargo,' and that construction merely follows, I think, and was intended by the learned Judge to follow, his decision in The Glenochil (supra), and the decision of Sir Francis Jeune and Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes in both these cases of The Glenochil (supra) and The Rodney (supra) is supported in terms by Lord Justice Stirling in the case of Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company (supra), to which my Lord has referred, and I think that those statements of the meaning of the word 'management' must be taken, so far as this Court is concerned, as being authoritative."

As I read the decisions of the English Courts, especially the two cases in the Court of Appeal, they mean this. If the cause of the damage is solely, or even primarily, a neglect to take reasonable care of the cargo, the ship is liable, but if the cause of the damage is a neglect to take reasonable care of the ship, or some part of it, as distinct from the cargo, the ship is relieved from liability, but if the negligence is not negligence towards the ship, but only negligent failure to use the apparatus of the ship for the protection of the cargo, the ship is not so relieved. I respectfully agree with this view, but whether it ultimately proves to be a right construction of the Act, I think in this Court we ought to follow the opinions expressed by this Court in those cases.

With regard to the point made by Mr. Miller on Clause 18 of the bill of lading, I think it is unnecessary to say more than this ; if my judgment is right, the clause cannot operate as a defence when there is a cause of action for negligence. If I am wrong, then the defendants are entitled to judgment without any need to rely on this clause.

I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs, but as the other members of this Court think differently it will be allowed with costs.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. (Viscount Cave, L.C., Lord Carson, and Lord Darling.) — 1927. Dec. 6.

Ceylon—Agreement affecting land—Statutory mode of execution—Non-observance—Nullity of agreement—Whether curable—Part performance—Ceylon Ordinance No. 7 of 1840, cl. 2.

By clause 2 of the Ceylon Ordinance No. 7 of 1840, no agreement for the sale or purchase of land "shall be of force or avail in law unless the same shall be in writing and signed by the party making the same or by some person lawfully authorized by him or her in the presence of a notary public and two or more witnesses present at the same time and unless the execution of such writing deed or instrument be duly attested by such notary and witnesses."

Held, that where an agreement affecting land has not been executed and attested in the manner required by the above enactment, the operation of the enactment cannot be avoided either by an application of the principle of the decision in Forster v. Hale (3 Ves., 696 ; 5 Ves., 308) or under the equitable doctrine of part performance, but such an agreement may be valid merely for the purpose of establishing a partnership between the parties.

Pate v. Pate (31 The Times L.R., 590 ; [1915] A.C. 1100) applied.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Ceylon in a suit relating to the validity of a partnership agreement.

Mr. Owen Thompson, K.C., and Mr. Hugh Hallett were counsel for the appellant ; Mr. Herbert du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. Hugh C. Bischoff for the respondent.

The Lord Chancellor, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said :—This is an appeal from a decree of the Supreme Court of Ceylon affirming a decree of the District Court of Colombo in an action in which the appellant was plaintiff and the respondent was defendant.

By an agreement in writing dated December 21, 1915, the respondent and the appellant agreed to prospect for plumbago at the Pattagoda Mines under the name of the Pattagoda Mining Company. The agreement provided that the respondent "would thereby give over" his interest in the lease which he had taken from the owners of the mine (which had still eight years to run) to the company ; that the appellant should manage the mine and receive a commission of 2½ per cent. on all transactions ; that the partners should contribute equally to the expenses to be incurred on the pit or pits ; and that they should be entitled to the profits and liable for the losses in equal shares. The agreement was signed by both parties, but the signatures were not attested by a notary or witnesses. The mine was duly worked under the management of the appellant from the date of the agreement until the month of January, 1918, when the working was stopped by mutual arrangement.

On January 25, 1923, the appellant brought this action against the respondent pleading the above facts and alleging that he (the appellant) had paid or borrowed moneys in respect of the business amounting to Rs. 72,857 and was entitled to commission amounting to a further Rs. 1,504 ; and the plaintiff claimed a dissolution of the partnership and payment by the defendant of one-half of those sums or of such sum as might be found due upon an account being taken. The respondent by his written statement admitted that he had agreed to work the Pattagoda plumbago pits under the name of the Pattagoda Mining Company, that the profits and losses were to be divided equally, that the plaintiff was to manage the business for a commission of 2½ per cent., and that the business had been carried on as alleged ; but he pleaded that the agreement of December 21, 1915, on which the plaintiff's action was based, was invalid in law. Issues were framed, which included the following :—

1. Is the document containing the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant invalid in law, inasmuch as it has not been notarially executed and has not been duly stamped ?

5. Had the plaintiff authority to borrow money for the working of the partnership ?

6. Is the defendant liable to pay a half share of any of the moneys borrowed by the plaintiff or of the interest due on such loans ?

8. What sum, if any, is due by the defendant to the plaintiff or by the plaintiff to the defendant ?

On the trial of the action the District Judge held on the first issue that the agreement of December 21, 1915, not having been attested by a notary and two witnesses in manner directed by clause 2 of Ordinance No. 7 of 1840, was void in law, and without dealing with the other issues he dismissed the action with costs. On an appeal by the plaintiff to the Supreme Court of Ceylon, that Court affirmed the judgment of the District Judge, and it is against that decision that the present appeal is brought.

The material provisions of Ordinance No. 7 of 1840 are as follows :—

" 2. No sale purchase transfer or mortgage of land or other immovable property and no promise bargain contract or agreement for effecting any such object or for establishing any security interest or incumbrance affecting land or other immovable property (other than a lease at will or for any period not exceeding one month) nor any contract or agreement for the future sale or purchase of any land or other immovable property shall be of force or avail in law unless the same shall be in writing and signed by the party making the same or by some person lawfully authorized by him or her in the presence of a licensed notary public and two or more witnesses present at the same time and unless the execution of such writing deed or instrument be duly attested by such notary and witnesses."

" 21. No promise contract bargain or agreement unless it be in writing and signed by the party making the same or by some person thereto lawfully authorized by him or her shall be of force or avail in law for any of the following purposes :— . . .

" 4. For establishing a partnership where the capital exceeds £100 ; provided that this shall not be construed to prevent third parties from suing partners or persons acting as such and offering in evidence circumstances to prove a partnership existing between such persons or to exclude parol testimony concerning transactions by or the settlement of any account between partners.

" 22. Provided always that nothing in the preceding clause shall be construed to exempt any deed or instrument in any manner affecting land or other immovable property from being required for that purpose to be executed and attested in manner declared by the second clause of this Ordinance."

Applying these provisions, the Supreme Court held that the agreement of December 21, 1915, not having been executed and attested in manner required by the second clause of the Ordinance, was void so far as it purported to affect the lease of the Pattagoda mines vested in the respondent ; and after a careful examination of the cases of Forster v. Hale (3 Ves., 696 ; 5 Ves., 308), and Dale v. Hamilton (5 Hare, 369 ; 2 Phillips, 266), they decided that the defect in the agreement was not cured, either by the principle laid down in those cases, or by the equitable doctrine of part performance. They further held that the agreement was one and indivisible, and that, the stipulation as to the transfer of the mine to the Pattagoda Company being ineffective, the whole agreement was void and of no effect ; and accordingly that the action was rightly dismissed.

Upon the first of the two points so decided by the Supreme Court their Lordships are wholly in agreement with the opinion of that Court. The effect of clause 21 of the Ordinance was considered by this Board in the case of Pate v. Pate (31 The Times L.R., 590 ; [1915] A.C. 1100), where it was held that no suit could be maintained in Ceylon upon an agreement for a partnership which was not in writing, signed by the parties as required by that section, even though the partnership business had been carried on for a time and had then been dissolved, and although the plaintiff was only claiming an account of the transactions of the dissolved partnership and payment of what might be found due. Doubtless the decision applies with equal force to an agreement affecting land which has not been executed and attested in manner required by clause 2 of the Ordinance ; and their Lordships agree with the opinion of the learned Judges of the Supreme Court that in the case of such an agreement the operation of the Ordinance cannot be avoided either by an application of the principle of the decision in Forster v. Hale (supra), or under the equitable doctrine of part performance. Both the case last cited and the doctrine of part performance have reference to section 4 of the English Statute of Frauds, and they have no application to the more stringent provisions of clause 2 of the Ordinance by which an agreement as to land not duly attested by a notary and two witnesses is rendered of no " force or avail in law."

But this does not conclude the matter. Assuming that the agreement by the respondent to " give over " the lease of the mine to the proposed company was void for want of proper attestation under clause 2 of the Ordinance, the question remains whether a partnership between the parties is established. In this connexion it is to be remembered that the respondent by his pleading admits the existence of a partnership, an admission which would appear to entitle the appellant to an order for an account. But it would not be satisfactory to decide the case on that ground alone, since the terms of the partnership as admitted by the respondent differ in some respects from those alleged in the plaint ; and it is necessary to consider whether the agreement of December, 1915, although ineffective to pass any interest in the land, may yet be referred to as showing the other terms of the partnership. In their Lordships' opinion it may be so referred to. Clause 21 of the Ordinance requires that an agreement for a partnership where the capital exceeds £100 shall be in writing signed by or on behalf of the parties ; and the agreement of December, 1915, complies with that requirement. Clause 22 adds the proviso that an instrument affecting land shall "for that purpose" be executed and attested as required by clause 2, an expression which leads to the inference that the instrument, although not notarially executed and attested, may yet be referred to for the purpose of establishing the other terms of the contract. It is true that in the present case the agreement to transfer the mine was an important term of the contract ; and it may well be that if, during the currency of the lease, the plaintiff had sought to compel the defendant to put the mine at the disposal of the company and the defendant had refused so to do, the substratum of the partnership would have disappeared and the partnership must have been dissolved. But no such claim was ever made or is now made in this suit. It is possible, as Lord Rosslyn pointed out in Forster v. Hale (supra), for a mining business to be carried on in land in which no estate is given to those who share in the working ; and in the present case it must be inferred that throughout the duration of the partnership the mine was worked by the licence of the respondent, which he did not choose to revoke. The partnership has now run its course, without the necessity for calling for a transfer of the lease, and all that is claimed is an account of the partnership transactions and payment of what may be found due. The partnership, apart from any claim to the land, is established by the written agreement and the admissions in the pleadings. If the venture had proved successful, and substantial profits had come to the plaintiff's hands, he would assuredly have been bound to account for them ; and there is no reason why, now that the business has resulted in a loss, the plaintiff, who is alleged to have borne the whole expenses of the mining operations, should be left to bear that loss alone. He is entitled to an account on the footing of the agreement and to payment by the defendant of what may be found due on the taking of such account.

For these reasons their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment of the Supreme Court should be set aside, and that upon the first issue it should be declared that the agreement of December 21, 1915, is valid for the purpose of establishing a partnership between the parties, but not for the purpose of affecting the ownership of the mine, and the case should be remitted to the District Court to be dealt with upon the above footing, and their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly. The respondent will pay the costs of the appeal to the Supreme Court and to this Board, the remaining costs of the suit being reserved to be dealt with by the District Judge.

K.B. Div. (Rowlatt, J.) 1927. Dec. 7.

GREEN v. J. GLIKSTEN AND SON, LIMITED.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Insurance of timber against fire — Money received by insured — Whether an ordinary trading receipt.

Where a timber merchant insures his timber against fire and the timber is destroyed by fire, the amount received by him from the insurance companies, in respect of the timber so destroyed, is to be taken, for the purpose of income-tax, as an ordinary trading receipt, and it is not sufficient to value the timber destroyed at cost or market value, whichever may be the lower, and to enter that amount in the profit and loss account and to put to reserve the balance of the money received from the insurance companies.

This was an appeal by the Crown from a decision of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

At meetings of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held in June, 1924, and April, 1925, to hear appeals the respondents, Messrs. J. Gliksten and Son, Limited, appealed against an assessment to income-tax in the estimated sum of £100,000 for the year ending April 5, 1924.

The company was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, on December 14, 1905, and carried on business as timber merchants at Stratford, E. On August 8, 1921, a large quantity of timber, which was stored in the company's timber yard, was destroyed by fire. In respect of the timber so destroyed the company received in February, 1922, £477,838 from various insurance companies.

The timber destroyed consisted mainly of the best class of hardwood, which was bought by the company seasoned, unseasoned, or partly seasoned. A large quantity of seasoned wood, which had been taken into stock before the War, was destroyed.

The company's accounts were made up to June 30 in each year, stocks being valued (according to the usual practice) at cost or market value, whichever was the lower. For that valuation large sums were in the last two years of account before the fire written off the original cost prices of the stock in respect of depreciation, to arrive at the closing stock values, and the reduced sums so arrived at were adopted each year to ascertain the company's profits for income-tax purposes. In respect of the stock on hand at June 30, 1921, which was the subject-matter of the appeal, the sums from time to time written off the stock values amounted in the aggregate to £107,000 or thereabouts, and the total stock on hand at that date was valued in the company's accounts at £266,831, after writing off £107,000.

For many years the company had kept its stock-in-trade insured against loss or damage by fire, and had, in computing its profits for income-tax purposes, been allowed to deduct the premiums paid by it in respect of the policies of insurance as an expense of its business. For the purposes of fire insurance the stock-in-trade of the company was valued at replacement value. At the date of the fire the value of timber of the kind which constituted the greater part of the company's stock was very high, and the company accordingly claimed from the insurance companies concerned, and was paid by them, in respect of the replacement value of the stock so destroyed, £477,838 2s. 4d. Out of that sum £160,824 (being part of the sum of £266,831, the value of stock in hand at June 30, 1921), estimated by the company to be the written-down value of the timber so destroyed, had been brought into the company's accounts for the year ending June 30, 1922, as a trading receipt.

After deducting £2,845 for law charges, £1,000 for expenses of clearing the yard, and £160,824, the balance of the moneys received from the insurance companies in respect of the destroyed timber, amounting to £313,168, was carried into the balance-sheet for the year ending June 30, 1922, as a reserve, but was not brought into the profit and loss account.

Mr. F. W. Gower, chartered accountant and advisory accountant to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who was examined before the Special Commissioners on behalf of the appellant, the inspector of taxes, stated in evidence that, in his experience as a chartered accountant extending over 20 years, the normal commercial method of dealing with moneys recovered by a trader under a policy of insurance in respect of stock destroyed by fire was to include the actual amount received in the accounts as an ordinary trading receipt in the same way as the proceeds of an ordinary sale of stock.

During the War the greater part of the company's trade consisted in supplying seasoned and specially selected timber of various kinds to Government Departments and various aircraft contractors. The timber required for those purposes was of a special character, and had to be, and was, picked out from the company's stocks. The whole of the company's stocks of the required types of timber, such as silver spruce, mahogany, walnut, and English ash, had (before the fire) been gone over in this way, and the company was, at the date of the fire, left in possession only of such portions of those stocks as had not been found suitable for the purposes mentioned. Since the Armistice the company had done an increasing business with the motor body-building industry and like industries, and that class of business had led to a demand for, and the company had stocked, timber of types and qualities different from those stocked by the company during and before the War. For that reason only a small portion of the timber destroyed by the fire had been replaced—namely, to an amount of £18,400, or thereabouts. The word "replaced" in that connexion included the purchase of timber suitable for purposes similar to those for which the destroyed timber had been intended, as well as timber of a precisely similar nature. The replacements by timber of a nature precisely similar to that of the timber destroyed were almost negligible.

At the date of the fire there was a boom, which was being prolonged by the adoption on the part of the larger timber merchants of a policy of "holding up" stocks. The high prices obtaining at that time, on the basis of which the insurance companies paid the company's claim, were due to that boom. The timber destroyed was of such a character that it would have been practically impossible to have put it on the market without causing a glut and destroying the market for the time being.

It was contended by the appellant, on behalf of the Crown, (a) that the whole sum received from the insurance companies in respect of the destroyed timber — namely, £477,838 — constituted a trading receipt, and should have been brought into the company's profit and loss account for the year in question; and (b) that the amount of the assessment should be £84,227, less £373 for wear and tear.

It was contended on behalf of the company, (a) that no part of the sum received by the company from the insurance companies in respect of the destroyed timber constituted a trading receipt; and (b) that no part of the difference between the £160,824 and the £477,838 constituted a trading profit.

The Special Commissioners decided that the £477,838 recovered from the insurance companies did not represent a trade receipt, and that no part of it was assessable as trade profits under Case I. of Schedule D, and they expressed the opinion that the burned timber which had been replaced should be brought into stock at the original cost price of the timber. That replacement need not be a purchase of timber precisely similar to that burned. It was sufficient if it were timber suitable for similar purposes. The Special Commissioners fixed the amount of replacements at £18,400, and reduced the assessment under appeal to nil.

The Crown appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the Crown; Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Cyril King for the respondents.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT, in giving judgment, said that the company's trading account was in the usual form. On one side of it there appeared the stock-in-trade in hand at the beginning of the year, the amount of purchases of stock, and the amount of expenses. On the other side were shown the sales and the stock-in-trade at the end of the year. The difference between the totals of those figures showed the gross profit of the year's trading. The stock which had been burned by the fire was not accounted for either in the sales or in the stock in hand at the end of the year. It was shown as timber destroyed.

At what figure was it so brought in? The timber had been replaced by the money paid by the insurance companies, but that money had not been brought in instead of the timber. Instead of that a figure had been brought in which was the estimated cost price of the timber. In other words, the insurance was treated, not as having provided money to take the place of the timber which had been burned, but as having prevented the fire.

In his opinion, what had really occurred must be recorded in the account. The timber which had been destroyed by the fire had to be accounted for. The company had received money in place of it. That money must be brought into the account.

It had been argued that it was not the business of the company to have fires and then to collect the insurance money from the insurance companies. That might be a very pretty way of stating it, but it was part of the company's business to buy, hold, and sell timber and to insure the timber while they held it, so that, if it were destroyed, they would have the money instead of it and as an item of the same account. The appeal must be allowed.

Judgment was entered accordingly for the Crown, with costs.

H. AND C. STEPHENSON v. WALLER.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Farmer — "Seller of milk"—Assessment under Schedule B—Additional assessment under Schedule D—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Case III., r. 4.

By rule 4 of the rules applicable to Case III. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918,

"If the Commissioners find that lands which have been charged under Schedule B on the assessable value and which are occupied by a dealer in cattle or a dealer in or a seller of milk are insufficient for the keep of the cattle brought on to the lands, so that the assessable value affords no just estimate of the profits, they may require a statement of the profits to be delivered, and charge such further sum thereon as, together with the charge under Schedule B, will make up the full sum wherewith the dealer or seller ought to be charged in respect of the like amount of profits charged according to rule 2 of the rules applicable to this Case."

Held, that a farmer may be a "seller of milk" within the above rule even though he merely sells, by wholesale, the milk produced on his farm; and it is not necessary that, to come within the rule, he should own some outside trading organization for the disposal of the milk.

This was a case stated by General Commissioners of Income Tax.

At a meeting of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for Leeds held on May 14, 1925, to hear appeals, the appellants, Messrs. H. and C. Stephenson, of Harper Farm, Farnley, near Leeds, appealed against an assessment to income-tax for the year ending April 5, 1921, in respect of the profits of their business as milk sellers, cattle dealers, and horse dealers, made upon them by the Additional Commissioners of Income Tax for the division under Rule 4, Case III., of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

Rule 4 of the Rules applicable to Case III. of Schedule D enacts that:—

"If the Commissioners find that lands which have been charged under Schedule B on the assessable value and which are occupied by a dealer in cattle or a dealer in or a seller of milk are insufficient for the keep of the cattle brought on to the lands, so that the assessable value affords no just estimate of the profits, they may require a statement of the profits to be delivered, and charge such further sum thereon as, together with the charge under Schedule B, will make up the full sum wherewith the dealer or seller ought to be charged in respect of the like amount of profits charged according to rule 2 of the rules applicable to this Case."

The appellants occupied 161 acres of agricultural land known as Harper Farm and Parkside Farm, both situate in the parish of Farnley, in the division of Leeds. In addition to the assessment under Schedule D, they were also assessed for the year in question under Schedule B of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of the occupation of the land in the sum of £536, being the assessable value, i.e., twice the annual value of the lands.

The appellants on the lands occupied by them kept milk cows, and sold the milk from such cows wholesale to Leeds retailers. No milk was sold retail and no milk for resale was bought by the appellants. A few pigs and poultry were also kept. The lands occupied by them comprised meadow, pasture, and arable land, and, being within the Leeds city boundary, were favourably situated for the conduct of the business so carried on.

At the hearing Mr. Harry Stephenson, a member of the appellant firm, giving evidence, stated that the lands were not insufficient to maintain the cattle brought thereon.

The respondent, an inspector of taxes, stated (a) that Mr. Stephenson had informed him at an interview on September 15, 1924, that the lands were insufficient to maintain the cattle brought thereon, that large quantities of foodstuffs were bought, and that he had been slightly interested in the horse trade; and (b) that the appellants' chartered accountant stated to him at an interview on October 31, 1924, that Mr. Stephenson had informed him that the land was not insufficient to maintain the cattle.

In the course of the hearing of the appeal it appeared from some very meagre details that the profits of the appellants for the year ending April 5, 1920, were about £1,925, but the General Commissioners considered it vitally necessary, before hearing certain witnesses (who, it was understood, were present to give evidence on behalf of the appellants to the effect that the lands were not insufficient to maintain the cattle brought thereon), and for the due consideration of the case, that a trading account of the appellants, including detailed analysis of all purchases and sales for the year ending April 5, 1920, should be supplied. The appellants agreed to produce such an account and the hearing was adjourned.

At an adjourned hearing on September 24, 1925, Mr. E. H. Vant, solicitor, of Settle, Yorkshire, appeared on behalf of the appellants. He called no witnesses and refused to produce the trading account, as he stated that, in the appellants' view, they were engaged in husbandry only, and that as they were assessable under Schedule B they could not be assessed in pursuance of Rule 4 of Case III. of Schedule D.

He contended (a) that the appellants were not liable to assessment under Rule 4 of Case III. of Schedule D; (b) that they were already fully assessed under Schedule B; (c) that before the appellants could be charged under Schedule D, Case III., Rule 4, the General Commissioners must find that the lands charged under Schedule B were occupied by a seller of milk, and that they were insufficient for the keep of the cattle brought on to them; (d) that the appellants were not sellers of milk within the meaning of the rule; (e) that the General Commissioners were wrong in refusing to hear the evidence brought by the appellants (essential to the proper determination of the case) that the lands were not insufficient for the keep of the cattle brought thereon; (f) that purchase of foodstuffs (being a common practice among farmers) was not of itself sufficient to justify the conclusion that the farmers' lands were insufficient for the keep of the cattle on them so as to give the Additional Commissioners jurisdiction to assess under Rule 4; (g) that the General Commisioners wrongfully admitted as evidence the statement of the respondent that Mr.

* Reported by G. F. L. Bridgman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Harry Stephenson had, before the hearing, admitted to him that the lands were insufficient to maintain the cattle brought thereon, which was denied by the appellants in evidence at the hearing.

The inspector of taxes contended (1) that the appellants were sellers of milk; (2) that the lands were insufficient for the keep of the cattle brought thereon; (3) that the assessable value afforded no just estimate of the profits; and (4) that the assessment was rightly made and should be confirmed.

The General Commissioners found that the appellants were not dealers in cattle, dealers in milk, or dealers in horses, but were sellers of milk, within the meaning of Rule 4, Case III., Schedule D. They were unable to accept the contention of the appellants that, if they were engaged in husbandry, they were necessarily assessable under Schedule B only, and could not be assessable under Rule 4, Case III., Schedule D.

It appeared to the General Commissioners that liability under Rule 4, Case III., Schedule D, arose if three conditions were fulfilled—namely, (1) that the appellants occupied land; (2) that the appellants were dealers in cattle, or dealers in or sellers of milk; and (3) that the lands so occupied were insufficient for the keep of cattle brought on them so that the assessable value under Schedule B afforded no just estimate of the profits.

In the opinion of the General Commissioners, the first two conditions were fulfilled, and, to investigate the applicability of the third condition, they required the appellants to furnish for their information the certified trading account and analysis referred to. The appellants having refused to comply with the General Commissioners' order to furnish the evidence which they considered necessary to complete fully their inquiry, the General Commissioners confirmed the assessment.

The appellants accordingly appealed.

Mr. Cyril King appeared for the appellants; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Reginald P. Hills for the Crown.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in delivering judgment, said that, for the appellants to be liable to additional assessment under Schedule D, they must be either dealers in cattle or dealers in or sellers of milk, and the lands occupied by them must be not only insufficient to maintain the cattle on them, but must be insufficient so that their assessable value under Schedule B afforded no just estimate of their profits. A farmer might buy foodstuffs for his cattle in the ordinary course of husbandry without bringing himself within Rule 4. The General Commissioners had found that the appellants were "sellers of milk" within that Rule, and Mr. King had contended, in effect, that there was no evidence to support that finding. Mr. King had said that a man was not a seller of milk unless in some way he carried on the business of selling milk otherwise than by simply disposing wholesale of the milk which was produced on his farm. He had argued that there must be some sort of business outside the farm, a shop or something of that sort.

He (his Lordship) agreed that merely because a farmer habitually sold a little milk to his neighbours by retail he would not become a "seller of milk" within the rule. To come within the rule a farmer must make the production of milk his primary business. Mr. King had said that in such a case he would be merely a dairy farmer and not a "seller of milk." In his (his Lordship's) opinion, however, a man might be a dairy farmer and also a "seller of milk." He could see no reason for holding that a man, to be a "seller of milk," must not only devote his farm to the production of milk, which he sold, but must also have some outside trading organization for the disposal of the milk. That, indeed, would not be relevant to the principle which underlay Rule 4. The question dealt with in that Rule was whether the assessment of a farm as a farm was or was not just, and that question was not affected by what the farmer did outside the farm.

In the present case the appellants' farm was wholly populated by cows, except for a few pigs and some poultry. The General Commissioners had to deal with a farm which was used for practically nothing else but cows, whose milk was sold wholesale. That was evidence on which they could come to the conclusion that the appellants were "sellers of milk." The General Commissioners were entitled to ask for the appellants' trading account, so that they could see by figures how far the assessment of the appellants' farm under Schedule B was a just criterion of the appellants' profits.

The decision of the General Commissioners on the other issues in the case could be supported by abundant evidence, and, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Sargant and Lawrence, L.JJ.)
1927. Dec. 12.

IN RE WHEATER.*

Lunacy—Receiver of lunatic's estate—Order to pay to creditors — Death of lunatic before drawing up of order—Cesser of jurisdiction in lunacy.

An order was made in lunacy for the payment of £1,800 out of the lunatic's assets to certain of his creditors. The lunatic died three days after the order was made and before it was drawn up.

Held, that the death of the lunatic operated as a cesser of the jurisdiction in lunacy, and therefore the order ceased to be operative, and the executors of the lunatic were entitled to ask to have all his assets transferred to them. The creditors could not claim that they had any charge in respect of the proposed payment; for the order was made at the instance of the receiver, as a matter concerning the management of the lunatic's estate only, and the persons receiving the £1,800 would have had no interest or right in that sum until payment was actually made to them.

This was an appeal from a decision of Master Hildyard in Chambers upon a summons in an administration action in lunacy.

The following facts are taken from the judgment of the Master of the Rolls:—

"This case raises an interesting point in lunacy practice. This man (Mr. Wheater) was certified in 1924. On May 1 of that year a receiver was appointed. The lunatic had been engaged in building operations. His business was considerable, and it was thought that it would be for the benefit of his creditors that that business should be continued, and so the receiver had leave to continue. In March, 1925, an order was made to distribute some £4,000 amongst his creditors; these were all the creditors generally. Then on June 17, 1926, there was an order made to distribute another sum of £4,000 among creditors who were creditors after the receivership order. Then on May 26, 1927, an order was made to raise out of the assets of the estate (which included sums of Conversion Loan and War Stock) a sum of £1,800, which was to be paid amongst the creditors as existing after the receivership order. Three days later the lunatic died; that was on May 29. On July 22 a summons was taken out by the executors and on July 29 that summons was heard, and the purport was for a final order and the winding-up of the estate so that the balance should be handed over to the executors. The Master refused to make the order, except on the terms that the order of May 26 should be drawn up and given effect to, and that the £1,800 should be distributed amongst the creditors, as by that order provided. The executors now appeal, and they say that the right to receive the balance of the estate has passed to them, and that they, as executors, are entitled now to receive the money of the lunatic. On the other hand there are creditors here before us who would have received money under the order of May 26 to pay out that sum of £1,800, and they say that though the order was not drawn up yet it is an effective order within the meaning of Order LII., Rule 13, an order which ought to be drawn up, and which, when drawn up, will have full effect as from the date when it was made."

* Reported by G. T. Whitfield-Hayes, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. C. E. JENKINS, K.C., and Mr. H. SIMMONS, for the appellants, contended that the death of the lunatic stopped all proceedings in lunacy, exactly as if he had recovered and resumed control of his own affairs. In re Bennett—Greenwood v. Bennett ([1913] 2 Ch., 318), In re Marman's Trusts (8 Ch.D., 256), and In re Walker ([1907] 2 Ch., 120) all supported that view. In re E. G. ([1914] 1 Ch., 927) was distinguishable, because there the creditor claiming had a definite charge. They also referred to Theobald on Lunacy, Chapter 70, page 494.

Mr. OWEN THOMPSON, K.C., and Mr. P. B. MORLE for the respondents (creditors who would have received some of the £1,800), argued that the order of May 26 once made conferred definite rights as to the sum indicated. The subsequent drawing up of the order was a mere ministerial act; for when the order had been made the persons who would have the £1,800 were entitled to say that the Court had allotted it to them, and that they had a prior claim upon it. In re E. G. (supra) was authority for the contention of the respondents that when rights were vested under an order of the Court they could not be divested except by appeal against the order within the ordinary limits.

Mr. TOMLIN, for other creditors, supported this argument.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, having stated the facts, continued (referring to the contention of the respondents):—Now it seems to me that that contention, which has led to a very interesting argument, is not correct. The receiver is introduced in lunacy not as a receiver in ordinary Chancery proceedings. He is placed there to deal with money as agent of the lunatic, who will still and always be his principal. The Court has jurisdiction in lunacy only so long as the lunatic remains alive, or remains insane. The power of the Court would and does determine when the lunatic recovers, and it seems to me that the power of the Court must also determine by the lunatic's death. In the present case the lunatic's death took place at a time when an order for dealing with the lunatic's estate had been made, but not perfected, and I think that after the death all the estate of the lunatic passed to his executors.

Now what is the position of these creditors, and what are their rights under that order? They were not represented at the making of the order of May 26. That order was made in their interests, it is true, and they would have received benefits under it, but at the same time the order was made quite independently of them, probably without their knowledge as to its terms, and it did not, I think, give any right or title to persons named in the order or coming under its provisions; whether they had any knowledge of it before or after it was made or not, in my opinion, they were complete strangers to the making of the order. If they had been entitled to payment under a contract, and nothing remained to be done but to make payment to them under that contract, and the order was to that effect, then the position might have been different, but it seems to me that in the present circumstances, so far from these creditors being in any way concerned in the making of the order, they were strangers to the order when it was made.

Now it is said in argument that the position might have been different if the order had not been made until after the lunatic died, but, as it was actually made before he died, it must stand and be given effect to. To me, however, it seems that for this purpose we must regard the order as not being perfected. Until it is actually effective, and has been put into operation, there is an opportunity for those applying for it, or even for those affected by it, to make application to have it varied, or rescinded, and therefore I think that it is not yet a perfect order, and I do not think that that is inconsistent with the fact that if and when ultimately perfected it speaks from the date when it is first made, in this case May 26.

Moreover, I think that the creditors have another difficulty in supporting their claim, because the order was made in lunacy, dealing with funds which are in lunacy, and I think that such an order was never intended to deal with the case where the funds were no longer in lunacy. This is not a case where, as under the terms of Order XVII., a cause or matter does not become abated by reason of the death of one of the parties. I think that in this case before the order was perfected there was a transmission of the interest in the lunatic's assets to the executors. The case of In re Bennett—Greenwood v. Bennett ([1913] 2 Ch., 318) illustrates this point. There the mother was a lunatic. She had daughters, and there had been a system in force under which sums had to be paid to the daughters, and other sums reserved for the lunatic. As regards the balance over after providing for the keep of the lunatic, an order was made for payment to the daughters. The lunatic died and the daughters claimed certain payments under the order. Mr. Justice Warrington, as he then was, says (at p. 323): "I will treat the matter, however, as if it depended on the order of March 12, 1908. Is there any jurisdiction now to order that the fund shall be dealt with as if the lunatic were still alive? In my opinion there is not. On the death of the lunatic the committee ceased to have any authority to deal with money in his hands except as the Rules in Lunacy provide—i.e., to hand it over to the administrator or to pay it into Court.

Except for this purpose the powers and duties of the committee come to an end on a supersedeas or the death of the lunatic." So in the present case I think that on May 29 all the powers of the receiver came to an end. He had one duty only—namely, to ascertain the balance of the lunatic's funds and hand it over to the executors, and, if it seems hard that he could not pay that sum of £1,800 to those creditors for whom it was intended, that only means that the changes and chances of this mortal life have intervened to prevent him from doing so. The creditors still have hopes from the estate, but it seems that even if the lunatic had remained alive they would not have taken any ascertained interest in the fund until it was paid over to them.

And so I think that before the order was made complete the lunacy jurisdiction ceased entirely, and that the executors became entitled to the moneys and securities remaining in the estate. As, however, I understand that an administration action is pending, the order will be that the money in the hands of the receiver in lunacy be paid over to the credit of that action, without prejudice to any rights which the creditors may have, and to any rights of retainer in the executors.

Lord Justice Sargant.—I am of the same opinion. The question before us is whether this £1,800 will be used for a preferential payment to certain creditors since the receiver was appointed, or whether it will go as a payment amongst all the creditors. (His Lordship stated the facts, and continued.) The Master took the view that the order of May 26, 1927, although not perfected, was an order which had given definite rights to the persons amongst whom the receiver would have distributed the £1,800 in question, and accordingly he declined to make the order for transfer to the executors, except subject to the priority of those who would have received the £1,800. The executors of the lunatic object to the creditors since the date of the receivership having this £1,800 ; first because the order never was perfected during the life of the lunatic. It would have been effective if it had been drawn up, and from the date when it was pronounced, but the executors say that the death of the lunatic prevented the final touch being given to the order, and caused the order itself to become inoperative. The death of the lunatic, they say, had put an end to lunacy proceedings altogether, and the lunacy jurisdiction had ceased before the order was perfected. In my opinion, the executors are right in that contention, and although the Master, since the death of the lunatic, has directed that the order should be perfected, I do not think that that was a right direction, because his jurisdiction in lunacy ceased entirely at the death and he could not turn that order in abeyance into an effective order. Secondly, it is said that even if the order had been perfected during the lifetime of the lunatic, nevertheless the order did not give to those creditors any right on which they were entitled to insist. The order was made simply and solely on the application of the receiver, without, I think, any other person being present. It was an order of a purely domestic character. The Court decided to grant it as a matter of what I might call domestic management, and I think that it gave no right to the persons who were to be paid the £1,800, for the Court could have rescinded or varied it at any time, and I do not think that it would have been necessary to serve the persons who were to be paid with any notice of that proposed rescission or variation. It does not seem to me that it conferred any definite rights on these creditors, and therefore until the order was actually drawn up and put into operation the matter was as much at large as if it had never been made at all, therefore I think the order asked for by the executors should be made.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—I agree. The determination of this question, in my opinion, depends on the realization of the proper position of the receiver. Sir Herbert Cozens-Hardy, M.R., in In re E. G. ([1914] 1 Ch., 927) stated that the position of a person acting in lunacy is that of statutory agent to the lunatic. He says at page 933 : "What then is the position in point of law of the quasi-committee ? I think that he is a statutory agent of the lunatic who cannot himself appoint an agent. He acts on behalf of the lunatic under the statutory powers conferred upon him." I think that, as stated in In re Walker ([1907] 2 Ch., 120), his duties cease with the death of the lunatic. In that case Sir Herbert Cozens-Hardy, M.R., dealing with the powers and duties of a person appointed to represent the lunatic, says (at p. 124) : "Those cease with the death, not in the sense that he is not bound to account for receipts during the life, but in the sense that he has no right to receive anything after the death of the lunatic." Lord Justice Kennedy in the same case says (at p. 125) : "Supposing the committee and receiver had made payments after the death of the lunatic and sought to get credit for them in passing the accounts. How could he discharge himself on the credit side of his account by payments which he had no jurisdiction to make because the period of his duties had come to an end ? " Applying that reasoning to the present case the order of May 26, 1927, which was, as Lord Justice Sargant put it, purely a domestic order, obtained by the receiver alone, not at the instance of or by agreement with any other person, was only an order to realize certain assets and to pay certain debts. Now the lunatic has died, and that at once determined the jurisdiction as regards the receiver and, in my opinion, it was just as if a principal had died for whom that receiver was acting as statutory agent, the death of the principal determining the authority of the agent. I think that in those circumstances the Master might have done one of two things—not have drawn up the order of May 26 at all, or he might have rescinded the order and dealt with the costs. I think that he had no right to direct the receiver to act, when the receiver, by reason of the death of the lunatic, had ceased to exercise his functions. Counsel for the creditors put forward the suggestion that by this order of May 26 a charge was given in favour of these creditors. I do not think that that is so. This case is not like In re E. G. (supra), where a creditor, the solicitor acting for the lunatic's estate, had obtained a charge, or something to that effect, for his costs. Here the order made was purely a domestic order, obtained at the instance of the receiver alone, and could have been revoked without the creditors concerned having any right to protest, and it did not give any charge or right to the creditors whom it was proposed to pay.

I think that in the present case the order made amounted to nothing more than certain proposals and directions as to what the receiver was to do in the future, and the lunatic having died all proceedings in lunacy had come to an end. Therefore, in my view, there is no answer to the claim of the executors to have the funds transferred to them.

K.B. Div. } 1927.
(Avory, Branson, and Talbot, JJ.) } Dec. 15.

WADSWORTH v. MINISTER OF HEALTH.*

Pensions — Widow — Statutory conditions—Husband's entry into insurance—Subsequent payment of 104 contributions—Whether "entry" means "last entry"—Widows', Orphans', and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 70), s. 5.

The expression "entry into insurance" in s. 5 of the Widows', Orphans', and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925, means "last entry into insurance."

This was a special case stated for the opinion of the Court under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, by Mr. B. A. Cohen, K.C., and Mr. Eustace Hills, K.C., the referees selected by the National Health Insurance Joint Committee to determine a question referred under section 29 (2) of the Widows', Orphans', and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925, as to the applicant's right to a pension under the Act.

The following facts were proved or admitted :— The applicant, Mrs. Lottie Wadsworth, claimed to be entitled under the Act to a widow's pension (with additional allowances) as the widow of Mr. James Oscar Wadsworth, who died on November 26, 1926. Mr. Wadsworth was employed by Messrs. McQuat, Limited, of Leeds, as a manager from 1912 to 1926 (saving a period of War service). He was a member of an approved society—namely, the Manchester Unity of Oddfellows' Friendly Society—and was compulsorily insured under the National Insurance Act, 1911. The first contribution was paid by or in respect of him on July 15, 1912, and the last contribution was paid on July 3, 1915, between which dates his contributions were paid in full. Thereafter his rate of remuneration was in excess of the limit (£160 per annum up to June 30, 1919, and £250 per annum thereafter) for compulsory insurance in the case of a non-manual worker.

On January 4, 1926, Mr. Wadsworth became a voluntary contributor under the provisions of the Act. His first contribution was paid on January 4, 1926. His weekly contributions were paid regularly thereafter until his death on November 26, 1926. On December 1, 1926, the applicant applied to the Minister of Health, claiming to be entitled to a pension. By a letter of December 30, 1926, the Minister rejected her claim for the following reason : "It has not been established that at the time of the death of your late husband 104 contributions had been paid by or in respect of him since his last entry into insurance."

The applicant duly made application for a reference. The referees heard the arguments for and against the decision, and agreed to state a case for the opinion of the Court as to the meaning of the expression "entry into insurance" in section 5 (a) of the Widows', Orphans', and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925. But they expressed the view (in a letter to the applicant's advisers, written by the Registrar of Appeals on May 18, 1927) that if the applicant succeeded in the contention that "entry into insurance" did not mean "last entry" the case would have to be remitted to the referees, as it appeared that the conditions of section 5 (b), which had not been complied with, would then apply. They offered a further hearing on that point, and, after further correspondence, the applicant's advisers agreed to a further hearing without prejudice to the contention that the point was not open to the Minister (who did not ask for leave to rely on any contentions other than that set out in the letter of December 30, 1926).

Section 2 (1) of the Widows', Orphans', and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925, provides :—

"In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the expression 'insured' means insured under the National Health Insurance Act, 1924 (in this Act referred to as the Insurance Act), or the Acts repealed by that Act, and in relation to any person who is deemed to be insured for the purposes of this Act includes such a person ; and the expression 'insurance' in relation to a person so deemed to be insured shall be construed accordingly."

Section 3 (1) provides :—

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, the widow of a person who dies after the commencement of this Act and who is insured at the date of his death but has not attained the age of seventy before the commencement of this Act shall, if the statutory conditions hereinafter mentioned are complied with, be entitled to a widow's pension. . . ."

Section 5 provides :—

"The statutory conditions to be complied with in the case of a person in respect of whose insurance a widow's pension . . . is payable are :—

"(a) that one hundred and four weeks have elapsed and one hundred and four contributions have been paid by or in respect of that person since the date of his entry into insurance ; and

"(b) where two hundred and eight weeks or more have elapsed since the date of the entry of that person into insurance, that the number of contributions paid, or deemed in accordance with regulations under this Act to have been paid, by or in respect of him for the three contribution years immediately prior to his death, or to the date on which contributions under the Insurance Act ceased to be payable by or in respect of him by reason of his age, as the case may be, represents on the average not less than twenty-six contributions calculated in the prescribed manner in respect of each of those three years."

By section 44 (1) "Expressions in this Act have the same meaning as in the Insurance Act." Neither Act defined the expression "entry into insurance," but the use of that expression in the Insurance Act, in sections 13 and 14, related to the "last entry." This seemed to be the result of reading these sections with s. 3 (4) of that Act, though, as was said by Mr. Justice Avory during the argument, "It would be difficult to see how this could be made more obscure."

By the Calculation of Contributions Regulations, 1927 (S. R. and O., 1927, No. 862), Reg. 5, it is provided :—

"In calculating for the purpose of para. (b) of section 5 of the Pensions Act . . . the average number of contributions paid by or in respect of an insured person within the meaning of that Act, a contribution shall be deemed to have been paid . . . (iii) in the case of a person who entered into insurance for the purposes of the Pensions Act after the commencement of the first of the contribution years in respect of which the calculation is made in respect of every two weeks which have elapsed between the commencement of that contribution year and the date of his entry into insurance for the purposes aforesaid."

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was contended on behalf of the applicant :—

(1) That the decision of the Minister was wrong in law, in that the Minister had, in construing section 5 (a) of the Act, substituted for the words "entry into insurance" the words "last entry into insurance." (2) That upon the true constructions of sections 5 (a) and 2 (1) of the Act the facts above stated established that the date of the entry of the deceased man into insurance for the purpose of section 5 (a) was July 15, 1912, and that, accordingly, 104 weeks had elapsed and 104 contributions had been paid by or in respect of him since his entry into insurance. (3) That it was not open to the referees to entertain any grounds for the rejection of the applicant's claim other than those set out in the letter of December 30, 1926. (4) Alternatively, that the provisions of section 5 (b) of the Act had been duly complied with by Mr. Wadsworth, inasmuch as by virtue of the Contributory Pensions (Calculation of Contributions) Regulations, 1927, Regulation 5 (3), he was deemed to have paid the average contributions required by section 5 (b) for the three contribution years immediately before his death.

On behalf of the Minister it was contended :—

(1) That the deceased husband ceased to be an insured person in the year 1915, and became again insured on January 4, 1926. (2) That by virtue of sections 2 and 44 (1) of the Act the term "date of entry into insurance" had the same meaning as in the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, and that where the term occurred in that Act, e.g., in sections 13 (2) and (3) and 14 (3), it denoted the last entry into insurance. (3) That the referees had power, under Regulation (9) of the Contributory Pensions (References) Regulations, 1925, at any stage of the proceedings, to allow amendment of any application, statement, or particulars, and, under Regulation 14 of these Regulations, power to allow either the applicant or the Minister to rely upon any contentions other than that set out in the application for a reference. (4) Alternatively, that before allowing an appeal the referees were, upon the facts proved before them at the first hearing, bound to have regard to the question whether the statutory conditions imposed by section 5 of the Act had been complied with. (5) That if, contrary to the contention of the Minister, the date of entry of Mr. Wadsworth into insurance for the purpose of section 5 (a) of the Act was July 15, 1912, that date must also be the date of entry for the purposes of paragraph (b) of the same section, and the case accordingly fell within the latter paragraph, since more than 208 weeks had elapsed between the date of his entry, July 15, 1912, and the date of his death (November, 1926). (6) That the statutory condition contained in paragraph (b) had not been satisfied for the following reasons :—(a) An average of 26 contributions a year was not in fact paid by or in respect of the deceased husband during the three contribution years immediately before his death (July, 1923, to July, 1926) ; and (b) he was not entitled to be credited with any additional contributions under Regulation 5 (iii) of the Contributory Pensions (Calculation of Contributions) Regulations, 1927, since he had not entered into insurance for the purpose of the Pensions Act after the beginning of the first of the three contribution years, and consequently the paragraph had no application to the case.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were :—(1) Whether the conditions of section 5 (a) of the Pensions Act had been complied with in the case of Mr. Wadsworth. (2) Whether it was open to the referees upon the facts above stated to entertain any grounds for the rejection of the applicant's claim other than that set out in the letter of December 30, 1926. (3) Whether the conditions of section 5 (b) of the Pensions Act had been complied with in the case of Mr. Wadsworth.

Mr. Willoughby Jardine, K.C., and Mr. John Neal appeared for the applicant ; Mr. Harold Murphy for the Minister of Health.

Mr. Justice Avory said that, as this was a consultative case, the practice was merely to answer the questions asked without more. The majority of the Court were of opinion that the answer to question No. 1 was in the negative ; to No. 2 in the affirmative ; to No. 3 in the negative.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE v. HOPE.*

Insurance (Life)—Policy for one year—Assignment—Renewal for three months—Death of assured during renewal period—Policy money—Whether belonging to testator's estate or to assignee.

The plaintiffs' testator took out an insurance policy on his life for 12 months and assigned the benefit of it to the defendant absolutely. Before the expiry of the policy he renewed it for a further period of three months, and the policy was altered by endorsement, no new policy being issued and no fresh stamp duty being paid. While the further period of three months was running, the testator died.

Held, that as the intention was to continue and extend the original contract but not to rescind it, the renewed policy enured for the benefit of the defendant, and not for the benefit of the testator's estate.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, the Royal Exchange Assurance, from a decision of Mr. Justice Tomlin.

The plaintiffs were the personal representatives of a testator, Mr. Samuel Barker, who had taken out a policy for £1,000 in the Sun Life Insurance Society on his own life for one year from July 31, 1925, and had subsequently assigned the benefit of the policy to the defendant, Mrs. Hope, absolutely. Notice of the assignment was given to the society on September 3, 1925.

The testator was in California when the policy had nearly run out, and his solicitors cabled to him for instructions whether he wanted the policy renewed, and they stated the terms on which the society would extend it for three months. He cabled to them to accept the offer and renew the policy till October 31, 1926. On October 1, 1926, he died. The question raised was whether the renewed policy enured for the benefit of the defendant, or whether the policy moneys belonged to the plaintiffs, as representing the testator's estate. Mr. Justice Tomlin gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appealed.

* Reported by H. Langford Lewis, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. S. L. Porter, K.C., and Mr. Macgillivray appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Archer, K.C., and Mr. H. Johnston for the respondent.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in his considered judgment, stated the facts, and said that the schedule on the face of the policy which described the event in which the sum assured was payable—namely, "the death of the life assured on or before the 31st July, 1926"—had the words added, "altered by endorsement." No fresh stamp duty was paid. The original policy stood, but one of its terms, the time limit, was extended, just as in a policy containing a restriction on foreign residence that term might be withdrawn so as to make the assurance world-wide on the payment of an extra premium.

The executors of Mr. Barker claimed that the contract of insurance operative at the time of his death was not the original one assigned to the defendant, but a new and separate policy altogether—a contract insuring the life from August 1 to October 31, 1926, at a separate premium of £6 2s. 6d., and that that policy did not pass to the defendant. Mr. Justice Tomlin had decided that the testator entered into the contract for the extended period as trustee for the defendant, and that she was entitled to the moneys payable under it.

In his (the Master of the Rolls's) opinion it was impossible to hold that the insurance for the extra period of three months was a new and separate contract. The terms offered and accepted were for a short extension of the contract then in being and unexpired, and no suggestion was made for a new and independent policy. There was no fresh stamp, as there must have been had a new policy been effected, and no new number was assigned to the contract. The alteration was subsidiary to the main purpose of the original contract, and the subject matter of the risk was not changed. The observations of Lord Sumner in British and Beningtons, Limited v. North Western Cachar Tea Company ([1923] A.C., 48, at pp. 68, 69), appeared to be in point. The variation might be in strict logic a new contract, but the discharge of the old contract was a matter of intention, and here the intention appeared to have been to continue and extend it, but not to rescind it. In Morris v. Baron and Co. ([1918] A.C., 1) it was held that a clear intention to rescind must be shown for the old contract to be rescinded. The distinction was well pointed out by Lord Ellenborough in Kensington v. Inglis (8 East, 273, at p. 293), where it was held that a fresh stamp was not required because of an alteration in the dates of sailing. Section 13 of the Statute 35 Geo. III., c. 63, excused the necessity of a fresh stamp in such cases.

There remained the point taken by the plaintiffs that at the time when the extension was made all interest in the policy had passed to the defendant by the assignment, so that the deceased man had no rights or power in relation to it, and that the defendant had no insurable interest in the deceased man's life, so that he could not act as her agent. In his (his Lordship's) opinion, however, the deceased man could enlarge or improve the policy with the consent of the society, and the enlargement or improvement enured to the benefit of the defendant. If during the original term policy No. 276,732 had been increased to £1,500 by the payment of an additional premium, the extra £500 would have been receivable by the defendant.

That view made it unnecessary to consider the point on which Mr. Justice Tomlin based his judgment—namely, that Mr. Barker, when he effected the extension, acted as trustee for the defendant. But the principle could be adopted, if necessary, in the present case, and the money received, even if it were treated as received under a separate contract, must be treated as received under a contract made by a trustee for the defendant, who could enforce her rights as a beneficiary under it, as in Lloyd's v. Harper (16 Ch. D., 290). The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LONDON HOLEPROOF HOSIERY COMPANY, LIMITED v. PADMORE.*

Vendor and Purchaser — Lessees' option of purchase—Destruction of premises by fire—Subsequent exercise of option—Refusal of lessor to reinstate premises—Repudiation of contract by lessees—Specific performance.

The defendant demised to the plaintiffs for three years a piece of land with a factory on it, and the plaintiffs were to keep the inside of the factory in repair. The agreement said nothing as to the repair of the outside and as to insurance, but gave the plaintiffs an option of purchase during the term. The defendant insured the factory against fire, and, on the occurrence of a fire which almost completely destroyed it, he received compensation from the insurance company. The plaintiffs then gave notice of the exercise of their option of purchase, but the defendant declined to reinstate the walls and roof and alleged that in exercising the option the plaintiffs had to take the property as it was. In an action for a declaration that in these circumstances the plaintiffs were not bound to proceed with the purchase the defendant counterclaimed for specific performance.

Held, that as the plaintiffs had elected to insist upon exercising their option it was now too late for them to repudiate the contract, and therefore the action failed and the counterclaim for specific performance succeeded.

In this action the plaintiffs, the London Holeproof Hosiery Company, Limited, claimed from the defendant, (1) damages for breach of contract (if any), and (2), in the alternative, a declaration that the plaintiffs were not bound to proceed with the purchase of a factory, and an order for the return of £160 paid as deposit.

The defendant counterclaimed for specific performance.

By an agreement, dated August 20, 1925, the defendant demised to the plaintiffs a piece of land at Woodgate Rothby, Leicestershire, with a factory fitted with machinery thereon, for the term of three years from August 1, 1925, at a rent of £60 a year.

* Reported by H. C. GARSIA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The agreement contained a provision that the plaintiffs should keep in good repair and condition at all times during the term the inside of the factory and premises. The agreement was silent as to keeping in repair the outside of the factory and as to keeping it insured. It contained an option for the plaintiffs to purchase the factory and premises on or before June 24, 1927, at the price of £1,600 on giving to the defendant six months' notice in writing and paying a deposit of £160 and all arrears of rent up to the date fixed for completion.

In November, 1926, the factory was almost completely destroyed by fire. The factory had been insured by the defendant against fire and he received the sum of £625 from the insurance company.

Correspondence ensued between the parties and on December 8, 1926, the defendant's solicitors wrote to the plaintiffs saying :—

"According to the agreement you are responsible for payment of rent of the factory until August 1, 1928, notwithstanding the fact of the fire which has occurred, and you are similarly liable to repair the interior of the premises. . . . Our client is obtaining an estimate for the necessary repair of the exterior roof and exterior walls and will be glad to know that you appreciate the responsibility for the repair and replacement of the interior and will be glad to know when this work will be put in hand."

To that the plaintiffs' solicitor replied on December 13, 1926 :—

"My clients in no way suggest that they do not intend to carry out their obligations under the agreement for tenancy and they are quite willing to proceed with the repairs as soon as your client has put the building in such a condition that it can be repaired. I understand it is quite obvious that there is nothing in the nature of internal repairs which can be carried out until after your client has replaced the building. It has occurred to me that as your client is dealing with the roof and walls, &c., it might be advisable if you put me into touch with the builder who is doing your client's work."

In answer to that the defendant's solicitors wrote on December 14 stating that they were obtaining an estimate of the work required for external repairs.

On December 20, 1926, the plaintiffs' solicitor gave the defendant a notice in writing exercising the option to purchase and paid a deposit of £160. That notice was accompanied by a covering letter in which the plaintiffs' solicitor said that it was, of course, necessary for the building to be placed in proper repair by the defendant at the earliest possible moment, and pointing out that the plaintiffs would have the freehold of the property when reinstated by the defendant. The defendant's solicitors replied on December 22 :—

"In reference to your suggestion that the building should be placed in proper repair by our client we can only say this is a misconception of the position. Your clients in exercising the option take the property in its present state subject to and with the benefit of the tenancy agreement, which contains no covenant on our client's part to repair."

The plaintiffs' solicitor replied saying that he could not agree that there was any misconception of the position on the plaintiffs' part. Further correspondence ensued, in which each side maintained the same position. Requisitions were delivered and answers made maintaining the same opposed views. Ultimately, on March 2, 1927, the plaintiffs brought this action, claiming (1) damages for the breach of contract (if any) ; and (2), in the alternative, a declaration that the plaintiffs were not bound to proceed with the purchase, and an order for the return of the deposit of £160.

The defendant counterclaimed for specific performance.

Mr. C. A. Bennett, K.C., and Sir Arthur Underhill appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. H. A. H. Christie for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Tomlin, in giving judgment, said that this was a somewhat unusual and difficult case. Having stated the facts and referred to the correspondence, he said that the effect of the letter of December 22 was to inform the plaintiffs that the defendant repudiated any suggested liability to reinstate the premises, and it might well be that the plaintiffs might then have said that in that case the exercise of the option could not stand, because it was based on a misapprehension. That was not the course which the plaintiffs took, but, on the contrary, their solicitor wrote a letter on December 30 putting forward their view of the construction of the contract. Later on, they made a requisition that the insurance money should be applied in reinstating the property.

The transaction was not unprofitable to the defendant if the plaintiffs were wrong in their view. The defendant was selling a damaged article for the price of the perfect article, and, at the same time, he was putting in his pocket money paid to him by the insurance company to indemnify him against his loss. But he (his Lordship) was only concerned with the legal position.

The point advanced by the plaintiffs was that the contract was for the purchase of the reinstated premises. It seemed to him that that view amounted to a contention that when the option was granted the grantor must guarantee that the property would be in the same condition when the option was exercised. He did not know how it would be if there had been a change in the condition of the property between the grant of the option and its exercise and if the change was unknown to the purchasers. But here the purchasers were aware of the deterioration of the property and, notwithstanding that, they exercised the option. It was true that in doing so they said that the vendor must reconstruct the premises before completion, but the vendor at once pointed out that that was a misconception.

He (his Lordship) thought that it was probably then open to the purchasers to say that the option had been exercised under a misapprehension and that they would not go on with it. But they did nothing of the kind. They elected to go on, relying, first, on the defendant's being bound to reinstate the property, and, secondly, on the insurance money being applicable for the purpose. They must be taken to have gone on in reliance on their view of the construction of the contract.

Could they at a later stage repudiate the contract ? It seemed to him that they were too late. Further, there was no ground for the view suggested, that the plaintiffs thought that they were buying one thing and the defendant thought that he was selling another thing. Both parties thought that they were dealing with the damaged property, but the plaintiffs thought that they could make the defendant put it right.

The action, therefore, failed, and the defendant's counterclaim for specific performance succeeded, with the usual consequences as to costs.

THE ROYAL STAR.*

Ship—Shipping casualty—Court of Inquiry in British Possession — Shipmaster censured—Rehearing—Right of appeal—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., c. 60), ss. 475, 478 — Merchant Shipping Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII., c. 48), s. 66.

A Court of Inquiry at Singapore, Straits Settlements, which sat to investigate the stranding of the London steamship Royal Star on some unidentified submerged object between Sumatra and the mainland, found the master of the vessel guilty of negligence and censured him, but declared that it did not deem it necessary to deal with his certificate. The shipmaster applied to the Board of Trade for a rehearing, which was refused. On appeal, Held, that whether or not a shipmaster whose certificate had been neither cancelled nor suspended had a right of appeal under ss. 475 and 478 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, the matter was put beyond doubt by s. 66 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1906, which was passed in order to enlarge the right of appeal; that the appellant, as a person who, having an interest in the investigation or inquiry, had appeared at the hearing and was affected by the decision of the Court, was entitled under s. 66 to appeal in the same manner and subject to the same conditions in and subject to which a shipmaster might appeal under ss. 475 and 478 of the Act of 1894 against the cancelling or suspension of his certificate.

This was a motion on behalf of the master of the Blue Star steamship Royal Star for the decision of a preliminary point as to the right of a master to appeal from a decision of a Court of Inquiry held at Singapore, censuring him for the neglect of which the Court found he had been guilty in connexion with the damage sustained by his vessel through striking on a submerged object between the mainland and the Island of Sumatra.

Mr. C. R. DUNLOP, K.C. (with him Mr. R. F. Hayward), who appeared for the applicant, said that the Admiralty Registrar had made an order giving the master leave to appeal for the purpose of determining as a preliminary point whether there was a right of appeal against the report of a Court of Inquiry, which censured the applicant but did not interfere with his certificate in any way. The Board of Trade, who had refused to sanction the rehearing of the case, raised two objections, he understood, to the jurisdiction of the Divisional Court:—(1) That no appeal lay to any Court where the Court of Inquiry, by its report, did not suspend or cancel the officer's certificate; and (2) that if an appeal lay to any Court it was only to the Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements.

Mr. ALFRED BUCKNILL, who appeared for the Board of Trade, said that so far as he knew the Board had never taken the second point mentioned by Mr. Dunlop.

Mr. DUNLOP, continuing, said that the Royal Star was a vessel registered in the port of London, and her master held a certificate originally issued in Barry. It was not, therefore, a local certificate. While the Royal Star was proceeding from China to London she struck some submerged object. Although the Court of Inquiry had been unable to decide what the vessel struck, whether a charted or uncharted rock, they had severely censured the master for his conduct. The finding of the Court of Inquiry was, in accordance with the rules, signed by the Governor of the Colony and transmitted to the Board of Trade.

On May 6, 1927, notice appeared in the London Gazette that the Board of Trade had received the report. It was from that date that the right of appeal began to run. On May 20 the appellant gave notice of appeal, which was duly served on the Board of Trade. On September 5 the appellant applied to the Board of Trade for an order for a rehearing of the inquiry, and on October 15 the Board refused the application. The appeal was brought under section 478 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and section 66 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906.

Mr. BUCKNILL contended that section 478 of the Act of 1894 and section 66 of the Act of 1906 must be read in conjunction with section 475 of the Act of 1894, which allowed a rehearing or appeal only in cases where the Court of Inquiry had suspended or cancelled an officer's certificate. Section 475 had not been repealed by the Act of 1906. The Board of Trade had no option except to take the course which they had taken. They were not desirous of denying any master a right of appeal which was given to him by law, but merely wished to ascertain the view of the Admiralty Court, and were prepared to act on the decision when given.

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, section 475, provides: "(1) The Board of Trade may, in any case where under this Part of this Act a formal investigation as aforesaid into a shipping casualty, or an inquiry into the conduct of a master, mate, or engineer has been held, order the case to be reheard either generally or as to any part thereof, and shall do so—(a) if new and important evidence which could not be produced at the investigation or inquiry has been discovered; or (b) if for any other reason there has in their opinion been ground for suspecting that a miscarriage of justice has occurred. . . .

"(3) Where on any such investigation or inquiry a decision has been given with respect to the cancelling or suspension of the certificate of a master, mate, or engineer, and an application for a rehearing under this section has not been made or has been refused, an appeal shall lie from the decision to the following Courts. . . ."

Section 478 provides: "(1) The Legislature of any British possession may authorize any Court or tribunal to make inquiries as to shipwrecks, or other casualties affecting ships, or as to charges of incompetency, or misconduct on the part of masters, mates, or engineers of ships. . . .

"(6) The Board of Trade may order the rehearing of any inquiry under this section in like manner as they may order the rehearing of a similar investigation or inquiry in the United Kingdom, but if an application for rehearing either is not made or is refused, an appeal shall lie from any order or finding of the Court or tribunal holding the inquiry to the High Court in England: provided that an appeal shall not lie" [from an order or an inquiry into a casualty affecting a ship registered in a British possession or a decision affecting the certificate of an officer holding a non-British certificate].

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, section 66, provides: "Where, on any investigation or inquiry under the provisions of Part VI. of the principal Act, the Court find that a shipping casualty has been caused or contributed to by the wrongful act or default of any person, and an application for rehearing has not been made under section four hundred and seventy-five or section four hundred and seventy-eight of the principal Act, or has been refused, the owner of the ship, or any other person who, having an interest in the investigation or inquiry, has appeared at the hearing and is affected by the decision of the Court, may appeal from that decision in the same manner and subject to the same conditions in and subject to which a master may appeal under those sections against a decision with respect to the cancelling or suspension of his certificate."

The PRESIDENT.—This is a preliminary application in a proposed appeal of an officer in the Merchant Marine against a finding of the Wreck Inquiries Court in the Straits Settlements, by which he conceives himself to be aggrieved. The Court in the Straits Settlements found him guilty of negligence in three particulars, whereby a vessel of some 8,000 tons had been stranded, and expressed its severe censure judicially, and declared that it did not deem it necessary to deal with his certificate. That, of course, is a grave matter for an officer in the Merchant Marine, especially an officer who has been in charge of one of the great ships which sail the wide seas, and he seeks to secure reconsideration of those findings of negligence, and of the censure which has been so expressed.

Whether he is entitled to a rehearing is a matter of statute. He is not entitled to a rehearing unless some statute, which creates the jurisdiction under which he has been placed at disadvantage, confers that right of rehearing. The view has been taken that there is a limited right of rehearing which does not apply to his case—that under the terms of the relevant section in the Merchant Shipping Act, if his certificate had been dealt with he would have been entitled to be reheard, but that in view of the fact that his certificate has not been dealt with the statute gives him no right of rehearing. That, of course, is a matter purely of the construction of the statute. The matter has been well and concisely argued, and it was hardly necessary that Mr. Bucknill should emphasize the fact that the Board of Trade has no desire to restrict, in the case of officers in the Merchant Marine service, their right of access to his Majesty's Courts when they are aggrieved. The Board of Trade would fall short of its duty if it pursued any such course. It has not pursued any such course, and does not, and in desiring a determination of the preliminary question here the Board of Trade has simply taken an account of opinions expressed from the Bench from time to time, and views which have evidently been held by the judicial authorities in respect of which neither of us, I am sure—no one who is aware of their eminence or of their ability—would entertain any doubt. But the question still has to be determined.

It is said on behalf of the proposed appellant that under the relevant sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, sections 475 and 478 in particular, the appellant—the proposed appellant—probably had a right of appeal—that there is a construction of the sections which would give him a right of appeal—but it is said further that under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1906, section 66, he has unmistakably a right of appeal. The relevant sections of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, certainly, do not make it clear beyond all doubt. I think they are capable of a construction which would give the right of appeal. After providing for wreck inquiries, and establishing tribunals which have power to deal with the certificates of masters, mates, and engineers, and providing power for the Board of Trade to order the rehearing of any such inquiries, section 475 goes on to say: "(3) Where on any such investigation or inquiry a decision has been given with respect to the cancelling or suspension of the certificate of a master," and so forth, an appeal shall lie. I pressed Mr. Bucknill, perhaps a little too closely, as to whether in this case there had been a decision with respect to the cancelling or suspension of the certificate of the proposed appellant, but Mr. Bucknill gave the answer that it depended upon the true construction of section 475, subsection 3. He said that the finding of the Court was a decision with respect to the cancelling or the suspension of the certificate of the proposed appellant, as it was decided to be unnecessary to cancel or suspend his certificate. That does not look, however, like the kind of decision against which the right of appeal is of necessity to be assumed. That leaves the matter an open question. I do not express any concluded view against the proposition that there would be a right of appeal there—I leave that matter where it is. But section 475 dealt with wreck inquiries in this country, and section 478 dealt with wreck inquiries in the Dominions Overseas in a different manner; because, after giving to the Board of Trade the like power of ordering a rehearing which was expressed in section 475, section 478 went on to say: "An appeal shall lie from any order or finding of the Court or tribunal holding the inquiry to the High Court in England." It was suggested that a possible view of the two sections was that those general words in section 478 are limited by the specific words in section 475, and we are asked to apply a well-known rule of construction. In my view those general words in section 478 are not limited by the express words in section 475. In my view an appeal lies at the instance of a party to the proceedings from an order or finding of the Court or tribunal holding the inquiry except, in the specified cases, where such an appeal, it is directed, shall not lie.

That is the view I hold upon the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, but many things have happened since 1894. From time to time there has been resort to this Court by persons alleging themselves to be aggrieved, and it was found that persons might suffer a substantial grievance by proceedings before tribunals dealing with shipping casualties, and be left without a specific right of redress. There was a case, to which my brother referred (The Golden Sea, 7 P.D., 194), of the owners of a vessel who were in effect placed in a position of great disadvantage and were held not to be within the provisions of the Act which gave the right of appeal, and by reason of occurrences of that kind section 66 was placed in the Merchant Shipping Act of 1906, and that directed that "where, on any investigation or inquiry [such as is here under consideration] the Court find that a shipping casualty has been caused or contributed to by the wrongful act or default of any person . . . the owner of the ship, or any other person who, having an interest in the investigation or inquiry, has appeared at the hearing and is affected by the decision of the Court . . . may appeal." It is necessary after reading that section for us to see whether the proposed appellant here comes within its terms. Had he an interest in the investigation or inquiry? He had. He was accused of negligence and was subject to the cancellation of his certificate, or to the endorsement of his certificate. Had he appeared at the hearing? He had. He had appeared and given his evidence. Was he affected by the decision of the Court? That has been submitted as the true question here. He was found guilty of negligence—that is of professional misconduct. He was found guilty at a public proceeding, and the decision of the Court was placed on record. The Court sat in public, as such Courts do, and, of course, ought to do. To my mind it is impossible to say that an officer in the merchant service who has been tried upon charges of negligence and found guilty is not affected by the decision of the Court. It seems to me that he is placed very nearly in the position of a person tried under a criminal charge who is found guilty, but who is subjected to no sentence. That being so, it seems to me that the proposed appellant has a right of appeal probably under the sections of the Act of 1894, but, certainly, under section 66 of the Act of 1906. I do not think there is any substantial danger of a great rush of litigants to the Court if given the right of appeal, and if the Court should be obstructed in that way it will know how to deal with any such phenomenon.

In my view the proposed appellant is entitled to succeed upon this motion.

MR. JUSTICE HILL.—I agree. Whether under section 475 of the Act of 1894 a man who is found guilty of negligence, but whose certificate was neither cancelled nor suspended, had a right of appeal, I express no opinion. But assuming that he had no such right under section 475 of the Act of 1894, in my opinion the words of section 478 of the Act of 1894, which are so much wider than the words of section 475, gave him in such a case a right of appeal from a Colonial Court of Inquiry. Any doubt is removed, however, by section 66 of the Act of 1906, which was passed—as is clear upon its terms—in order to enlarge the right of appeal, and which clearly includes the master in this case, in that he appeared, and, indeed, must have been given notice to appear, because it was proposed that his certificate should be dealt with, and he was in my view quite clearly a person affected by the finding that the casualty had been caused by his negligence. I therefore agree that he has a right of appeal.

LLOYDS BANK LIMITED v. CHARTERED BANK OF INDIA, &c.*

Bankers — Crossed cheques — Protection of collecting banker—No title in customer—Receipt of payment by banker without negligence—Failure of banker to discharge burden of proof—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 82.

One L., who was the chief accountant at a branch of the plaintiff bank, and who had authority to sign cheques on their behalf, fraudulently drew upon another bank crossed cheques, signed by himself and by another official of the branch, and payable to the defendant bank, and, by letters written on the plaintiffs' office paper, he instructed the defendant bank to credit the proceeds to the joint account of himself and his wife at the defendant bank. The defendant bank collected the amounts of the cheques and credited them to the account, and L.'s practice was to draw the amounts out quickly after paying them in, and observation of the account would have shown that L. was engaged in extensive speculations through stockbrokers. In an action for damages for conversion of the cheques or for money had and received, the defendants relied on the provisions contained in s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

Held, that although the cheques were payable to the defendants themselves they had received payment "for a customer" within the meaning of the section and had done so in good faith, but that they had not discharged the burden of proving the absence of negligence on their part, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

In this action the plaintiffs, Lloyds Bank Limited, sued to recover from the defendants, the Chartered Bank of India, &c., damages for the conversion of certain cheques. Alternatively, the plaintiffs claimed the amount represented by the cheques as money had and received.

Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., and Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. James Wylie for the defendants.

Mr. BEVAN, in opening, said that the claim related to 19 cheques drawn by one Lawson, who was chief accountant at the Bombay branch of the plaintiffs' bank. The cheques were drawn at various times from March, 1922, to January, 1924, and were for sums in rupees which were equivalent in all to between £17,000 and £18,000. The cheques, which were signed by Lawson, and also by another official of the plaintiffs' Bombay branch, were drawn on the Imperial Bank of India, and were payable to the defendant bank. The proceeds of them were, on Lawson's instructions, credited to a joint account which Lawson and his wife kept at the defendants' bank.

All the cheques were drawn without the knowledge of, and in fraud of, the plaintiffs. Lawson was an officer of the bank whose payments for salary and allowances amounted to less than £1,500 a year. The defendants had put in various defences, and relied in particular on section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and the equivalent section, 131, of the Indian Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881. But, said counsel, a defendant could only rely on those sections if he had received the payment "for a customer and without negligence"; and here the cheques were made payable to the defendants themselves and not to a customer. He submitted that the facts showed that the defendants had been negligent. They should have examined the cheques to see if they related to ordinary business transactions between themselves and the plaintiffs, and they would at once have seen that they did not.

The defendants credited the amounts to the account of Lawson and his wife on the instructions of Lawson personally, and not in his capacity as an officer of the plaintiffs. The fact that an official in receipt of a moderate salary should be paying in large sums at frequent intervals should have made them suspect that something was wrong.

The plaintiffs were Lloyds Bank, but the frauds actually took place at Cox's Bank at Bombay, Cox's having since been absorbed by Lloyds. Lawson's practice was to draw the money out quickly after paying it in. It appeared that he was engaged in speculating through native stockbrokers, and if the defendants had taken proper care in watching his account they would have seen that he was paying large sums to those natives.

In the circumstances of this case the defendants could not claim the protection of section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, or the corresponding provision of the Indian Act, because they did not receive payment for a customer (Capital and Counties Bank v. Gordon, 19 The Times L.R., 462 ; [1903] A.C. 240, at p. 245). A bank was only protected by the section when, on behalf of a customer, it received for collection a cheque which, if it had not been crossed, could have been collected by the customer himself. And, apart from that, the bank was liable if it had been negligent. The onus of showing that there had been no negligence was on the bank. Where a servant of the drawer of a cheque directed the receiving bank to credit the amount to the servant's private account, that must be enough to put the receiving bank on inquiry.

He referred to Morison v. London County and Westminster Bank (30 The Times L.R., 481 ; [1914] 3 K.B., 356, at p. 367) ; Ross v. London County Westminster and Parr's Bank (35 The Times L.R., 315 ; [1919] 1 K.B., 678) ; Underwood v. Bank of Liverpool and Martins (40 The Times L.R., 302 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 775).

Evidence which had been taken on commission was read, and other evidence was called.

Mr. JOWITT said that section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, presupposed liability and provided a means of defence. This case differed from the usual case of fraud in that the cheques were payable to the defendants themselves. The plaintiffs sent the cheques to the defendants with implied instructions to clear them, and the defendants did so. So far there was no conversion. Then it was argued that if there were no conversion of the piece of paper there was a conversion of its proceeds by applying them to Lawson's account. But in doing that the defendants were only applying cheques, which had been issued by the plaintiffs, according to the directions of an official of the plaintiffs, who had both actual and ostensible authority to give directions.

He referred to Clutton v. Attenborough (13 The Times L.R., 114 ; [1897] A.C., 90, at p. 93) ; Grant on the Law of Banking (6th Edn., p. 52). Morison's case (supra) differed from this case because there the cheques were marked "Not negotiable," and were drawn by only one person. The question of conversion was dealt with in Underwood's case (supra) at page 795.

The claim here could not succeed on the alternative ground of money had and received, because the money was no longer in the defendants' hands (Morison's case, supra, at p. 386). The fact that the cheques in this case were signed by another official besides Lawson showed that they were intended to be "issued," and the plaintiffs must be held to have issued them. He referred to Jones v. Waring and Gillow (42 The Times L.R., 644 ; [1926] A.C., 670), and the cases cited at page 684 of that report, and submitted that there was no such payment under a mistake of fact as would enable the plaintiffs to recover the money.

As to section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, that section introduced a hypothetical standard of care and, as shown by the judgment in Ross's case (supra), at pages 685-6, the standard must be that of an ordinary bank clerk in an Indian bank. Any ordinary bank clerk, dealing with perhaps thousands of cheques as rapidly as possible, would have passed these cheques without question. The same rule was laid down in Commissioners of Taxation v. English, Scottish, and Australian Bank (36 The Times L.R., 305 ; [1920] A.C., 683, at pp. 686 to 689), which said that the standard to be applied must be that of the ordinary practice of bankers, in view of the particular circumstances, antecedent and present.

The evidence here showed that one bank would quite commonly make a cheque payable to another bank, but would send with the cheque a covering letter directing that the money should be credited to a customer. In Hannen's Lake View Central, Limited v. Armstrong (16 The Times L.R., 236) the cheque was in favour of an employer and was paid in by his servant, but in this case there was no indication on the face of the cheques to show the individual whom they were intended to benefit. If the plaintiffs had exercised a proper system of control over their officials Lawson's frauds would have been impossible.

Evidence having been called for the defence, Mr. JOWITT submitted that the law was accurately summarized in Paget on Banking, third edition. The foundation of the action was that the Imperial Bank of India had properly debited the account of the plaintiffs, that the cheques were negotiable instruments, and there was an animus emittendi. The cases in which a banker could be liable for conversion were discussed in Paget on Banking, third edition, pages 171, 274, 278, 280, and 289. The defendants were entitled to the protection of section 82 because they were not guilty of any negligence whatever. If, however, they were negligent in dealing with the first cheques, the plaintiffs had raised no objection after those cheques had been dealt with, and the defendants were not negligent in treating the subsequent cheques in the same way. Lawson was a man who was supposed to have private means, and the plaintiffs knew that he had an account with the defendants, and the evidence showed that one bank often drew a cheque in favour of another bank with the intention that the proceeds should be credited to a customer.

Mr. LE QUESNE replied. The cheques were not issued by the plaintiffs within the meaning of the definition of issue in section 2 of the Act, Baxendale v. Bennett (3 Q.B.D., 525). No intention to issue the cheques could be imputed to the plaintiffs, because the second signature was not affixed to the cheques with an intention to issue and Lawson's signature alone could not be sufficient. The defendants were not holders in due course (Jones v. Waring and Gillow, supra, at p. 680). It was never contemplated by anyone that section 82 should protect a banker who was himself the payee of the cheque. Whether the plaintiffs themselves were or were not negligent, the defendants could not be protected by section 82 if they were negligent, and the evidence here clearly showed that they were negligent.

MR. JUSTICE MACKINNON, in giving judgment, said that the case was a very difficult and complicated one, but as he had formed a clear view what his decision ought to be he would not reserve judgment. Lawson was an officer of the plaintiffs and had full authority to sign cheques on their behalf. He had a banking account of his own in London, and he also had an account, originally in his own name and subsequently in the names of himself and his wife, with the defendants.

His LORDSHIP stated the facts with reference to the payment of the 19 cheques to Lawson's account with the defendants and continued. The drawing by the plaintiffs of a cheque in favour of the defendants, accompanied by a letter requesting the defendants to credit it to a customer, would be a perfectly normal proceeding ; and in this case the defendants received such requests to credit Lawson's account, the requests being written by Lawson himself on the plaintiffs' office paper. When the cheques were paid in Lawson almost immediately drew the money out again by cheques which were payable to stockbrokers, and anyone must have seen that he was carrying on extensive speculations. Lawson went through a complicated process of "cooking" the plaintiffs' books to conceal his operations, and he remained undetected until he went on leave. While he was away his fraud was discovered. If the plaintiffs had had a proper and reasonable system of checking the work of their servants the fraud would have been discovered immediately after it began, but it was not directly material to this case to decide whether the plaintiffs had been negligent ; if it had been material he should have had no hesitation in holding that they had been negligent.

Prima facie, the plaintiffs would be entitled to succeed on the claim. The principle was that where one person received the property of another without that other's authority, and used it for his own purposes, he was guilty of conversion. But the defendants said that they had not been guilty of conversion ; that the plaintiffs—induced, indeed, to do so by fraud—issued negotiable instruments, and that those instruments were valid and effectual. See Clutton v. Attenborough (13 The Times L.R., 114 ; [1897] A.C., 90). The crucial question on that point was whether those cheques were issued by the plaintiffs. It was admitted that if Lawson alone had signed them that would not have been enough ; but the defendants said that the second signature made the cheques "issued" by the plaintiffs. The position resembled that in the Underwood case (supra), and, in his opinion, this defence failed.

Then there was the more difficult defence of the Indian equivalent of section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. There was no substantial difference between the provisions of the two Acts. In his view, Lawson, a customer, had a defective title within the meaning of those Acts. Mr. Bevan argued that, as the cheques were payable to the defendants themselves, the defendants did not receive payment for a customer, but it would be giving far too narrow a meaning to the words to say that receipt by a banker of cheques payable in words to himself, but accompanied by a request to credit them to a customer, was not a receiving on behalf of a customer. The point was really decided by Morison's case (30 The Times L.R., 481 ; [1914] 3 K.B., 356). The defendants did receive payment for Lawson as their customer in good faith. But the onus was on them to show that they did so without negligence, and he felt that that was a very difficult question. In law negligence implied the breach of a duty to take care, but there was no duty at common law on the collecting bank to exercise care, and the duty was entirely created by the Act. The standard of care had been discussed by Mr. Justice Bailhache in Ross's case (35 The Times L.R., 315 ; [1919] 1 K.B., 678) and by Lord Dunedin in Commissioners of Taxation v. English, Scottish, and Australian Bank (36 The Times L.R., 305 ; [1920] A.C., 683). One must remember that the whole basis of business was confidence ; and a lawyer was much more suspicious of fraud than a business man would be. The bank officers dealt with hundreds of cheques a day, and the opportunity of scrutinizing any one of them was small. In estimating the standard of care by the collecting banker, which the statute created for the first time, one must take the standard of a hypothetical bank clerk. In doing so, must one impute to him a knowledge of all the facts, when it was quite certain that he did not know them ?

On the whole he thought he must hold that, if a prima facie case was made out against them, the defendants must definitely prove that there was no negligence by their servants. That proof must be very difficult to give in any case, and he thought that in this case the defendants had not succeeded in discharging the burden.

The Legislature had used the words of the section without, possibly, realizing their full extent, but he must take the words as they stood. The defendants, therefore, had failed to establish with regard to each of the 19 cheques that they had acted without negligence, and judgment must be against them. Lawson had paid a certain amount of the money so obtained by him by fraud into his account with the plaintiffs' bank, and as that had gone back into the coffers of the plaintiffs their claim for conversion would be reduced pro tanto.

Court of Appeal. } 1927.
(Scrutton, Sargant, and Greer, L.JJ.) } Dec. 16.

IN RE APPLICATION OF TILMANSTONE (KENT) COLLIERIES, LIMITED.*

Mines — Coal-mine — Working facilities—Ancillary right—Carrying away coal—Conveyance over land outside lease—Jurisdiction to sanction — Aerial ropeway — Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 20), ss. 1, 2, 6.

The Court held that under ss. 1, 2, and 6 of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, the Railway and Canal Commission had jurisdiction to sanction a scheme for an aerial ropeway for the conveyance of coal from the Tilmanstone colliery to Dover Harbour, on the ground that the scheme was in the national interest.

Decision of the Railway and Canal Commission (43 The Times L.R., 795) affirmed.

These were appeals by the Southern Railway Company and the East Kent Light Railway Company from an order of the Railway and Canal Commission (43 The Times L.R., 795) sanctioning a scheme to carry an aerial ropeway or railway from the Tilmanstone Colliery, Kent, to Dover Harbour.

* Reported by T. W. MORGAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Tilmanstone (Kent) Collieries, Limited, had applied to the Railway and Canal Commission under sections 3 and 5 of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, for the sanction of that Court to a scheme for an aerial ropeway or railway from the Tilmanstone Colliery, Kent, to Dover Harbour, a distance of 6¼ miles. The application was made on the ground that the existing railway rates and charges payable to place the applicants' coal free on board at Dover Harbour were excessive and did not enable them to produce coal at a competitive rate. They contended that if the existing rates were continued it would result in the colliery being closed. The applicants said that the scheme for a ropeway was essential for the proper and efficient working of the minerals and the conduct of their business.

As a result of the notices given by order of the Court, a large number of persons appeared in opposition to the scheme. Many of the opponents were landowners, who, after the case had proceeded for a short time, were satisfied with the terms which, subject to the approval of the Court, the applicants were prepared to offer them. Consequently, the opposition had narrowed itself down to that put forward by the Southern Railway Company and the East Kent Light Railway Company, and to certain suggestions made on behalf of the War Department and the Dover Harbour Board.

The application was argued before the Railway and Canal Commission on two occasions. On the first occasion the Court, in a considered judgment (43 The Times L.R., 349), refused to sanction the scheme, on the grounds that the plans were inaccurate and illusory, and that, on the evidence, the Railway and Canal Commission were unable to say whether the arrangements at the Dover end were feasible or in the national interest.

The Tilmanstone (Kent) Colliery Company made a second application to the Railway and Canal Commission, producing further plans. The Court, in sanctioning the scheme, overruled an objection to the jurisdiction of the Court.

The Southern Railway Company and the East Kent Light Railway Company appealed.

Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. Tyldesley Jones, K.C., and Mr. Bruce Thomas appeared for the Southern Railway Company; Mr. Arthur Moon and Mr. H. I. Willis for the East Kent Light Railway Company; Mr. J. G. Joseph for the Dover Harbour Board; and Sir Leslie Scott, K.C., Sir Arthur Colefax, K.C., and Mr. P. Gordon Bamber for the Tilmanstone (Kent) Colliery Company.

Sir John Simon, in opening the appeal on behalf of the Southern Railway Company, said that the appeal raised a question with regard to the extent of the jurisdiction of the Railway and Canal Commission in making orders which would, unless they had statutory authority behind them, be an authorization of trespass over private property. The order appealed against sanctioned, notwithstanding opposition, the construction of an aerial ropeway. The appellants' point was that it was a misunderstanding of the language of the Act of Parliament to suppose that the Railway and Canal Commission had jurisdiction to sanction the building of railways all over England. The Act under which the application in this case was made did not give the Railway and Canal Commission jurisdiction to order that anyone might make railways over the face of other people's property merely because a colliery company satisfied them that the scheme was to the advantage of the public.

Sir Leslie Scott, for the colliery company, contended that the Act of 1923 gave to the Railway and Canal Commission a wide discretion with the object of facilitating the easy working of minerals, and, where it was necessary in the national interests to do so, the rights of private property could be overridden on terms of fair compensation to the owners. The Court had jurisdiction to make the order under appeal.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in delivering his considered judgment, said:—This appeal by the Southern Railway Company against a decision of the Railway and Canal Commission raises an important question as to the jurisdiction of that tribunal. The Tilmanstone (Kent) Collieries, Limited, are lessees of coal at Tilmanstone in the county of Kent. If they desired to send their coal to the nearest port, Dover, it passed over a railway route of 11 miles, partly belonging to the Southern Railway Company. They desired to send the coal to Dover by a ropeway, the length of which would be about seven miles. The cost of doing so would be 1s. a ton less than by the Southern Railway route, without allowing for the extra convenience to them of having control of their whole route.

The Dover Harbour Board and most of the proprietors on the proposed route of the ropeway assented. Some landowners, whose land would be affected by the ropeway, dissented, among them the Southern Railway Company, whose interest in land was confined to the fact that the ropeway crossed at one point a branch of their railway. The colliery company therefore applied to the Commission, under the Act of 1923, for the grant of an "ancillary right" of conveyance by ropeway of coal from the colliery shaft to Dover Harbour. The Southern Railway Company, while not alleging that the proposed protection for their railway line where the ropeway crossed it would be insufficient, objected to the application on the ground that the Commission had no jurisdiction under the Act of 1923 to make an order and grant an ancillary right which was directed rather to marketing than to "working" the Tilmanstone coal, and which was sought to be justified on economical or commercial, rather than legal or physical, difficulties hampering the colliery. The Commission overruled the objection and granted the ancillary right asked for "to erect, lay down, maintain and use an aerial ropeway" according to certain plans which involved crossing the line of the Southern Railway. The railway company appeal on the ground that the Commission had no jurisdiction under the Act of 1923 to make such an order.

The power to grant "ancillary rights" is conferred by section 3 of the Act of 1923. The combined effect of that section and section 1 (2) of the Act is to define "ancillary right" as a facility, right, or privilege which is required in order that minerals may be properly worked, carried away, treated and converted, where the proper and efficient working, carrying away, treating or converting of the minerals is hampered by the failure of the person working the minerals to obtain such right, facility, or privilege.

Instances of ancillary rights are given "without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provision," and are as follows: "(a) A right to let down the surface"; this clearly includes surface not the property of the person working the mine; "(b) A right of air-way, shaft-way, or surface or underground wayleave, or other right for the purpose of access to or conveyance of minerals or the ventilation or drainage of the mines"; airway or surface wayleave for the purpose of "conveyance," a very wide word, may be granted over other people's property ; " (c) A right to use and occupy the surface for the erection of washeries, coke ovens, railways, by-product works, or brick making or other works, or of dwellings for persons employed in connexion with the working of the minerals or with any such works as aforesaid." This again applies to other people's property, and includes " railways " over them. Subsections (d) and (e) give power to grant rights to take water from or drain water on to other people's property.

The Commission, by section 6 of the Act, is to consider whether the requirements of the Act have been complied with, and whether " it is expedient in the national interest that the right applied for should be granted."

It would seem that Parliament intended that minerals should be available for use where the national interest required it, and that if such minerals were unavailable, owing to the unreasonable objection of some person who had the right to object to their proper, convenient, and efficient " carriage away," the Commission might overrule that unreasonable objection by granting an ancillary right of wayleave or conveyance or making and using railways.

The objection of the railway company was based on a very technical use of the term " carry away." " Work," they said, in mining leases means detaching or severing coal from the coal face ; " carrying away " is converting that coal into the lessees' possession. As soon as the coal is " carried away " in that technical sense, the power of the Commission ceases. They were not quite clear where the " carrying away " ceased. Before the Commission, their counsel appears to have argued that it could not extend beyond the land of the lessor. Before us, a different line was taken. It was said that the limit was not geographical, but one of the purpose of the Act. If the carrying was to the first place where the lessee had effective control it was " carrying away " ; further transport was for sale, and marketing was not " working."

But the illustrations given were puzzling. I asked whether, if a new shaft was projected five miles from a shipping port in one direction, and five miles from the nearest railway in the other, and intervening landowners refused all wayleaves so that the coal could not get away except by uneconomical road carriage, the Commission would have jurisdiction to grant an ancillary right of wayleave for a railroad to the nearest port and nearest rail. The answer was " Yes." A similar answer was given to the question whether, if the lessee wanted to get his mineral to works five miles away for the purpose of treating or converting it—e.g., to coke ovens—an ancillary right of wayleave to the works could be granted. Again the answer was " Yes." But I think it was said that the answer assumed that there was no place on the way where the mineral could be reduced into possession or completely controlled by the lessee.

In my opinion, the construction which the railway company seek to put on the statute is too narrow. Parliament, in my view, intended that where it was in the national interest that coal should be available for national purposes, and where the operation of rendering the coal available was hampered by the refusal of persons, whose consent before the Act was necessary, to grant proper facilities for the process of making the coal available, the Commission might override that refusal on terms which it considered proper. It was said that this construction might lead to the sanction of hundreds of miles of railway without any of the precautions ordinarily taken by Parliament to protect private interests. In my view, Parliament has placed confidence in the judicial tribunal concerned both to protect individual interests and to override them if it is in the interests of the nation so to do. The judgment of the Court below proceeds on these lines, and I agree with it.

The appeal in both cases must be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Sargant.—I agree that these appeals should be dismissed.

The first argument of the appellants was that the phrase " carrying away " in section 1, subsection (2), of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, was limited to removing or transporting coal within the limits of the lessors' land ; that the phrase " conveyance of minerals " in section 3, subsection (2) (b), must have an equally restricted meaning ; and accordingly that there was no power in the Railway and Canal Commission to authorize any easement, by ropeway or otherwise, to convey minerals won by the respondents beyond their boundaries and across the railways of the Southern Railway Company and the East Kent Light Railway Company. In my judgment that argument fails at each step. The phrase " carry away " may no doubt include the removal of coal won ; but no authority was cited to us to show that it was ordinarily or necessarily limited to such removal within the confines of the particular " take " or property where the winning was effected. Even if the phrase " carry away " were prima facie so limited in section 1, subsection (2), that is an inadequate reason for placing a corresponding limit on the word " conveyance " in section 3, subsection (2) (b). And in addition, the whole character of this argument is of a highly technical and narrow character, which is, in my judgment, quite foreign to the spirit and purpose of remedial legislation such as the Act now in question. Such legislation should in general be read broadly, and should not have its obvious purpose cramped and stultified by finely drawn distinctions and verbal niceties of this kind.

The second argument for the appellants was that section 3 of the Act of 1923 was dealing only with physical difficulties in working minerals and not with economic difficulties at all ; and that in the present case the difficulties to be overcome were purely economic. This argument is more attractive than the first, but I cannot accede to it. I agree with Mr. Justice Sankey in thinking that the phrase " properly and conveniently worked " in its ordinary meaning does not exclude elements of cost, especially when applied to such a business as mining, where the whole possibility of profit, and therefore of initiation or continuance, is dependent on a margin—often a narrow one—of receipts over expenditure. And I do not think that there is any such contrast in section 2 between the words " efficiently " and " economically " as compels one to exclude questions of economy in considering whether " the proper and efficient working of the minerals is unduly hampered " within section 3, subsection (1), of the Act. Certainly, as was pointed out by Sir Leslie Scott at the beginning of the brief argument which we heard from him, economic or commercial considerations are involved in section 6, subsections (4) and (5), section 7 and section 8, subsection (7), of the Act. It is probably true that in mining as in other engineering operations almost any physical difficulty can be overcome, if expense can be totally disregarded. In practical operations it is impossible to leave expense out of the question, and excessive cost, actual or anticipated, may by itself result in " minerals being left permanently unworked," and render it "expedient in the national interest" that the Commission should interpose and grant rights to obviate the danger.

A good deal was said for the appellants as to the dangers of holding the Commission entitled to grant rights which might involve the construction of great lines of railway, and as to the absence of those safeguards which Parliament has imposed on undertakers under the Lands Clauses and Railways Clauses Acts. But in this legislation the powers of the Act are confined to an important judicial tribunal; there is nothing anomalous in the Parliamentary grant of an extensive discretion to such a tribunal; and the exercise of the powers of such a tribunal do not need to be safeguarded as in the case of the exercise of powers by private commercial undertakers. It seems to me that the Commission here have taken a sound view of their position and powers under an Act to enable them to override private rights where it is expedient in the national interest. And indeed I should have been satisfied merely to affirm the decision of the Commission without more, but for my desire to show that I had attended to and considered the arguments of Sir John Simon and Mr. Tyldesley Jones.

Lord Justice Greer.—I agree. Colliers go down into a mine not for the purpose of exercising their muscles in a healthy occupation, but for the purpose of earning enough money to keep themselves and their families in decent comfort. Mine-owners and lessees of mines expend their capital by using it for sinking pits and paying wages and installing plant, not for reasons of benevolence nor for the mere purpose of contributing to the national welfare, but in order that they may earn profits for themselves which will justify them commercially for their expenditure of capital. If they cannot get a return for that expenditure the necessary result will be that their mines will be closed, the workmen will be deprived of their opportunity of earning their wages, the mine-owner or lessee will have lost his capital, and the nation will have lost the opportunity of taxing the mine-owners' income and will have to make provision for the men whose employment has been determined. It is accordingly in the interest of everyone concerned, and especially in the national interest, that facilities should be granted that will, if possible, enable the mine to continue to be worked—that is to say, facilities calculated to decrease the risks of loss in carrying on the mining enterprise and increase the chances of profit. This desirable end cannot be achieved by granting facilities to enable the mine-owner to bring his coal to the surface or to his own depôt if he is hampered in carrying it to market by difficulties which can only be overcome by an expenditure that would involve carrying on his business at a loss. It is of no use to the mine-owner to get his coal to the surface if other people's land intervenes between his mine and his market which he either cannot cross at all or can only obtain liberty to cross at a prohibitive price. One would accordingly expect that if Parliament provided for granting to mine-owners facilities for working, carrying away, treating and converting minerals, the facilities to be granted would be such as to enable the mine-owner to increase his chances of carrying on his business profitably, or to diminish the risk of carrying it on at a loss.

In my judgment Parliament has by the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, section 3, given power to the Railway and Canal Commission to grant facilities, rights, or privileges to overcome hindrances to the carrying out of a mining enterprise. The words "carrying away" in section 1 of the Act are not confined, as was argued on behalf of the railway company, to carrying away from the place where the coal is got to some place where it is effectively in the mine-owner's possession as distinguished from that of the land-owner. I do not think the words are used in the technical sense in which they are generally used in mining leases. Considering the object of the Act, I think the words at least cover the carrying away or transporting of the coal from the place where it is got to any convenient place where it can be treated, converted, or dealt with commercially by sale or delivery to purchasers. I think, for example, that if the nearest railway was seven miles away the Railway and Canal Commission could grant a right to lay down a tramway or a ropeway from the mine to such railway, and I can see no difference in principle between this and granting, as they have done in this case, the right to erect and maintain an aerial ropeway to Dover Harbour. In my judgment the words "carrying away" are wide enough to include the facilities that have been granted by the Railway and Canal Commission in this case.

But it was argued that, even though that be so, still the Commissioners were wrong in law in granting such facilities, because section 3 does not contemplate facilities that are required for economic or commercial reasons. It was argued for the railway company that the privilege was not required for properly and conveniently carrying away the minerals, nor would the proper and efficient carrying away of the minerals be unduly hampered by the colliery company's inability to obtain the right to erect and maintain the ropeway in question. It was said that this section did not contemplate facilities required to overcome economic or commercial difficulties, but only difficulties which physically obstructed the carrying away of the coal. In my judgment this argument puts too narrow a construction on the section. I think, in considering whether a mine can be properly and conveniently worked and the product properly and conveniently carried away, the tribunal is entitled to take into account the cost which it is necessary to incur in the absence of facilities which the mine-owner asks for; and I am further of opinion that the proper and efficient working and carrying away of the minerals may be unduly hampered if the cost of getting them to a convenient place for disposal is, in the absence of such facilities, excessive.

It is quite true that this interpretation of the Act means that very large powers are given to the Railway and Canal Commission to override the rights of property owners, and it may well be that they would have power to authorize a railway 20, 30, or 40 miles long from pit to port, but it is to be observed that the powers are granted to Commissioners presided over by a Judge of the High Court, that the applications for facilities are heard in public, and that the Commissioners have power to impose reasonable conditions (section 6) and to award fair compensation (section 9).

I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

HASKELL v. MARLOW.*

Will — Construction — Devise of dwelling-house to life tenant — Direction to keep "in good repair and condition (reasonable wear and tear excepted)"—Failure by tenant for life to counteract natural decay—Liability.

Where in an instrument creating a tenancy for life or for years there is an obligation on the tenant to keep the premises "in good repair and condition (reasonable wear and tear excepted)," dilapidations do not come within the exception unless it is shown that they were caused by normal human use or normal action of the elements and also that they are reasonable in amount, having regard to the terms of the contract to keep the premises in good condition and to the other circumstances of the case.

The exception does not mean that a tenant is not bound to do such repairs as may be required to prevent a defect originally proceeding from reasonable wear and tear from producing other results which such wear and tear would not directly produce.

Where, therefore, a tenant for life under a will containing the above obligation and exception, during a residence in a dwelling-house which lasted for 42 years, while doing nothing actively to injure the premises, omitted almost entirely to repair it and did very little to counteract the natural process of decay,

Held, that she was not protected by the exception but that her executors after her death were liable in damages to the trustees of the will creating her tenancy for life.

Their LORDSHIPS delivered judgment dismissing the defendants' appeal from an Official Referee in this action in which Mr. Harold Burgess Haskell and Mr. Charles Reginald Poole, trustees of the will of William Leach deceased, claimed from the defendants, Mr. William Marlow, Mr. Arthur Monkhouse, and Mr. Reginald Young, executors of the will of Charlotte Leach deceased, damages for the breach by the defendants and their testatrix of their and her obligation to keep in good repair and condition (reasonable wear and tear excepted) a messuage or dwelling-house in Castle-street, Salisbury, and the appurtenances thereto pursuant to the will of William Leach.

The will contained the following provision:—"I devise the messuage or dwelling-house with offices garden and appurtenances thereto and wherein I now reside in Castle-street, Salisbury, aforesaid, together with the use and enjoyment therein of the furniture pictures prints plate and plated articles china glass and other household effects now hereinbefore bequeathed to her which shall be in and about the same at my decease to my said wife [Charlotte] during her life she insuring and keeping the same insured against loss by fire to the full value thereof in the names or name of the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will and also keeping the same in good repair and condition (reasonable wear and tear excepted), and after her death the same shall fall into my residuary estate." The testator directed that his residuary estate should be divided among his children in equal shares.

The plaintiffs said that Charlotte Leach had occupied the premises in Castle-street from 1884 (when William Leach died) until her death on February 8, 1926, but that, in breach of the terms of the will, she had neglected to keep them in good repair or condition (reasonable wear and tear excepted), and they complained that the defendants refused to remedy the same. The evidence showed that Charlotte Leach had done nothing actively to injure the house, but had done little to counteract natural decay. The defendants denied that Charlotte Leach had neglected to keep the premises in the condition in which she was bound to keep them and denied that any damages were payable by them under the will.

The case came before an Official Referee who gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £550 agreed damages and costs. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Rayner Goddard, K.C., and Mr. F. J. Tucker appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Owen Thompson, K.C., and Mr. H. C. Dickens for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER delivered the following considered judgment:—This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment given for the plaintiffs by the Official Referee.

By his will dated March 29, 1884, William Leach devised his house and grounds at Salisbury to his wife for life with remainder to his three children in equal shares. He died in November of that year. His widow occupied the house for 42 years. She attained a great age and died in 1926. After her death the house and grounds were found to be in a condition which was described by the Official Referee in his judgment as follows:—"It is obvious, from the point of view of internal decorations and the outhouses, that it is now very badly kept and in places almost ruinous. The glasshouses have largely collapsed, the bridge has disappeared and the summer houses are a wreck. The whole premises have been allowed to get into a very shocking state of disrepair." It was common ground that the house was in a very good state of repair and good condition at the time of the death of William Leach. The widow during her long life tenancy had done nothing actively to injure the house. She had merely omitted almost entirely to repair it and for this long period of time she had done very little to counteract the natural process of decay.

This action was brought by the trustees of the will of William Leach against the executors of the late Mrs. Leach claiming the sum of £734 12s. by way of compensation for the dilapidated condition of the premises.

It is not necessary to consider what may be the true technical basis of the cause of action. It is admitted that the widow having occupied under this devise is bound by the conditions in the will, and, in my opinion, the words which we have to construe bear the same meaning whether they occur in a will or settlement limiting the interest of a tenant for life or in a lease or other contractual document imposing liabilities on tenants for years. It is further agreed that, since there was here obviously a breach of the covenant to keep these premises in good repair and condition, it rests upon the defendants to show that they come within the exception of reasonable wear and tear. Before the Official Referee counsel came to an agreement with a view to raising a plain issue and avoiding as far as possible detail and expense. In cases where a covenant of this kind has to be considered there is a natural tendency on the one hand to minimize and ignore the exception and, on the other hand, to exaggerate it until it almost destroys the covenant to repair, and it was plain that the true view might lie somewhere between two extremes. To avoid difficulties of that kind, counsel very wisely agreed and the Official Referee approved their agreement and acted upon it, that if the Official Referee should prefer the reading of this covenant put forward on behalf of the defendants, he should give judgment for the plaintiffs for an agreed sum of £97 and the defendants should have the costs of the action, but that if he did not approve the defendants' reading he was to give judgment for the plaintiffs for £550 and costs. He gave judgment for the plaintiffs for that sum, with costs, and the question is whether he was right in fact and law.

I will shortly deal with some cases which were cited to us, in so far as decided cases can afford any help in the construction of particular documents. Apart from the cases, I should have thought that the intention of the testator, as expressed in the passage which I have read, was tolerably clear. There is a plain and dominant intention to protect the interests of the remaindermen as regards both the house and the chattels which were also left for the widow's use. She is to insure the house against fire and that not in her own name but in the names of the trustees of the will. There is a substantial repairing covenant and, even as regards the chattels, there is provision made for seeing that they are not lost or wasted. On the other hand, it is clear that the testator did not wish his wife to be in the position of a tenant for years under a lease. She is not to be responsible for reasonable wear and tear, but that exception is to be construed reasonably so as not to trench unduly on the generality of the covenant to repair or to injure unfairly the interest of the remaindermen.

Turning to the authorities there are many cases in which the net liability imposed by a covenant of this kind has been considered, but only two which have dealt—and those perhaps rather slightly—with the exception of fair wear and tear considered alone and the effect that such an exception has upon the liability to repair under the covenant.

The first case that is often referred to in cases of this kind is the case of Gutteridge v. Munyard (7 C. and P., 129). That was a case between landlord and tenant. There was a covenant to keep and leave in a certain condition of repair, "reasonable use and wear thereof in the mean time only excepted," and upon that covenant Chief Justice Tindal first directed the jury: "The main subject of the demise is an old house. Now, when a very old building is demised, it is not meant that it should be restored in an improved state, nor that the consequences of the elements should be averted: but the tenant has the duty of keeping it as nearly as may be in the state in which it was at the time of the demise by the timely expenditure of money and care." That direction was the subject of some criticism in the Court of Appeal in the case of Lurcott v. Wakely and Wheeler ([1911] 1 K.B., 905, at p. 912). I think that it is unnecessary to refer to those comments. Whether Chief Justice Tindal correctly expressed what he intended to express is not, I think, very important having regard to what he said in the case of Mantz v. Goring (4 Bing. N.C., 451), to which I will refer next. But it is to be observed that the case of Lurcott v. Wakely and Wheeler (supra) was a case in which there was no exception at all of fair wear and tear and obviously, therefore, there was no criticism of anything which Chief Justice Tindal may have said about a fair wear and tear exception.

Mantz v. Goring (supra) was an action by landlord against tenant for damages for breach of the covenant to repair. The covenant was to keep "in tenantable repair, reasonable wear and tear excepted." The buildings were old. There was a verdict for the plaintiff. A rule nisi for a new trial was obtained on the ground of exclusion of evidence. The rule was discharged and in giving judgment Chief Justice Tindal, presiding over the Court, said: "Everyone knows what such a covenant means, and the tenant must fulfil it according to the nature of the premises: for it is established by Stanley v. Towgood (3 Bing. N. C. 4) and other cases that the same nicety of repair is not exacted for an old building as for a new one. It is clear, however, that justice has been done here according to that principle, for it was proved that it would have cost £155 to put these premises in complete repair, and the jury threw off the £100, probably because they were old." That judgment, like the summing-up in Gutteridge v. Munyard (supra) seems to deal mainly with the application of a covenant of this kind to an old house.

The next case referred to was Scales v. Lawrence (2 F. and F., 289), also a landlord and tenant case. Here there was a covenant so often as need should require, well and sufficiently to repair, uphold, sustain, paint, glaze, cleanse, &c., a house and premises and to leave the premises in such repair, "reasonable wear and tear excepted." It was held that if at the expiration of the lease the tenant had repaired within a reasonable time before leaving, he was only bound, "in addition to the repair of actual dilapidations, to clean the old paint, &c., and not to repaint, &c." Upon that covenant Mr. Justice Willes directed the jury "No tenant is bound to leave, for his landlord, a new house; but the house which he took, in a state of fit repair, as such house. And if he has painted the outside in three years, and the inside within seven years, he is not bound to do it again when leaving, unless so far as is required by actual dilapidations or destruction of the paint; and so of other repairs. He may, if he likes, have the benefit of his repairs, so as to leave the premises in a fit state, reasonable wear and tear excepted. If he painted and papered within seven years, and there is no damage in the way of breaking down or tearing off, then the reasonable construction of the covenant is, that he should 'cleanse' the old paint, &c., (or renew it only where destroyed), and give up the house in a clean and fair condition, and for fair wear and tear he would not be liable. Questions of this sort are questions of fact for you, to be decided on what are the substantial merits of the case rather than on strict rights or extreme law. The landlord is not to claim for every crack in the glass or every scratch on the paint. The reasonable rule probably would be not to charge for a pane of glass merely with one crack in it, and so forth. Such covenants must not be strained, but reasonably construed, on the principle of 'give and take'."

I think that the point to be made for the present purpose from those three cases is that in all of them very little stress is laid on the exception of reasonable wear and tear. The covenant is construed in those cases not quite, no doubt, as it would have been construed, but very much as it would have been construed, if that exception had not been present.

Those three cases I think go strongly to show that this exception is not to be construed as making any great or grave inroad on the general liability to repair.

The first of the more modern cases is Davies v. Davies (38 Ch.D., 499). That was a case tried before Mr. Justice Kekewich and it raised the question whether a lease which had been granted by a tenant-for-life went beyond the power of leasing given to such tenants by the Settled Estates Act, 1877. That statute provides that such leases shall not be made without impeachment of waste. In Davies v. Davies (supra) the lease was granted exempting the lessee from liability for "fair wear and tear and damage by tempest" and the question was whether that exemption protected the tenant for years from any liability which would have rested on him at common law. It was plain that it did. The exception of damage by tempest alone would have been sufficient to invalidate the lease and that being so, it was unnecessary to decide how far the terms of the lease relieved the tenant for years from liability resting on him at common law. The learned Judge's observations therefore which are at page 505 were not strictly necessary to the decision of the case. I do not mean to say by that that I in any way differ from them. What the learned Judge says is: "The result is that the tenant although he is liable to the covenant to repair, is not to be liable for any repairs consequent upon or rendered necessary by fair wear and tear, or by damage from tempest. If those words were not there, any dilapidations found at any time or at the end of the term by reason of the wear and tear, the wearing out of the walls and floors of the public-house, for example, from the constant traffic and so forth, he would be liable to replace, and if unfortunately by a storm his chimney-pot was blown down, or he had his roof broken, he would be bound to put it straight, and restore the place to good and substantial repair. From those things he is rendered free by that exception—that is to say, by that exception he is rendered unimpeachable for waste in those particulars. That is just what the statute says he shall not be, and I think that that shows that the provisions of the statute have not been complied with." Whether those observations are absolutely correct or not, I see nothing in that decision to affect the view which I take of this covenant.

The next case is important because it is one of the only two cases in which the meaning of the exception has been considered. It is the case of Terrell v. Murray (17 The Times L.R., 570). That was an action by landlord against tenant for breach of contract in failing to deliver up the demised house in the agreed state of repair. The covenant was to deliver up "at the expiration or sooner determination of the said term in as good repair and condition as it is now in, reasonable wear and tear . . . excepted." There was no covenant to repair during the term. At the expiration of the term the lessor claimed for dilapidations including three items, one for painting the outside woodwork of the house, another for repointing the brickwork, and the third for repairing parts of the kitchen floors which had become affected by dry rot. It was held that the lessee was not liable for those three items. The Official Referee had found the liability at £39 which included £12 for painting the outside woodwork of the building, £2 for repointing certain brickwork, and £5 for repairing parts of the kitchen floor. On appeal the Divisional Court found for the appellant, the defendant. Mr. Bonsey, for the plaintiff, went so far as to argue that the words in the exception were mere surplusage and did not, at any rate, apply to the outside of the house. Mr. Justice Bruce said that "it was a little curious that there was no very satisfactory authority as to the meaning of the words 'fair or reasonable wear and tear.' He could not agree with Mr. Bonsey when he said that no meaning ought to be given to the words at all, nor could he agree that they had no operation in regard to the outside of the premises. The meaning of the covenant in his opinion was that the tenant was bound at the end of the tenancy to deliver up the premises in as good condition as they were in at the beginning subject to the following exceptions, that was to say, dilapidations caused by the friction of the air, dilapidations caused by exposure, and dilapidations caused by ordinary use. As he was of opinion that outside painting was not a thing the tenant was bound to do under that covenant, and as the amount due to the plaintiff would thus be reduced to the amount paid into Court, he gave judgment for the defendant." Mr. Justice Phillimore felt some difficulty, but on the whole he concurred. The only points decided in that case were that an exception of reasonable wear and tear is not to be regarded as mere surplusage and that a proper meaning must be given to it and that there there was no liability to do outside painting. That case was much relied upon by the defendants but I find nothing in it to alter the view which I have formed. The next case is Citron v. Cohen (36 The Times L.R., 560). In that case Mr. Justice Sankey accepted the definition or explanation of "reasonable wear and tear" given in the case to which I have just referred, but the case was decided on other points altogether. It was decided that the dilapidations of which the landlord complained were his own doing.

The next case is Miller v. Burt (63 Sol. Jo., 117). In that case the house was old and was moreover in bad repair at the beginning of the term. The covenant was to keep the house in the same state of repair, that is to say, it amounted to a covenant not to allow the house to go from bad to worse, "fair wear and tear excepted." The Court pronounced a formula for the guidance of the arbitrator in these words: "The tenant is responsible for repairs necessary to maintain the premises in the same state as when he took them. If, however, wind and weather have a greater effect on the premises, having regard to their character, than if the premises had been sound, the tenant is not bound so to repair as to meet the extra effect of the dilapidations so caused." That appears to be nothing more than a statement that in dealing with a covenant to keep old premises in the same state of repair as they were in at the date of the lease, the age of the premises and their condition at the beginning of the tenancy must be taken into consideration, but that would equally have been so if there had been no exception of fair wear and tear at all and it appears to me that that formula throws no light at all upon the meaning and effect of a fair wear and tear exception.

The last case referred to was Manchester Bonded Warehouse Company, Limited v. Carr (5 C.P.D., 507, at p. 513). There the plaintiffs had demised certain floors in a warehouse to the defendant at a rent and the defendant had covenanted to repair, maintain, and keep the inside of the premises in good and tenantable repair and condition and to deliver them up at the end of the term, damage by fire, storm, or tempest, or other inevitable accident, and reasonable wear and tear only excepted. Five points were discussed and the only one which is now material was the extent of the liability of the defendant under his covenant. At page 513, Lord Coleridge, C.J., says this: "It only remains to consider whether reasonable wear and tear can include destruction by reasonable use. These words, no doubt, include destruction to some extent, e.g., destruction of surface by ordinary friction, but we do not think they include total destruction by a catastrophe which was never contemplated by either party." That case and the case of Terrell v. Murray (supra) are the only cases in which the exception has been separately considered, where the wear and tear was defined as meaning the dilapidations by certain destructive agencies rather than those agencies themselves. In my opinion, such words as "fair" and "reasonable" in an exception of this kind qualify both the destructive agencies which do the damage and also the dilapidation which they bring about. Such words can be used no doubt to qualify human user, but they could not be used to qualify forces of nature. It would be impossible to speak of an "unfair rain" or an "unreasonable frost." To bring dilapidations within the protection of such an exception as that in this case, I think that two things must be shown: First, that the dilapidations for which exemption is claimed were caused by normal human use or by the normal action of the elements, and, secondly, that they are reasonable in amount, having regard to the terms of the contract to repair the premises and keep them in good condition and the other circumstances of the case. In the present case, as I have said, there was an omission to repair for a very long period of time. For 42 years the widow was tenant in possession and failed to take any steps to counteract the natural process of decay.

On those facts I have some difficulty in holding that these dilapidations were not caused by reasonable wear and tear, but I am quite clear that they are not reasonable wear and tear on the ground that they are altogether unreasonable in amount and inconsistent with the plain intention of the testator.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the Official Referee was right and that the appeal fails.

Mr. Justice Talbot read the following judgment:—The plaintiffs are trustees of the will of William Leach who died in November, 1884. The defendants are executors of his widow who was tenant for life under his will of a house and premises in Salisbury. She died in February, 1926. The devise provided for repairs of the premises by the tenant for life as follows: "She . . . keeping the same in good repair and condition (reasonable wear and tear excepted)." She was also bound to insure against fire in the names of the trustees of the will. The effect of the words set out is that having accepted the devise and enjoyed the property she is bound in equity by this condition under which it was left to her as if she had covenanted in the same terms.

The action was brought by the trustees to recover damages from her estate for alleged breaches of the condition and was tried by one of the Official Referees. The course which the trial took was that, after evidence for the plaintiffs and argument as to the construction of the condition in the will, figures were agreed as those for which the judgment should be given respectively according as the Official Referee adopted one or other of the rival contentions. He adopted that of the plaintiffs and gave judgment accordingly for £550. If the defendants are right, the agreed figure is £97. These figures were compromise figures and do not represent an exact calculation. It is perhaps unfortunate that the Official Referee does not state very precisely the two constructions of which he chose one. Roughly I think they come to this. The plaintiffs said that, while the tenant for life was not liable for defects directly caused by wear and tear, the exception did not supersede the first part of the condition and she was bound to do such repairs as were necessary to prevent damage, even if originally caused by wear and tear, from producing further damage, or (putting it somewhat differently) that damage caused by reasonable wear and tear meant damage so caused by a tenant who acted reasonably. The defendants said that as to any damage caused by reasonable wear and tear the tenant for life was entitled to do nothing, and simply to be inactive, whatever might be the consequences to the property. It is scarcely too much to say that as to this class of damage the result is to leave the tenant for life liable for voluntary waste only to which she would be liable without any express condition. On the other hand, it is true that the plaintiffs' surveyors admitted that for all practical purposes they had disregarded the exception altogether. It is obviously the duty of the Court to give effect if possible to the whole of the condition and exception and, bearing this in mind, I will state what is, in my opinion, its true construction, which must, I think, be the same as if like words were in a covenant in a lease.

The meaning is that the tenant (for life or years) is bound to keep the house in good repair and condition but is not liable for what is due to reasonable wear and tear. That is to say, his obligation to keep in good repair is subject to that exception. If any want of repair is alleged and proved in fact, it lies on the tenant to show that it comes within the exception. Reasonable wear and tear means the reasonable use of the house by the tenant and the ordinary operation of natural forces. The exception of want of repair due to wear and tear must be construed as limited to what is directly due to wear and tear, reasonable conduct on the part of the tenant being assumed. It does not mean that if there is a defect originally proceeding from reasonable wear and tear the tenant is released from his obligation to keep in good repair and condition everything which it may be possible to trace ultimately to the defect. He is bound to do such repairs as may be required to prevent the consequences flowing originally from wear and tear from producing others which wear and tear would not directly produce. For example, if a tile falls off the roof, the tenant is not liable for the immediate consequences: but, if he does nothing and in the result more and more water gets in, and the roof and walls decay, and ultimately the top floor, or the whole house, becomes uninhabitable, he cannot say that it is due to reasonable wear and tear and that therefore he is not liable under his obligation to keep the house in good repair and condition.

In such a case the want of repair is not in truth caused by wear and tear. Far the greater part of it is caused by the failure of the tenant to prevent what was originally caused by wear and tear from producing results altogether beyond what was so caused. On the other hand, take the gradual wearing away of a stone floor or staircase by ordinary use. This may in time produce a considerable defect in condition, but the whole of the defect is caused by reasonable wear and tear, and the tenant is not liable in respect of it.

It has been said both in reported cases and in text books that there is strangely little authority on the construction of this familiar exception. What authority there is is for the most part in summings-up at nisi prius or in short and imperfect reports of judgments. I know of no case which is at all inconsistent with what is said above. Indeed it appears to me that our judgment in this case is to a considerable extent supported by the case of Manchester Bonded Warehouse Company, Limited v. Carr (5 C.P.D., 507). In Terrell v. Murray (17 The Times L.R., 570) there appears to have been no evidence at all of any defect in the painting not directly due to reasonable wear and tear in the sense explained above and the tenant was accordingly held to be protected by the exception from any liability in respect of painting. This view which I take of the liability of the tenant for life being in substance that submitted by the plaintiffs and adopted by the learned Official Referee, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed with costs.

1927. Dec. 15.

GRAIGOLA MERTHYR COMPANY, LIMITED v. SWANSEA CORPORATION.*

Local Government—Unsuccessful action against local authority—Costs as between solicitor and client—Quia timet action—"Act done"—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 61), s. 1.

Section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, which directs that a successful defendant shall be entitled to costs as between solicitor and client in an action in respect of "any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority," applies to a quia timet action, where the act of the defendant is anticipated, but has not been actually completed.

The plaintiffs brought a quia timet action against the defendants for an injunction to restrain them from filling a certain reservoir, it being feared that the water might filter through and damage the plaintiffs' mines. Mr. Justice Tomlin dismissed the action (see 43 The Times L.R., 600), directing the plaintiffs to pay to the defendants two-thirds of their costs of the action. The Taxing Master proposed to allow the defendants costs as between solicitor and client, in accordance with section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, the material parts of which are as follows:—

Section 1.—"Where after the commencement of this Act any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect. . . .

"(b) Wherever in any such action a judgment is obtained by the defendant, it shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client. . . ."

The plaintiffs, however, moved before Mr. Justice Tomlin that only costs taxed in the ordinary way, as between party and party, should be allowed, on the ground that there was in the present action no "act done" by the defendants. The plaintiffs contended that section 1 (b) did not apply to a quia timet action, where the defendants had done nothing at all, but where it was merely apprehended that they might do something in the future.

Mr. Justice Tomlin refused the application, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Upjohn, K.C., and Mr. A. T. James appeared for the plaintiffs; Sir Leslie Scott, K.C., and Mr. Holmes for the defendants.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in his considered judgment, after stating the material facts, continued:—

Counsel for the plaintiffs do not dispute that the act threatened to be done and sought to be restrained was in execution of an Act of Parliament. Upon that basis an application was made to Mr. Justice Tomlin for an order under section 1 (b) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, which runs as follows: "Wherever in any such action a judgment is obtained by the defendant, it shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client. . . ." Mr. Justice Tomlin, after argument upon a motion to vary the minutes of his judgment, confirmed his order that the plaintiffs pay to the defendants two-thirds of their costs of the action to be taxed as between solicitor and client, and also ordered them to pay the costs of the motion to vary the minutes of the order. From that refusal to vary his order the plaintiffs appeal. They claim that the section above quoted does not apply, because it is only applicable to such actions as are comprised within section 1 of the Act, namely, where an action is commenced "for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament"; and that clause (a) imposes a time limit to bringing an action founded upon such an act, as illustrated by Freeborn v. Leeming (42 The Times L.R., 119; [1926] 1 K.B., 160). They argue that the present action is quia timet, before any act has been done, and was instituted by the plaintiffs to prevent any act from being done in execution of the Acts of Parliament referred to, which would have caused injury, and thus there was no "act done" within the section, which demands that there should be an act from which time may be calculated.

There is no doubt that orders for costs as between solicitor and client have been made in quia timet actions. Thus in Harrop v. Ossett Corporation (14 The Times L.R., 308; [1898] 1 Ch., 525) such an order was made where the claim was for an injunction quia timet. So also in Toms v. Clacton Urban District Council (14 The Times L.R., 474), and apparently in Holford v. Acton Urban District Council (14 The Times L.R., 476; [1898] 2 Ch., 240), and in Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company v. Wandsworth District Board of Works (14 The Times L.R., 576; [1898] 2 Ch., 603). The last is a decision of the Court of Appeal, but the point now taken does not appear to have been argued. In Grand Junction Waterworks Company v. Hampton Urban District Council (15 The Times L.R., 412) Mr. Justice Stirling made an order for costs as between solicitor and client in a quia timet action, and he rejected the argument that because the plaintiffs claimed a declaration simply, and the action was not brought for some act of the defendants, the power to order such costs did not apply. He said that "so to decide would be shutting one's eyes to the facts of the case. The action was not brought to decide an abstract question, but to ascertain whether the defendants would be right or wrong if they carried out their threats and took proceedings before the proper tribunal, as they had threatened to do." This reasoning appears to me to be correct. A quia timet action is not based upon hypothetical facts for the decision of an abstract question. When the Court has before it evidence sufficient to establish that an injury will be done if there is no intervention by the Court—it will act at once, and protect the rights of the party who is in fear, and thus supply the need of what has been termed protective justice. It is a very old principle. Sir E. Coke, 2nd Institute, page 299, says that preventing justice excelleth punishing justice, and quotes Bracton's advice : "Et hoc faciat tempestive, ne per negligentiam damnum incurrat, quia melius est in tempore occurrere quam post causam vulneratam remedium quaerere."

In the Smallpox Hospital case, Attorney-General v. Manchester Corporation (9 The Times L.R., 315 ; [1893] 2 Ch. 87, at p. 91), Mr. Justice Chitty said that where it is certain that injury will arise the Court will at once interfere by injunction, and called attention to the words of Lord Eldon in Crowder v. Tinkler (19 Vesey, 617, at p. 622), "extreme probability of irreparable injury" ; and of Lord Brougham in Earl of Ripon v. Hobart (3 M. and K., 169, at p. 176) : "Proceeding upon practical views of human affairs, the law will guard against risks which are so imminent that no prudent person would incur them, although they do not amount to absolute certainty of damage." See also Mitford on Pleading, pp. 171-2. From these authorities it appears that the action of the Court in a quia timet action is one rather of procedure when it has become seized of facts which require its intervention. It takes the facts as they must appear to practical men ; but it does require facts, and not mere suggestion. In the present case, therefore, upon the pleadings to which I have referred, it appears to me that the foundation of the action was the acts of the corporation which would be done under their statutory powers. They were regarded by the plaintiffs as acts imminent—and no longer contingent, and forced them to found an action, and to bring these facts to the attention of the Court and require assistance from it.

It is true that in Fielden v. Morley Corporation (14 The Times L.R., 566, 576 ; [1899] 1 Ch., 1, and 16 The Times L.R., 219 ; [1900] A.C., 133), where it was held that the statute does not apply to appeals, Lord Lindley entered a caveat as to what acts do come within the statute. That case, however, does not, in my judgment, modify the observations which I have ventured to make as to the basis on which the Court was invited to act in the present case. In any view, it appears to me that it would be too narrow an interpretation of this remedial statute to cut down the meaning of the words "act done" to an act which had been completed. The threat to proceed is sufficient. I agree with the view of Mr. Justice Romer in Harrop v. Ossett Corporation (supra, at p. 527) that there is no reason for limiting the scope of the section in a narrow sense.

In my judgment, the order made in the Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company's case (supra), affirmed in the Court of Appeal, where the Board of Works were about to lower the surface of the street, was a right order. Where the section applies it is directory, and therefore, in my judgment, the order of Mr. Justice Tomlin was right. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs as between party and party.

LORD JUSTICE SARGANT.—I agree that this appeal should be dismissed, and am content to adopt as my own the judgment on this point of Mr. Justice Tomlin. His reasoning has not, in my opinion, been displaced or substantially affected by the criticisms of counsel for the plaintiffs.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE.—This appeal raises a question of general importance—namely, whether a quia timet action for an injunction comes within section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, so as to entitle the public authority to solicitor and client costs as against an unsuccessful plaintiff.

In the present case the act sought to be restrained by injunction was an act which the defendants were intending to do in the execution of their statutory powers and duties as the local authority for the district and borough of Swansea.

On behalf of the plaintiffs it was contended that section 1 of the Act only applies to actions for completed acts and completed neglects or defaults, and that the present action does not come within the section because it is an action to prevent the defendants from doing an act and not an action for an act already done by them.

In Fielden v. Morley Corporation (14 The Times L.R., 566, 576 ; [1900] 1 Ch., 1), affirmed in the House of Lords (16 The Times L.R., 219 ; [1900] A.C., 133), it was held that the section applied to actions for injunctions in the Chancery Division, and Lord Lindley, in delivering the judgment of the Court, after quoting the title of the Act, stated that the key to the enactment was that it was intended, as the title showed, to protect public bodies from expense when they were unsuccessfully sued in respect of acts done or omitted to be done in the exercise of statutory powers or duties. In that case the action was brought to restrain the overflow of water on to the plaintiff's land, but in the judgment there is no hint of a distinction between quia timet and other actions for an injunction.

The principle upon which that case was decided, in my opinion, applies as much to actions for an injunction to restrain an act threatened to be done by a public body in the exercise of statutory powers or duties as to actions for an injunction to restrain the repetition of an act which had already been done by such a body in the exercise of such powers or duties. In the latter case as well as in the former the injunction sought is an injunction to restrain future acts. The only difference between the two cases is that in a purely quia timet action the burden of proof resting on the plaintiff is far heavier than in an action where an act has already been done and has already caused actual damage. In both cases, however, the issue is the same—namely, whether the act (completed or intended) is an act causing substantial damage to the plaintiff. It would be strange if the protection afforded by the Act to public bodies were to depend upon the precise moment when an action was commenced, and that if the plaintiff should happen to issue his writ before the act was done the public body would lose the protection afforded by the Act, but if the plaintiff were to delay the issue of the writ until after the act had been done the public body would have that protection. In the present case counsel for the plaintiffs had to admit that if the defendants had actually commenced filling their reservoir, instead of first giving to the plaintiffs notice of their intention to fill it, he could not have contended that this action would not have fallen within the section.

In at least two of the cases cited during the argument it was held that the local authority was entitled to solicitor and client costs on the dismissal of a purely quia timet action for an injunction—namely, Harrop v. Ossett Corporation (14 The Times L.R., 308 ; [1898] 1 Ch., 525) and Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company v. Wandsworth District Board of Works (14 The Times L.R., 576 ; [1898] 2 Ch., 603). In the former case Mr. Justice Romer, and in the latter case the Court of Appeal (after having reserved judgment), dismissed the action and ordered the plaintiffs to pay the defendants' costs as between solicitor and client. So far as appears, the point taken by the plaintiffs on the present occasion was not taken by counsel in either of these cases, but it is not, therefore, to be assumed that in making the orders the Court was unmindful of the fact that the actions were purely quia timet actions. Although these cases were decided upwards of 25 years ago, I am not aware of any case until the present in which it has been suggested that the orders made in these two cases were wrong.

To hold that the operation of the section is limited to actions for an injunction where some act has already been done would, in my opinion, be placing a construction on the language of the section which is too narrow and contrary to the principle upon which Fielden v. Morley Corporation (supra) was decided. The plaintiffs' contention rests mainly in the use of the past tense in the expression "any act done." Having regard to the collocation in which that expression occurs, I think that the plaintiffs are attributing far too much weight to the past participle "done." The section deals with actions for acts and for omissions, both of a limited kind—namely, acts and omissions in the exercise of some statutory authority or duty—and, in separating acts from omissions and appending the necessary qualification to each, the use of the word "done" is not unnatural in the case of acts as distinguished from omissions, such word not being there used in an essentially temporal signification. In my opinion the expression "for any act done" in the section bears much the same meaning as the expression "for doing any act" and does not operate to exclude quia timet actions for threatened acts.

Counsel relied upon clause (a) of the section, which, as he rightly pointed out, has been strictly construed by the Courts (see, for example, Freeborn v. Leeming, 42 The Times L.R., 119 ; [1926] 1 K.B., 160), as showing that quia timet actions cannot properly be held to fall within the scope of the section. In my opinion this clause does not support his contention. Clause (a) imposes a time limit after the expiration of which no action will lie ; actions for an injunction brought before the act complained of is done are not within the mischief aimed at by the clause, and such actions are not, in my opinion, purported to be prohibited by that clause. The real meaning of that clause is that no action shall lie unless it is commenced at the latest before the expiration of six months next after the act or omission complained of. This construction in no way touches or affects the decisions of the Court in cases like Freeborn v. Leeming (supra).

In the result, I have come to the conclusion that the present action is in substance an action for an "act done" in execution of a statutory power or duty within the meaning of the section. I am fortified in this view by the fact that it accords not only with the decisions in the cases to which I have referred, but also with the view expressed by Mr. Justice Stirling in Grand Junction Waterworks Company v. Hampton Urban District Council (15 The Times L.R., 412), where that learned Judge held that an action for a declaration brought for the purpose of testing the legality of an act threatened to be done by the local authority if the plaintiffs continued the erection of certain buildings was an action falling within the provisions of the section, and ordered the plaintiffs to pay costs as between solicitor and client.

For the reasons stated I think that the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

K.B. Div. (Shearman and Finlay, JJ.) 1927. Dec. 15.

ROE v. RUSSELL.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Statutory tenant—Right to sublet—Position of sub-tenant after determination of tenant's tenancy—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 15 (1).

Section 15 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, provides :—"A tenant who by virtue of the provisions of this Act retains possession of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies shall, so long as he retains possession, observe and be entitled to the benefit of all the terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy, so far as the same are consistent with the provisions of this Act. . . ."

The right to sublet possessed by a common law tenant in the absence of prohibition in the agreement or lease creating the tenancy is not a term or condition of the original tenancy within this subsection so as to ensure to the benefit of a statutory tenant.

Therefore, a "statutory tenant" (i.e., a tenant who, after the expiration of his tenancy at common law holds over under the Rent Restriction Acts against the will of the landlord, or any other person who is protected from eviction by the Acts) has no right to sublet a portion of the premises occupied by him to a sub-tenant, although he was not forbidden to sublet in his original contract of tenancy.

A case which raised the question whether a statutory tenant under the Rent Restriction Acts had a right to sublet part of the premises occupied by him came before the Court on appeal from his Honour Judge Hargreaves at Brentford County Court. Their Lordships decided that the tenant had no such right.

In September, 1915, a Mr. Jameson became the tenant of certain premises within the Rent Restriction Acts, of which the rooms which were the subject of the present proceedings formed part. The landlord of the whole premises was then a Mrs. Alders, and under his tenancy agreement Mr. Jameson was not forbidden to sublet. In November, 1919, Mrs. Alders assigned her interest in the premises to the plaintiff, Mr. Percy Davis Roe. In 1921 Mr. Roe served a notice to quit on Mr. Jameson, who thereupon became a statutory tenant of the premises. In November, 1925, Mr. Jameson sublet to the defendant, Mr. William Russell, an omnibus inspector, the rooms which were the subject of the present proceedings. In July, 1926, Mr. Roe obtained an order for possession of the whole of the premises against Mr. Jameson on the ground of non-payment of rent, and Mr. Jameson left the premises in May, 1927, leaving the defendant in possession of the rooms which had been sublet to him. Mr. Jameson had never agreed that a term should be added to his tenancy prohibiting him from subletting.

The plaintiff took proceedings in the county court for the ejectment of the defendant from the rooms occupied by him, and the county court Judge decided in the plaintiff's favour. The defendant appealed.

Mr. Schultess-Young appeared for the appellant; Mr. Sidney Isaacs for the respondent.

Mr. Justice Shearman.—This appeal must be dismissed. It is always wise to define one's terms. In my judgment "statutory tenant," that familiar phrase, does not mean a tenant who occupies a house at such a rental that it comes within the scope of the Rent Restriction Acts, but a tenant who holds over after the expiration of his tenancy against the will of the landlord. That would include anyone who acquires a right under the Acts not to be evicted. In these cases a distinction must always be drawn between a person who derives his rights under the original lease or agreement for a lease which makes him a tenant at common law and a person whose only rights are those which he obtains under the Acts.

The argument addressed to us on behalf of the appellant in the present case and in support of the contention that the tenant, Jameson, had a right to sublet to him the rooms which are the subject-matter of the present dispute is based on section 15 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. It is contended that the words in that subsection, "a tenant . . . shall . . . be entitled to the benefit of all the terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy, so far as the same are consistent with the provisions of this Act," conferred on Jameson the right to sublet to the appellant part of the premises which he occupied as tenant. For a long time the subsection was thought, not by express decision but by tacit assumption, to confer such a right, but, in my judgment, that belief was put an end to by the decision in Keeves v. Dean (40 The Times L.R., 211; [1924] 1 K.B., 685). In that case the Court held that the right to assign which belongs to a common law tenant in the absence of provision to the contrary in the lease or agreement creating the tenancy was not one of the "terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy" to the benefit of which a statutory tenant who had not been forbidden to assign by the terms of his lease or agreement was entitled under the subsection.

Before Keeves v. Dean (supra) there were a number of decisions in which no distinction was drawn between the statutory tenant and the tenant who was still in occupation under his original unexpired lease or tenancy agreement, from the point of view of the rights or estate which passed to executors, trustees in bankruptcy, and so forth. Later, however, the current of the decisions flowed in the other direction and, in my view, Keeves v. Dean (supra) clears up the matter, although it is curious that section 5, subsection 1 (h), of the Act of 1920 as amended by the Act of 1923 was not referred to in the arguments or in the judgments there. I cannot understand how the right to sublet can be considered to be one of the "terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy" when the right to assign is not.

After Keeves v. Dean (supra) there was a dictum of Mr. Justice Swift in Aston v. Smith (40 The Times L.R., 576; [1924] 2 K.B., 143, at p. 146) where he said: "A statutory tenant . . . is a person who has a personal right not to have an order for possession made against him, and that is the only right he possesses. He cannot assign, sublet or demise it or deal with it in any way." Then there was Wheeler v. Smith (unreported, May 14, 1926), which expressly decided that a statutory tenant had no interest which entitled him to sublet.

It is, however, argued that Campbell v. Lill (42 The Times L.R., 397) is contrary to the decision in Keeves v. Dean (supra), but examination of Campbell v. Lill (supra) shows that only one question came up for decision, and that was whether the landlord was entitled to possession under section 5 (1) (h) of the Act of 1920 as amended by the Act of 1923 on the ground that the tenant had sublet the demised premises without consent. I do not think, therefore, that there was anything in that decision to conflict with Keeves v. Dean (supra), but if there is any conflict between the two cases I prefer to follow the greater current of authority as expressed in Keeves v. Dean (supra) and to hold that a statutory tenant has no power to sublet. The result is that the defendant is not entitled to retain possession of the rooms which he has occupied, and that the decision of the county court Judge was right.

Mr. Justice Finlay.—I am of the same opinion, and I desire to add only a few sentences. There is no doubt that these statutes are puzzling and that difficulties arise on the decisions under them—difficulties which are very well illustrated by the fact to which our attention in this case was very properly called, that there are two dicta in precisely opposite directions, one by Mr. Justice Greer in Parkinson v. Noel ([1923] 1 K.B., 117, at p. 119) and one by Mr. Justice Swift in Aston v. Smith (40 The Times L.R., 576; [1924] 2 K.B., 143, at p. 146). So far as I am concerned, however, I think that my view of the Act is very well expressed by what Mr. Justice Lush, sitting as a member of the Court of Appeal, said in Keeves v. Dean (40 The Times L.R., 211, at p. 212; [1924] 1 K.B., 685, at p. 697): "When it is said that a person who, perhaps inaccurately, is called a statutory tenant can assign one necessarily asks oneself what it is that he has got to assign. He has no estate in the premises, that has come to an end, and all that the statute has given him is a purely personal right to be free from disturbance by his landlord. It is a very valuable right, but it is personal to him." That, I believe, accurately expresses the correct view of these statutes, and it seems to me to follow that the statutory tenant, as he has persistently, but very unfortunately, been called, cannot sublet for precisely the same reason—namely, that he has no estate out of which the subletting can be carved.

It was said on behalf of the appellant that we must have regard not only to that decision but also to the subsequent decision of two members of the Court of Appeal sitting as a Divisional Court, in Campbell v. Lill (42 The Times L.R., 397). I have felt some difficulty with regard to that case, but I think that the decision there is explained by noticing, as appears from the latter part of the judgment of Lord Justice Bankes, that the Court was there directing its attention to the position created by section 4, subsection 1 (h), of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923. I should perhaps observe that Lord Justice Bankes had in Keeves v. Dean (supra) explained with very great clearness why he considered that section 15, subsection 1, of the Act of 1920 could not operate to cause the right to assign to be a term or condition of the original contract of tenancy (see 40 The Times L.R., at p. 212 ; [1924] 1 K.B., at p. 691). What Lord Justice Bankes there said with regard to the right of a statutory tenant to assign appears to me to apply, mutatis mutandis, to his right to sublet.

Lastly, we were referred to Wheeler v. Smith (unreported), which was decided about two months after the decision in Campbell v. Lill (supra). Any difficulty that might be felt with regard to the decision in Campbell v. Lill (supra) is largely removed by this later decision, which appears to me to be a decision directly in point and one which we are following in arriving at the conclusion to which we have come. Surveying the Acts as a whole, I think that we are putting the proper construction on them, and that, in so doing, we are following the main current of authority. I agree, therefore, that this appeal fails.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed, with costs.

THE MOSTYN.*

Ship—Damage by ship to electric cable in docks—Absence of negligence—Whether shipowners "answerable" to dock undertakers—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict., c. 27), s. 74—Pilotage Act, 1913 (2 and 3 Geo. V., c. 31), s. 15.

The defendants' steamship, while proceeding from one of the plaintiffs' docks to another, through a communication channel, fouled with her anchor and did damage to certain cables owned by the plaintiffs and used for electric lighting and power in the docks. The plaintiffs alleged negligence on the part of the defendants or their servants, but by an amendment of their pleadings also alleged that the damage complained of was damage done by a vessel to a dock or works connected therewith, and that in any event the shipowners were answerable therefor to the plaintiffs, as undertakers of the said dock or works, by reason of s. 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, as amended by s. 15 of the Pilotage Act, 1913. Section 74 of the Act of 1847 provides :—"The owner of every vessel or float of timber shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber, or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock, or pier, or the quays or works connected therewith ; and the master or person having the charge of such vessel or float of timber through whose wilful act or negligence any such damage is done shall also be liable to make good the same ; and the undertaker may detain any such vessel or float of timber until sufficient security has been given for the amount of damage done by the same : provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend to impose any liability for any such damage upon the owner of any vessel where such vessel shall at the time when such damage is caused be in charge of a duly licensed pilot, whom such owner or master is bound by law to employ and put his vessel in charge of." The Pilotage Act, 1913, by s. 15, abolished the defence of compulsory pilotage and in effect repealed the proviso to s. 74 of the Act of 1847.

Held (Viscount Dunedin and Lord Phillimore dissenting), that under s. 74 the plaintiffs did not require to prove negligence, but had only to show that the action which led to the damage was action attributable to human agency, and therefore that although negligence had not been proved the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (2 App. Cas., 743) explained.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 710 ; [1927] P., 25) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 710 ; [1927] P., 25) affirming an order of the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division (42 The Times L.R., 288 ; [1926] P., 46).

The action was brought by the appellants, the Great Western Railway Company, to recover an agreed sum of £226 for damage done by the anchor of the respondents' steamship Mostyn to electric cables which were lying on the bottom of one of the appellants' docks at Swansea. The questions raised by the appeal were, first, whether the damage was caused by the negligence of the respondents ; and, secondly, whether, in the absence of negligence, the respondents were nevertheless, upon the true construction of section 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, liable to the appellants for the damage.

The President held (1) that there was no negligence on the part of the Mostyn ; (2) on the authority of River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (2 App. Cas., 743), that in the absence of proved negligence section 74 of the Act of 1847 imposed no liability on the owner of a ship towards dock undertakers whose property had been damaged. The Court of Appeal affirmed the President's decision.

Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Mr. Wilfrid Lewis appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Langton K.C., and Mr. K. S. Carpmael for the respondents.

VISCOUNT HALDANE.—My Lords : This was an action brought by the appellants against the respondents for damages for the negligence of the latter in so manœuvring the S.S. Mostyn that in navigating a concrete laid channel of communication between the King's Dock at Swansea belonging to the appellants and the Prince of Wales Dock, also belonging to them in common with the channel of communication, the Mostyn tore up and injured, to the extent of £226 4s. 6d., certain electric cables which crossed the bottom of the concrete laid channel in a horizontal chase-way, open at the top. The claim is based on an allegation of negligence, resulting in liability at common law, and also on the provisions of section 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, which it is said does not require proof of negligence in order to render it applicable. The Courts below have agreed in holding that negligence has not been proved, and the Nautical Assessors who have been present to advise us are of opinion that there was no negligence shown. I understand that we are unanimously of the same opinion, and I shall leave it to others of your Lordships to state the facts out of which this opinion has arisen. I wish, however, to guard myself from being supposed to concur unreservedly in the whole of the observations made by the President, Lord Merrivale, who tried the case, and also in all of the reasons given in the Court of Appeal, which affirmed his conclusion. In a case of this kind, tried after a prolonged interval and dealing with circumstances which have been difficult for the witnesses to observe accurately, it generally results that details of what has been said by witnesses are open to criticism. There has been a good deal of such criticism in the course of the argument for the appellants, and some of it was not without foundation. But reading the evidence as a whole, I have come to the clear conclusion that negligent navigation has not been established. In cases like this, Judges and counsel alike are apt to fasten on details, rather than on the whole to which the details belong. The details are sometimes of a kind on which it is not possible to form a trustworthy judgment. If they are not individually vital, the true method seems to me to be to study the evidence as a whole, and to recognize that its individual details cannot be exhaustively estimated. Reading the whole of the evidence in this macroscopic fashion is safer than merely to piece together microscopic estimates of particular incidents, which are misleading, apart from their context. The distinction between the two methods is to-day familiar in scientific investigation, which recognizes that the macroscopic procedure is the only one which can afford a picture that is at all adequate of what has been experienced.

With this observation, I pass to the very serious question of law which is raised by the second branch of the appellants' argument, on the assumption that actual negligence has not been proved.

My Lords, section 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, provides that "The owner of every vessel or float of timber shall be answerable to the undertakers" (the persons authorized to construct the dock) "for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber, or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock, or pier, or the quays or works connected therewith, and the master or person having the charge of such vessel or float of timber through whose wilful act or negligence any such damage is done shall also be liable to make good the same; and the undertaker may detain any such vessel or float of timber until sufficient security has been given for the amount of damage done by the same: provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend to impose any liability for any such damage upon the owner of any vessel where such vessel shall at the time when such damage is caused be in charge of a duly licensed pilot, whom such owner or master is bound by law to employ and put his vessel in charge of."

By section 76 a remedy over is given to the owner who has had to make satisfaction for any such damage wilfully or negligently done by the master or person in charge, or, if the owner has had to pay any penalty or costs by reason of any act or omission of any other person, the person who actually did such damage or committed the offence is to indemnify the owner.

The question which we have to answer is whether, in a case in which neither negligence nor any other act of an unlawful nature has been established against the owners of the Mostyn or those in charge of her, section 74 makes the owners answerable for the damage done in this case to the dock.

I assume that the master and those in charge were not answerable for any wilful act or negligence, inasmuch as none has been proved against them. But in the case of the owner the section does not in terms require any wrongful act to be established as the condition of liability. The words, taken by themselves, are unambiguous. The owner is to be liable for any damage done to the undertaking. My Lords, if the language of this section can legitimately be construed by us who sit here without regard to authority, I should find difficulty in saying that the appellants were not entitled to claim that it applied. It has been said that to take this view is to attribute to Parliament an intention which is hardly conceivable, the intention of making people liable for damage where they have been in no way to blame. But I am unable to attach much weight to this consideration where the words are clear. What the motives of Parliament were we do not know and cannot inquire. It may be that it desired to encourage undertakers of this class by providing insurance at the cost of owners who are in no way to blame. There are instances of such a principle in modern statutes, such as the Workmen's Compensation Acts, and it may be that it was something analogous that was in the mind of the Legislature. I do not know, and I feel myself precluded from even trying to inquire or from speculating.

But we cannot proceed here on this simple view. It has been established by a decision, which is binding on us, of this House that the language must be interpreted as subject to some qualification which is implicit in the words, and the question which alone we are free and bound to examine is what this qualification is, and how far it extends. In the case of River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (1 Q.B.D. 546; and 2 App. Cas., 743) the question related to a vessel which had been driven on shore by a storm in endeavouring to make the port of Sunderland. The crew had been taken off with difficulty, and there was no control of the ship. Being a complete wreck she was driven by the winds and the waves against a pier belonging to the harbour and damaged it. An action was brought by the Commissioners against the owners, and damages were awarded at the trial against them. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the action would not lie. Sir George Jessel, M.R., was of opinion that the general words of the section did not cover a case where the event causing damage occurred by the act of God or the Sovereign's enemies. It would have been equally difficult to hold that there was liability if the damage had been caused by the action of the undertakers themselves. The proviso exempting the owner of the vessel where there was compulsory pilotage showed that the words were not to be interpreted without restriction. As the result he held that the words were to be construed by the analogy of the common law principle that, where a duty is imposed by a merely generally expressed rule, that rule is not to be interpreted as covering such causes as the act of God.

Chief Baron Kelly thought that the rule of construction was that no one can be made liable, excepting by express contract, for injury occasioned by the act of God, and that this rule applied to the general words of the Act of Parliament before them. But he went further on this language itself, for the section goes on to refer to the master, a person having the charge of such vessel "afloat," and says that if he is negligent he shall "also" be liable. This, and the exemption in case of compulsory pilotage, seemed to Chief Baron Kelly to show that the word "also" imported only the superadding to the negligent act of the person in actual charge a liability of the same kind imposed on the owner.

Lord Justice Mellish agreed. He considered that the statute did mean to extend the liability of the owner beyond that at common law, because apart from such an intention it was difficult to see the object of the section. But he held that it contemplated only a case where the running against the pier was caused "through the act of man." Reading the language as a whole, he said that "it looks as though the Legislature considered that, somehow or other, through the act of man, damage might be done to the pier, and then, in order to get the owner of the pier out of the difficulty of having to prove that it was owing to some particular person's negligence, and that that person was the servant of the owner, they say the owner shall be liable." The Court was therefore jusified in construing the general words, in accordance with the general rule of construction, excluding the act of God.

Mr. Justice Denman agreed that the section exempted the act of God. The words were strong, but they did not, in his view, include a case where the liability was not caused by the owner or his servants, but by the act of God. The words imposing liability on the person in charge confirmed this view, although there might be cases coming within them where the owner would be liable when no person was in charge, but someone ought to have been. But here the act of God was the sole cause.

Baron Pollock concurred, though he said that his reasons were not the same as those of the other members of the Court. He did not know whether damage done by a float of timber arising from a cause not provided against by human providence would in itself be enough for exemption. He was not sure that this could be said to be the act of God. But here the vessel was extraneous to the dock authority and had become derelict. It was only by the force of the elements that she was driven against the pier, and that was not an event against which the statute provided.

My Lords, on these somewhat varying grounds the Court of Appeal reversed the decision below and decided against the Commissioners. It is important to know what was really laid down in this judgment, which was affirmed by the House of Lords. I think that it was only that there having been no human agency as the cause, and the real cause having been the act of God, the case was not covered by the section. The learned Judges were at least agreed on this, that when the cause was not human agency but a vis major beyond human control it did not come within the words.

In the case before us there was no negligence, and, on the hypothesis which I am making, there was no breach of duty at all. It is therefore important to see whether the grounds of the decision in this House in the Adamson case (supra) laid down for us any different principle which was held to take the case outside of the words of the statute. This is not easy to determine, for there was divergence of opinion.

Taking first Lord Cairns's view, I think that he held that it was to go too far to follow the Court of Appeal in saying that, where even a vis major had been the operative cause, the case was one which would have been outside the language used in the section. He found it, however, "difficult to suppose that by means of ordinary and routine clauses inserted in private or local Acts, the Legislature, although it might well provide a ready and simple procedure for recovering damages where a right to damages existed by common law, could intend to create a new right and a new liability to damages unknown to the common law." By common law the owner was not liable merely because he was the owner, unless it were shown that those navigating the ship were his servants. All that the section does, according to Lord Cairns, is to take the owner and declare him to be the person who may be sued for the damage done. Under the subsequent words he may recover over against the master or crew for any act of omission. The clause was therefore in substance a clause of procedure only, dealing with the mode in which a right of action already existing is to be asserted, and did not create any new right of action for damages. Although he did not concur in the reasoning of the Judges of the Court of Appeal, he therefore thought that their conclusion was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

My Lords, the massive legal intelligence, even of Lord Cairns, does not seem to me to have wholly disposed of the question before us. He was dealing with a case in which human agency had been superseded. Here we are dealing with one in which there was human agency, although there was no breach of duty. I think that he meant to go further, and to suggest that even if there was human agency there would be no liability created, provided that there was no breach of duty at common law. But that question was not before him, and what he suggests was not necessary for the decision of the Adamson case (supra). It is therefore important to see whether his suggestion was concurred in by the other noble and learned Lords who took part in the decision. The very power of rhetoric which Lord Cairns commanded, when stating his conclusions about matters of legal principle, makes it the more desirable to see that we are following the substance rather than the form of his propositions. Even if we accept his view that the section is one creating a new procedure, that of suing the owner while giving him a right to recover over, I am quite unable to see how this leaves the existing substantive law intact and relates to procedure alone. The owner could not be sued under that law unless he had violated some duty. If he can be sued at all, even with a right to recover over, it must be because some new substantive liability has been imposed on him by the statute. I think, therefore, that it follows that the common law has been altered, and that a new right of action has been created depending on the alteration. This is much more than mere procedure. Did his colleagues who heard the appeal with him accept his view as I interpret it? I think they did not.

I have studied their opinions. Lord Hatherley and Lord Gordon seem to me to have been impressed, as I own that I myself have been impressed, by the difficulty of reading the words of the Act as not altering the common law by including at least the case of an owner who personally or through his servants was navigating the ship when the damage was caused. Lord Hatherley was a very careful Judge. I think that his disposition here was to hold that the words of the Act were so free from ambiguity that they covered cases in which there was no human agency, though he did not say so in terms. He was content to express his general agreement with the view of Lord Justice Mellish, that the statute only applied where human agency had intervened, and it was because it was absent in the Adamson case (supra) that he concurred in the judgment of the Court of Appeal. I doubt whether Lord Hatherley himself was ready to accept even this restriction of its scope, but he thought it at least a possible one, and if true it was enough to take the circumstances in the case before him, where there was no human agency, outside the language of the Act. That Lord Hatherley did not in terms dissent from the general result reached by the majority I cannot regard as an important circumstance in ascertaining his opinion. Lord Gordon expressly dissented. At the conclusion of an elaborate judgment he expressed the opinion that the statute ought not to be construed as if it contained any exemption from liability where it occurred even from the act of God. The words appeared to him to be express and unambiguous, and, as they were so, he thought that they ought to be read according to their ordinary construction.

My Lords, there remain to be considered the opinions of Lord O'Hagan and Lord Blackburn, with a view to ascertaining whether these noble and learned Lords concurred in the view which had been expressed by Lord Chancellor Cairns, that no new right of action at all was created, whether human agency was or was not present.

My Lords, upon scrutiny of the words used by Lord O'Hagan, I have come to the clear conclusion that he did not concur in the dictum of the Lord Chancellor, so far as it went beyond the facts of the case before him, that the statute created no new right of action, but was confined in its scope to procedure only. The language, Lord O'Hagan thought, was prima facie sufficient to cover all cases, including those in which human agency came in. But he was of opinion that, reading the whole of the section, and particularly the reference to "such" vessel in the words declaring the liability of the master or person having charge of it, an intention was expressed to confine the liability of the owner to vessels "in charge of a master or someone else." On this point he expressed his concurrence with Lord Justice Mellish. The owner is therefore placed in a worse position than he would have been at common law, but not so bad as that in which he would have been had he been made liable when no one had charge on his behalf. The proviso as to the compulsory pilot seemed to Lord O'Hagan to confirm this conclusion. In his view the statute did, as Lord Cairns had said, simply introduce new procedure to the advantage of the dockowner, but it did not enlarge the liability beyond the limits which he had indicated. On the question whether the act of God was excepted it was therefore unnecessary for himself to express an opinion, for it did not arise. In Dennis v. Tovell (L.R., 8 Q.B., 10) the vessel was perhaps not derelict and the owner might properly be held liable.

In Lord Blackburn's opinion a statute was an instrument in writing, to be construed on the same principles as other such instruments. He thought that, on every construction of the statute which he had heard suggested, the Legislature had intended to impose on the owner of the ship a liability occasioned by persons for whom he would not have been liable at common law. But he did not think that the Legislature could have meant to shift the burden of a misfortune befalling the owner of the pier from its owner, who at common law would bear it, to the owner of a ship wholly free from blame and involved, without fault of his, in a common misfortune. Lord Blackburn was of opinion that the purpose of the Legislature was to give the owners of the pier more protection than they had. With a view to this it had enacted that the remedy was to be that the owner, who was generally really liable (for the acts of his agents), though it was difficult and expensive to prove it, should be liable without proof either that there was negligence, or that the person guilty of neglect was the owner's servant, or proving how the mischief happened, and this is expressed by saying that the owner shall be "answerable for any damage done by the vessel, or by any person employed about the same" to the harbour. "As to the cases in which the fault was not that of some person not able to make compensation, for whom the shipowner was not at common law responsible, it may have been thought that the cases would occur so seldom, or when they occurred would probably be of such small amount, that the shifting of the loss from the owner of the property to the owner of the ship was not too high a price to pay for the saving of litigation and expense. The cases of a common misfortune befalling both ship and pier, without the fault of either, seem not to have been thought of. At all events, no exemption or proviso to take these cases out of the general enactment is given in express words." He comes to the conclusion that this was the scheme of the Legislature, the mischief being the expense of litigation, and the remedy being that the owner should be liable without proof of how the accident occurred. He dissented from his own judgment in Dennis v. Tovell (supra) but with great doubt and hesitation. He expressed himself as adverse to the view taken in the Court below that where a statute is enacted which might have expressed, but has not expressed, an exception of the act of God, the Courts should introduce it. He observed that Lord Justice Mellish and Lord Cairns had thought that the words might be construed so as to make the owner of the ship answerable only for damages occasioned by the act of man, damages for which someone is answerable at common law. But he could not see anything in the words to justify what was the opinion of some of the Judges in the Court of Appeal and, he thought, of Lord O'Hagan, that the language was confined to cases in which someone was in actual charge of the ship. Even if it were so this would not, in his view, help the owner in the case before him, for he was in possession of the ship until it was driven on the bank, after which the tide floated it in. The owner was still owner when this ship struck the pier, and it was no mere "congeries of planks," nor was it, in his opinion, a derelict. He had great doubt and hesitation in affirming the judgment of the Court of Appeal, but he would not dissent from the proposal to do so. It was conceivable, as Lord Justice Mellish had thought, that the words referring to "damage done by the ship" might have the restricted sense of injuria cum damno.

My Lords, when the expressions used by Lord Blackburn are considered, I cannot find in them concurrence with the dictum of Lord Cairns that no new right of action was created, even where human agency came in, and that the wide words at the beginning of the section were intended to introduce nothing more than what Lord Cairns had spoken of as a new form of procedure, which would indeed assist the dockowner to pursue a new kind of remedy, but conferred on him no fresh substantive right. On this point the opinions delivered appear to me to leave us under the duty of deciding, unfettered by authority, whether, when the vessel which caused the damage was under the control of the owner's agents, he is liable notwithstanding that there was no breach of the duty not to be negligent on their and his part. I do not think that River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra) settles the point of non-liability where the vessel was in charge, at the time of the accident, of the owner's agents. It seems to me that the words of the statute are too clear to admit of this conclusion, and that the decision of this House in the earlier case is not in truth any authority for it. We do not know enough of the facts in Dennis v. Tovell (supra) to enable us to say whether that case was one of a derelict or whether anyone remained in charge of the vessel. If there was no human agency then what I have said does not apply in that case. I comment on the decision in Adamson's case (supra) on the assumption that, notwithstanding what was said by Lord Blackburn, there was no such human agency. For if there was, that, in my view, brings the case within the uncontrolled words, and would render it analogous to the present case. But on the facts set out in the report I think that the vessel must be taken to have become out of human control.

We appear to me to be bound by the authority of the Adamson case (supra) to hold that the section in question is not to be read literally, but as applying when the damage complained of has been brought about by a vessel under the direction of the owner or his agents, whether negligent or not. The decision further exempts the owner when the vessel is not under such control but is derelict. When there are facts to which it applies it effects an alteration in the common law which imposes a new liability to be sued on the owner, and to that extent changes not merely procedure but also substantive law.

My Lords, if these things are true I find that on the facts established in the present case we must find the owners liable, reverse the judgments of the Court below in their favour, and give judgment for the appellant railway company for damages, the agreed amount of which is £226 4s. 6d.

The appellants are entitled to the general costs here and below, excepting the costs on the issue of negligence on which they have failed. Those costs they must pay to the respondents.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords : I have had the advantage of reading Lord Phillimore's judgment. He has dealt exhaustively with the question whether there was negligence on the part of those in command of the Mostyn and has come to the conclusion that there was none. I agree with his statement and his reasons. I wish, however, to add one remark, because I think the opinions of the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal, who also found that there was no negligence, might be misinterpreted.

There are in those judgments passages which would seem to favour the view that, though the captain knew that it would be negligent to enter the passage way with the anchor down, yet, inasmuch as his command to heave up the anchor was given at a time which would ordinarily have sufficed to take it off the ground before the passage way was reached and as he was only thwarted by the unexpected and unsuspected interference by the Post Office cable, he is thereby excused. That is not my view. If he had been unhampered in his movements, and knew that he had an anchor down, and knew that it would be wrong to enter the passage with it down, I think it would be for him to see that he got it up before he entered the passage and that he could not excuse himself by saying, "I began to heave at such a time as would ordinarily have sufficed." But on the facts here he was not unhampered. His anchor was down without negligence. He was compelled to move on because of the position of the ship and the gale, and, therefore, the position of affairs, as I have just put it, did not arise.

I now come to the point on the statute. The opinions of the noble Lords who decided River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (2 App. Cas. 743) have been analysed again and again. I do not propose to do so because I do not think I could add anything helpful to what has been said by Lord Chancellor Herschell in the case of The Crystal (10 The Times L.R., 551 ; [1894] A.C., 508) and by the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal in this case. At the same time, I do not agree with the method of treatment which those learned Judges took in dealing with River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra). I think it quite necessary to say this because there is, in truth, no difference in the position of the Court of Appeal in this matter and that of your Lordships in this House. River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra) is binding equally on both tribunals. Now, when any tribunal is bound by the judgment of another Court, either superior or co-ordinate, it is, of course, bound by the judgment itself. And if from the opinions delivered it is clear —as is the case in most instances—what the ratio decidendi was which led to the judgment, then that ratio decidendi is also binding. But if it is not clear, then I do not think it is part of the tribunal's duty to spell out with great difficulty a ratio decidendi in order to be bound by it. That is what the Court of Appeal has done here. With great hesitation they have added the opinion of Lord Hatherley to that of Lord Cairns and then, with still greater difficulty, that of Lord Blackburn, and so have secured what they think was a majority in favour of Lord Cairns's very clear view. I do not think that the respect which they hold and have expressed for the judgments of your Lordships' House compelled them to go through this difficult and most unsatisfactory performance. As I have said, our own position is just the same as theirs, and I say unhesitatingly that I agree with Lord Herschell that you cannot extract from the judgments in River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra) such a ratio decidendi as is binding. That, however, is far from wiping that case off the slate. It remains for two purposes : first, for the judgment itself and, second, for the opinions of the noble Lords, which are entitled to the greatest respect. Now, the judgment is binding. What, therefore, I think is our duty on this occasion is to consider the statute for ourselves in the light of the opinions, diverging as they are, and to give an interpretation ; but that interpretation must necessarily be one which would not, if it was applied to the facts of River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra), lead to a different result. In other words, Lord Gordon's view is not open to us. Then, Lord Gordon's view being gone, there are, in my opinion, just three different rationes decidendi on which the case can rest.

There is, first, Sir George Jessel's view, namely, that the words of section 74, absolute in their terms, must be held as having added to them an exception in the case of an act of God, or, in other words, that the exception of an act of God to a duty or a liability cast on a person by the common law is equally true of a duty or liability cast on him by an Act of Parliament. My Lords, I think that that view was in terms disapproved by their Lordships in this House, and I entirely agree with them. My Lords, I had prepared my opinion so far, but I am bound to add a word or two in view of what is going to be said by my noble friend Lord Blanesburgh. He has taken the view which, although the case of River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra) has been again and again considered, I do not think has before been taken, that Sir George Jessel's opinion rests particularly on the pilotage exception. I am not at one with my noble and learned friend about that. I think Sir George Jessel's view was this : no doubt he took the pilotage exception, but he took it in this way. What he said amounted to this : "Here you must revert to the general doctrine of law that there is an exception to a duty at common law of the act of God, and if you do that you find the pilotage exception exactly fits." But I do not think it matters whether I am right about that or not, because, whatever Sir George Jessel said, there is no question that Chief Baron Kelly and Mr. Justice Denman put the matter quite clearly that there was the same exception to an Act of Parliament as there is to a duty cast by common law, and that view was undoubtedly disapproved by this House. Lord Cairns, first of all, deals with it, and, after taking the other view of what Sir George Jessel had said, and then adding the Chief Baron and Mr. Justice Denman, he says : "In my opinion these expressions are broader than is warranted by any authorities of which I am aware. If a duty is cast upon an individual by common law, the act of God will excuse him from the performance of that duty. No man is compelled to do that which is impossible. It is a duty of a carrier to deliver safely the goods entrusted to his care : but if in carrying them with proper care they are destroyed by lightning or swept away by a flood, he is excused, because the safe delivery has by the act of God become impossible. If, however, a man contracts that he will be liable for the damage occasioned by a particular state of circumstances, or if an Act of Parliament declares that a man shall be liable for the damage occasioned by a particular state of circumstances, I know of no reason why a man should not be liable for the damage occasioned by that state of circumstances, whether the state of circumstances is brought about by the act of man or by the act of God." Lord Blackburn is just as explicit at page 771, where he says, speaking of the old case of Paradise v. Jane (Alleyn, 26) : "The really important part of the decision is that where a contract is made which does not either expressly or impliedly except the act of God, the Courts could not introduce that exception by intendment of law ; and that makes strongly against the supposition that, in construing a statute where the Legislature might have expressed, but did not express, such an exception, the Court should introduce it." My Lords, with these opinions I humbly concur, and I have made this digression because I think it would be very unfortunate that there should be any doubt left that that doctrine has been contemned by the House. My noble friend also says that he would have been content to decide the case upon Fletcher v. Rylands (L.R., 3 H.L., 330) and Nichols v. Marsland (2 Ex.D., 1). With great deference to him, I think that that analogy is quite a false one. This leaves the other two views—(1) The view of Lord Cairns that damage in the section must be read as confined to actionable damage, and (2) the view suggested by Lord Justice Mellish and favoured by some of the noble Lords, that the action which led to the damage must be an action attributable to human agency but, that being found, that the words of the section remain absolute. It becomes necessary—for I can see no other alternative—to choose between these two views.

My Lords, on very anxious consideration of what is obviously a difficult and obscure question, I have come to be of opinion that the view of Lord Cairns is the preferable view. I am moved by two considerations. First, I think it is easier to interpret a word used, i.e., damage, in a certain sense rather than to read into the section words which are not there, but which are to be gathered from a general view of the section as a whole. Second, I think that the compulsory pilotage exception fits Lord Cairns's view better than it fits the other. It is obvious that the reflected light which this clause gives as to the interpretation of the preceding part in an Act of 1847 cannot be affected by a change of the law in the Act of 1913. Now, the position of the clause to Lord Cairns's view may be found in his own words :—

"This makes the part of the section relating to the employment of a pilot intelligible and consistent with the rest of the enactment. If a licensed pilot is in charge, the owner is not discharged from a possible liability, but everything is left as it would be at common law. If a pilot was in charge of a ship and the owner was at the same time the master navigating the ship, and did an act which caused damage, he would be liable at common law, and the Act leaves him so ; but, in the same case, if, while the pilot was in charge and the owner was navigating the ship, the ship became unmanageable by tempest the owner would not be liable."

On the other view, the effect of the clause is very one-sided and illogical. The vessel is in fault or is not in fault while the pilot is in charge, and then the owner is not liable. But the vessel is in charge of a person for whom the owner is not responsible, e.g., a repairer in dock, and the owner at once becomes responsible, fault or no fault.

In the result, therefore, though I must needs admit that the matter is difficult when so many distinguished persons have differed, I end by agreeing with Lord Cairns that damage must be actionable damage, and that, therefore, in the present case the owner is not liable. It follows that the appeal should be dismissed, and, if your Lordships agree with my view, there will at least be a clear rule for the future. Although I am not in agreement with the majority of your Lordships, who prefer what I have called Lord Justice Mellish's view, I am glad that there will at least be a clear rule, namely, that the action which led to the damage must be action attributable to human agency, but, that being found, that the words of the section remain absolute.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—My Lords : My noble and learned friend on the Woolsack has in his judgment narrated the circumstances in which damage was done by the anchor of the s.s Mostyn to certain electrical cables lying in the bottom of a waterway or communication passage extending between the King's Dock and the Prince of Wales's Dock, Swansea. These works were part of the undertaking of the Swansea Harbour, vested by statute in the appellants. When the misadventure occurred, the vessel had been in no way abandoned ; her officers and crew were all on board.

Your Lordships are agreed that the damage was done without negligence, on the part of either owner or master or their representatives, in respect of which the common law would attach liability for damage. I entirely assent to that view of the facts.

The appellants, however, raise the further question whether, notwithstanding negligence not being established, the shipowners are, under the provisions of section 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, liable to them, the dockowners, for the damage done by the ship to the dock.

That section is in the following terms :—

"The owner of every vessel or float of timber shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber, or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock, or pier, or the quays or works connected therewith ; and the master or person having the charge of such vessel or float of timber through whose wilful act or negligence any such damage is done shall also be liable to make good the same ; and the undertaker may detain any such vessel or float of timber until sufficient security has been given for the amount of damage done by the same : provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend to impose any liability for any such damage upon the owner of any vessel where such vessel shall at the time when such damage is caused be in charge of a duly licensed pilot, whom such owner or master is bound by law to employ and put his vessel in charge of."

While upon the construction of the words of the statute itself I feel free to confess that I should not personally have found difficulty, yet it has long been plain that most serious difficulty does arise in consequence of the judicial opinions expressed in the House of Lords in River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (2 App. Cas., 743). The solution of that difficulty is of wide importance.

Before that case, the section, when under consideration in Courts of Law, had been construed according to what was held to be the plain and comprehensive tenor of the language used in the Act, and the shipowner was made, according to that language and subject to the pilotage exception, answerable for all damage done by the vessel to the harbour or its connected works in any circumstances. A powerful Court of Queen's Bench, consisting of Chief Justice Cockburn, Mr. Justice Blackburn, and Mr. Justice Quain, decided the case of Dennis v. Tovell (L.R., 8 Q.B., 10 ; 27 L.T., 482), and in delivering the leading judgment Mr. Justice Blackburn used these words :—

"The Legislature has put the owner in the same position as a man who keeps a dangerous animal, who must do so at his peril, and be answerable for any injury such animal may do. It enacts simply that the owner shall be liable for whatever damage the vessel may occasion. It appears to me that the Legislature has clearly said so, whether it intended it or not."

This judgment was expressly followed in the case of The Merle (2 Asp. M.L.C. (N.S.), 402) decided in the Court of Admiralty in 1874 by Sir R. Phillimore.

If this law was not completely overturned by the House of Lords in River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra), it must be conceded that it was severely shaken thereby. So long as that House of Lords' judgment stands, the doctrine that the shipowners are liable to the dockowners for all damage to the works caused by the ship, in all circumstances and in whatsoever manner, can no longer be maintained.

Nearly every Judge who has spoken upon the subject, not only in Adamson's case (supra), but in the various cases thereafter in which Adamson's case (supra) has been referred to, has admitted that, while the restriction of liability enforced by this House has, of course, to be deferred to, yet the imposition of unrestricted and comprehensive liability appears, nevertheless, to be in entire accord with the plain and express words of the statute. This is a notable fact.

There seems, indeed, no reason, my Lords, to doubt that the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal in the present case would not have reached any restricted view of the statutory words had it not been for the case of the River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra). All the learned Judges make that pretty plainly appear from the opinions which they have delivered. With regard to the case of River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra) itself, they also indicate the great difficulty which they have either in reconciling that decision with the statute, or in understanding its scope, or discovering, if any, its ratio decidendi. In The Crystal (10 The Times L.R., 551 ; [1894] A.C., 508) this House, and especially Lord Herschell, plainly found themselves in the same plight. It is the same plight also in which I find myself in this appeal.

The difficulty in regard to River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra) pointedly arises upon the words used by the noble and learned Earl then on the Woolsack, Lord Cairns. It is, nevertheless, our task to escape, if possible, from the "bewilderment" (to use a not inappropriate expression of Lord Justice Scrutton) caused by the variety of opinions delivered in this House. My own humble efforts have resulted as follows :—

It is beyond all things important in considering the Adamson case (supra) to bear in mind its very special circumstances. These are concisely given in the Lord Chancellor's own words :—

"On December 17, 1872, the steamship Natalian was attempting, under stress of weather, to enter the Sunderland Docks, belonging to the appellants ; while it was still in the open sea, about 40 or 50 yards from the pier, it struck the ground, canted with its head to the south, and drifted, bodily, ashore. The crew had been rescued from the ship by means of the rocket apparatus. The tide was low at the time ; and as the tide rose the flood and the storm drifted the ship against the pier and caused damage."

As I read the argument for the shipowners, their main reliance was upon this fact—that the ship was no more than a helpless log ; that all aboard her had been rescued by the rocket apparatus, and that she had been abandoned and was derelict. Sir John Holker, for the owners, put that in the forefront of his argument :—

"There may be nothing unreasonable," said he, "in holding the owner of a ship liable for ordinary damage caused in an ordinary way, but the Legislature never could have intended to make him liable for damage occurring when the ship was really no better than a helpless log upon the water, when the master and the crew were with difficulty saved from death, and the owner had not any means whatever of exercising any possible control over the vessel."

In the course of the appellants' argument, the Lord Chancellor, upon Dennis v. Tovell (supra) being cited, interjected the observation : "The facts there were not the same." It is to be observed accordingly that the one point which was before this House on that occasion was whether such an extremely special case—namely, that of a completely derelict ship—was within the words of the statute ; that is to say, whether the owners could have a liability imposed upon them in the case of a ship abandoned, and beyond all human control, and left to the mercy of the elements.

It would be unnecessary to dwell upon this but for the fact that a careful scrutiny of the judgments delivered seems, to my mind, to point conclusively to this, that every one of the Judges overcomes the misgiving with which manifestly he viewed a pretty apparent infraction of the comprehensive application of the statute by the explanation of this singularity of fact and his conception as to the element of hardship which thus entered the case.

The two main elements of fact were simply : (1) a derelict ship, all means or chance of possible control over which by human agency had disappeared ; (2) damage to a pier by a ship in that state. It was to a case resting on those special facts that the decision of River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra) applied.

So far as the judgment of the Lord Chancellor was concerned, it is clear that the grounds taken by the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal were grounds in which he did not concur. "I do not concur," said he, "in the reasoning of the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal" ; the noble Earl reached the conclusion which they had reached on a different ground—a ground which has given rise to much disturbance of the legal mind for two generations.

It may be noted in passing that while the noble Earl stated that, if a duty was cast upon an individual by common law, the act of God would excuse him from its performance, yet it was a different case where a man, by contract, accepted the liability ; and he further put a statutory liability on precisely the same ground as that of contract, saying :—

"There is nothing impossible in that which, on such a hypothesis, he has contracted to do, or which he is, by the statute, ordered to do—namely, to be liable for the damages."

Having thus sheared away all reasons for questioning the competency of the statute to impose effectively a comprehensive liability, his Lordship then states the common law obligation resting upon negligence, by which common law obligation owners of vessels and those representing them were bound, and he then adds the crucial words :—

"In my opinion, it was to meet this state of the law that this section [section 74] was introduced. It proceeds, as it seems to me, upon the assumption that damage has been done of the kind for which compensation can be recovered at common law against some person ; that is to say, damage occasioned by negligence or wilful misconduct, and not by the act of God."

Later he adds :

"The clause appears to me to be a clause of procedure only, dealing with the mode in which a right of action for damages already existing shall be asserted, and not creating a right of action for damages where no right of action for damages against anyone existed before."

My Lords, I am of opinion that the question is whether the decision of this House rested upon the special and peculiar circumstances of the case, or whether it rested upon a general doctrine of which the first of those sentences is the expression. If the former, the case does not bind this House, or any Court, by a general principle ; if the latter, it binds all Courts and this House, the statute must be read in accordance with the doctrine so announced, and that doctrine is part of the law of the land until the Legislature be moved to interfere.

The situation accordingly is : Shipowners, as such, are by statute liable to dockowners for "any damage done by such vessel . . . to the harbour, dock, or pier," whereas by the doctrine of Earl Cairns in River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra) they are not so liable unless the damage was occasioned by negligence ; the statute, in short, does not increase the common law liability.

As I view the case, the doctrine so expressed, constituting this important exception from express statutory liability, neither was necessary for, nor did it truly underlie, the decision of River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra).

It is a doctrine, I may be allowed to say, very different from that which as lawyers we have been brought up to believe, holding as we do with Blackstone I, 89, "where the common law and a statute differ, the common law gives place to the statute." It is accordingly most necessary to consider whether the doctrine so expressed by the Lord Chancellor as to this statute received the assent of this House at large. I am of opinion that it did not.

Before I consider the utterances of the other noble Lords, I may observe that the judgment of Lord Justice Mellish in the Court of Appeal, which was received with great deference by other noble Lords who addressed the House, itself contained a very striking repudiation of any such doctrine. Said Lord Justice Mellish (1 Q.B.D., at p. 553) :—

"I think, looking at the language of the section, it clearly was the intention of the Legislature to extend the liability of the owners of vessels, in favour of the owners of piers and harbours, beyond the liability which is imposed on them by common law : because, if that is not the intention, it is not easy to see the object of the section at all."

I do not find in any of the other judgments in the House of Lords a repudiation of that view, and yet it is an undoubted repudiation of the view of Lord Chancellor Cairns.

I proceed to the judgment of Lord Hatherley. He says :—

"I cannot concur in the views expressed in the Court below by some of the learned Judges, on the one hand that the damage which was done in this particular case having been caused by what is commonly said to be an accident, but is called in the language technically used in Law Courts, the act of God, namely, a storm, the owner of the vessel would be excused by the section of the Act of Parliament, however construed, from the consequences of that mischief."

That appears to me to be a complete contradiction of the view of Earl Cairns, and a denial of the doctrine laid down by him. "The act of God would excuse the owner under the section," says Lord Cairns. "The act of God would not excuse him," says Lord Hatherley. Lord Hatherley goes further into a separate point in the case, namely, whether there is excuse even in the special circumstances of the vessel having been derelict or abandoned, and he appears to incline to the view that the owners were liable even in the special circumstances of a derelict ship. That, however, is apart from the general doctrine of Lord Cairns to which I have alluded. Lord Hatherley's judgment, along with the judgment of Lord Justice Mellish to which I have alluded, appears to be, in substance, in direct conflict with the doctrine now being investigated.

Lord O'Hagan bases his judgment entirely upon the peculiar circumstances. He says :—

"It does seem hard that the respondent, having had his ship so injured by the winds and waves on the high seas that its crew, to save their lives, abandoned it, and it was derelict, and was forced by the storm against the pier, should not only have lost its value, £10,000—save in so far as it was insured—but, in addition, nearly £3,000 for mischief done admittedly without fault of his and by the act of God. We must take care that a hard case shall not make a bad law ; but we must also take care that we do not attribute to Parliament the intention of injustice so very flagrant, without coercive necessity."

And he adds :—

"I have come to the conclusion, although not without serious hesitation and misgiving, that there is no such necessity, and that, well considered, the statute is not applicable in the peculiar circumstances before us."

One would have great difficulty as to Lord O'Hagan's judgment ; but that it is an affirmation of the general doctrine laid down by Lord Chancellor Cairns can hardly be suggested in view of his own words where he recurs to the general point in this way :—.

"You may have noted that my reasoning has not been precisely that of the Court of Appeal, and that I have not based it altogether upon the legal doctrine as to the act of God."

Then the opinion winds up in this way :—

"The only case cited as touching the present (Dennis v. Tovell, supra) has no application to it."

The House will be pleased to know the reason why. That reason is this :—

"There, the vessel was not derelict, and the owner may have properly been held liable. Here, on the other hand, in the words of Baron Pollock, 'Out on the high seas she met with certain risks and injuries which compelled her crew to leave her, and she became derelict.' And, in my judgment, this ship should be dealt with as if it had been abandoned at the Antipodes, and had been ploughing the ocean, without a crew, for years before it was driven against the pier at Sunderland."

Lord O'Hagan's affirmation gives no ground for an assertion that he attached the weight of his authority to the general doctrine under discussion of the liability of owners only in case of negligence. It only establishes, and it does establish, that in his judgment the owners of the Natalian were not liable in the circumstances because she was a derelict ship.

In the result, at the point which we have reached, I hold that the general doctrine has not only not been adopted by the two learned Lords last referred to, but has been in substance either disaffirmed or shown to be in no way the ground of the judgment to which they themselves ultimately inclined.

The opinion of Lord Blackburn contains much valuable matter, as one would have expected, but it is extremely difficult to extract from it any affirmation of what I might call the Cairns doctrine. It does contain a complete disclaimer of the idea that the statute was not to add, as Lord Cairns's words seem to imply, anything to common law liability. Lord Blackburn said :—

"Reading the words of the enactment, and bearing in mind what was the state of the law at the time when it was passed, it seems to me that the object of the Legislature was to give the owners of harbours, docks, and piers more protection than they had."

The remedy, his Lordship added, against the trouble of fixing particular persons with liability was :—

"That the owner, who was generally really liable (although it was difficult and expensive to prove it), should be liable without proof either that there was negligence, or that the person guilty of neglect was the owner's servant, or proving how the mischief happened, and this is expressed by saying that the owners shall be 'answerable for any damage done by the vessel or by any person employed about the same' to the harbour."

I cannot read that as in any sense confirming the view that this statute was to be interpreted upon the footing that the shipowners escaped all liability, except liability grounded upon negligence. On the contrary, it seems to me to affirm the proposition that a further and separate liability was imposed by the statute, and that it was imposed on the owners qua owners. To use the language of a Roman lawyer, the liability imposed is not a liability ex delicto, nor is it a liability quasi ex delicto ; but it is expressly a liability ex dominio. It is laid upon the owner as owner, and it humbly appears to me that this view is in entire accord with the dicta just cited from Lord Blackburn, and is in entire disaccord with the idea that he concurred in the general doctrine which Lord Cairns had laid down.

I am further of the opinion that Lord Blackburn misconstrued the true import of the judgment of Lord Justice Mellish, a topic upon which I understand my noble and learned friend who is to follow me will deliver a fuller opinion.

The final opinion in River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra) was delivered by Lord Gordon. That learned Lord, after a full survey of the legislative circumstances preceding the Act of 1847, and of that statute itself, dissents from the judgment of the House.

In the result, I am humbly of opinion that the liability of owners for damage done by their vessels to piers and harbours was not limited to damage caused by negligence, and that the dictum of Lord Cairns to that effect was not a part either of the text or of the ratio of the judgment of this House. I do not conceal from your Lordships that I have seldom known a case which has produced so much judicial uneasiness. The very able judgments of the Court of Appeal in this case disclose that. All of these judgments are valuable, and I am not sure that the analysis made by Lord Justice Atkins differs very much from the results to which I have independently come. I think their Lordships, however, erred in treating the dictum of one Judge of the greatest eminence as the judgment of this House, and therefore as necessarily having an effect so general as to include the present case.

It may be asked, If the general doctrine of non-liability except in cases of negligence was not decided in River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra), what was decided ? To that I reply that River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra) was a conspicuous instance of a derelict ship from which all human agency had been withdrawn, and it was on that footing, and upon that speciality, and to that extent alone, that the judgment in River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra) can be applied. I do not say whether or not that can be characterized as a ratio decidendi, and I desire to utter no disrespectful word on that subject, but I must in duty declare that this statute seems to me still to abide in its full and comprehensive application of liability to owners, but that the sole exception, plus the statutory exception of pilotage, is the derelict or abandoned ship case. Respect must be had alike (1) to the statute in its express and general effect and (2) to the decision of this House of an implied and particular exception.

Such an exception ought not to be extended or expanded. This House and Courts of Law should resist that. As to River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra), I would only add that if it were construed in the broad sense which with so much misgiving it appears to have been taken to have, it would seem to me to form a curious intrusion of the judiciary into the province of the Legislature; for I cannot doubt that it was the Legislature, and the Legislature alone (the plain and clear words of the statute being before us), upon whom lay the duty of cutting into those words by an exception equivalent to a pro tanto but a large repeal. The case recalls much older times when the judiciary attempted that. It is recorded that "when counsel in a case in 1305 argued for a certain construction of the Statute of Westminster the Second of 1285, he was cut short by the Chief Justice with the remark: 'Do not gloss the statute; we understand it better than you, for we made it.'"

In these times apparently the statute is to be eviscerated by conceptions not of the Judges who made the law, but their conception of what was the true and correct line of policy which must be supposed to have impliedly conditioned the words of those who made the statute. I humbly think this to be both legally and constitutionally unsound, even though it be put forward under the guise of construction. Parliament can and does change its own mind, and it will not under the Constitution allow that the judiciary should change its mind for it.

My Lords, in my opinion, we best adhere to both legal and constitutional principle when we affirm the statute, and decline to accept—unless it be where there is the clearest judicial decision to that effect—a vital and fundamental alternative which would deeply cut into the comprehensive words plainly employed by the Legislature. I agree with the noble and learned Viscount on the Woolsack, and in the motion which he is to propose to the House.

Lord Phillimore (read by Viscount Dunedin).—My Lords: About 10.30 p.m. on October 26, 1923, the s.s. Mostyn was inside the docks of Swansea and about to proceed from the King's Dock to the Prince of Wales's Dock. She was light in water ballast with a high side out of the water, not assisted by a tug but with a dock pilot on board to help the captain, and with an anchor clear and ready to let go, as required by one of the by-laws of the harbour. The wind was blowing a gale from about S.W.

In these circumstances it was observed that a small steamship which was preceding the Mostyn had suddenly stopped, it is supposed because of some breakdown of her machinery. But at the trial nothing was proved with regard to the cause.

The approach to the dock being thus blocked, the Mostyn put her engines astern to take off her way and dropped her anchor to assist in checking herself and to keep herself straight, as otherwise her quarter would have been caught by the wind, and she would have been brought diagonally athwart the entrance. It is not disputed that these were proper and necessary manœuvres. By them the ship was brought up; and then her engines were stopped.

After a short while, the leading steamship was able to move on and out of the way, and the Mostyn proceeded to get her anchor in and at the same time to steam ahead. She had not paid out much chain. The 15-fathom shackle had not reached the windlass. The depth of the water was 30 feet, and there would be several feet from the hawse to the water's edge, so that there would not be much chain dragging on the ground. Now it happens that in these docks, just in front of the communication passage leading from the King's Dock to the Prince of Wales's Dock, there is an electric cable belonging to the Postmaster-General lying along the bottom, which at that part is ordinary gravel or sand; and that in the communication passage some little way in, where the bottom is cemented, there is a bundle of about 10 electric cables which belong to the dockowners and which carry light and power about the docks. They lie in a chase-way and are uncovered, but are not higher than the bottom of the dock.

Shortly after the vessel moved and as the chain was still being got in all the lights throughout the dock went out, and the dockmaster in charge, realizing that the anchor of the Mostyn must have fouled some of these cables, ordered her to go astern and let her anchor down. This she did and tied up against the quay wall in the King's Dock for the night.

Next day the divers went down and found two out of the bundle of 10 cables underneath the claws of the anchor not absolutely broken, but pulled out of their place and so damaged that the electric current was cut off. They also noticed that a third cable had been drawn out of its place, though it was no longer under the anchor. Besides this they found a part of the Post Office cable, which had been absolutely broken, lying on top of the anchor near the shackle.

The Postmaster-General made his own claim with regard to the damage done to his cable, as to which there are certain statutory provisions. The cost of repairing the dock cables came to £226 4s. 6d., and it is for this sum that the Great Western Railway Company, as owners of the dock, brought the present suit.

The plaintiffs put their case on two grounds. First, they said that it was bad navigation and negligence on the part of those in charge of the Mostyn to go ahead before they were certain that their anchor was clear of the ground, and that it was this going ahead and the dragging of the anchor on the ground that caused the fouling of the dock cables. Secondly, they said that, whether it was negligence or not, they were entitled as dockowners, under the provisions of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, to have compensation for any damage done to their works by a vessel.

The case was tried before the President, assisted by Trinity Masters. He came to the conclusion that there was no bad navigation, and that upon the authority of the case of River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (1 Q.B.D., 546; 2 App. Cas., 743) the statutory claim could not be maintained; and he therefore dismissed the action.

The case came before the Court of Appeal, assisted by nautical advisers, and the result was the same on both points. The railway company have now appealed to your Lordships' House.

The President was advised by the Trinity Masters that those on board the Mostyn could not properly be found guilty of negligence, and he came to the same conclusion. But he appears to have been brought to this conclusion in some measure because he thought that the sequence of events was that the Mostyn caught the Post Office cable first, catching it apparently when she first let go her anchor, and that this encumbrance afterwards prevented her from getting her anchor off the ground before she began to move forward again, and so weighed the anchor down that it made it catch the dock cables as she moved forward.

This conclusion was attacked because it was founded, at any rate in part, on the view that the first officer had seen the Post Office cable foul of the anchor when the latter was being raised, while he never said this, nor indeed did he say that he sighted the anchor or anything fouling the anchor at all. He knew that there was something foul of the anchor, but he might very well infer this from the fact that it did not come up in the usual way, or that the chain continued to lead aft.

It remains, therefore, a matter of uncertainty whether the Post Office cable was fouled in the first instance, as the vessel went in, or whether, as counsel for the appellants contended, the Mostyn, when going astern in obedience to the directions of the dockmaster and dragging some of the dock cables with her, then first came into contact with and broke the Post Office cable.

It would seem to me, my Lords, that though the President's conclusion was partly founded upon a wrong premise, it is quite as likely to be right as the conclusion contended for by the appellants. For reasons, however, which I am about to give, it seems to me unnecessary to decide this point.

The President went on to accept the contention that it was prima facie negligence to proceed with the anchor dragging on the bottom, or, in other words, to go ahead till they were certain that the anchor was either up to the hawse, or, at any rate, hanging in the water. But notwithstanding this he exonerated the Mostyn because he thought that but for the unexpected incubus the anchor would have been up, and that those in charge of the Mostyn, though in some respects negligent, were not responsible for a consequence of their negligence which they could not have foreseen.

I am not quite sure whether this was the view accepted by Lords Justices Bankes and Atkin in the Court of Appeal. It is one on which I should hesitate to put my judgment. If there was negligence, and that negligence caused damage, I doubt whether it would be a defence to say that the damage was not one naturally to be expected.

I think the matter may be put on a broader ground, which is that which was explicitly taken by Lord Justice Sargant and, as I gather, by the nautical assessors in the Court of Appeal. In my view those in charge of the Mostyn did their best in the circumstances.

They were right, as already said, when they lowered their anchor. When afterwards they had to proceed forward and get their anchor, they were bound to have steerage way as soon as ever the anchor was off the ground. It would be, so to speak, a good fault if they got their way on rather before the anchor ceased to hold. With that gale, and in the position in which they were in the communication passage, it was all important that the ship should be kept heading straight. In difficult circumstances they did their best. This, I may add, is the opinion of the nautical assessors who have advised your Lordships' House, and I therefore conclude that there was no negligence in the navigation of the Mostyn.

My Lords, I have now to consider the claim of the railway company preferred by it as owner of the dock under section 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, and I have to construe that section in the light of the construction placed upon it by your Lordships' House in the case which I have already quoted of River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (supra).

The literal language of the section would lead me to accept the construction put upon the words by Lord Gordon, namely, that they make the owner of any ship which comes into collision with and does damage to the works of a dock responsible for such damage, whether the collision be a fault of himself or his servants or not; that, in fact, the shipowner is made an insurer.

But the decision of this House, given in conformity with the opinions of the majority of the noble Lords who sat, forbids me to give so wide an application to the section.

At the opposite end of the line comes the suggestion that the section gives no rights to the dock-owner other than those which he possesses at common law and only gives him a power to ensure that those rights shall be fruitful by enabling him to detain the ship till satisfaction is made.

No doubt this by itself would in the year 1847 have been a valuable privilege, because till the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, the Admiralty Court would have had no jurisdiction in such a matter, and therefore the ship could not have been arrested. Neither would the Act 9 and 10 Vict., c. 99, section 41, have helped, because that only gives the power of detention in the case of damage to ships, buoys, or beacons and applies only to foreign ships.

It was not till 1854 that the Merchant Shipping Act of that year, section 527, gave the power which is now reproduced in the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, section 688, and even so the power of detention is only in respect of foreign ships.

Valuable, however, as this privilege of detention was and still is, at any rate for England and Ireland, it is obvious that the section does more than give this privilege. It does confer rights and create liabilities not known to the common law, and this was clearly the view of the House in the River Wear case (supra). We must find some halfway position between these two extremes, and the question is where the line is to be drawn.

When the River Wear case (supra) was before the Court of Appeal, the Judges differed in the reasons which they gave for absolving the shipowners from liability. Baron Pollock decided the case upon a point of his own connected with the special circumstances of that accident.

Sir George Jessel, M.R., Chief Baron Kelly, and Mr. Justice Denman thought that in every Act of Parliament imposing a duty or a liability, however general and absolute the language might be, it was always to be supposed that there was an exception for accidents occasioned by an act of God or of the King's enemies, and that the misfortune in that particular case could be said to have been due to an act of God. This untheological expression is well understood by lawyers, and I should not myself have said that in the River Wear case (supra) the misfortune was the result of an act of God in its accepted legal sense. It was merely an ordinary case of perils of the seas. But, however that may be, your Lordships' House discarded this reasoning and refused to read into the statute this unexpressed exception.

Chief Baron Kelly and Mr. Justice Denman also relied upon the fact that, at the moment when the vessel made its impact on the pier, there was no one on board, and therefore no one in charge of the vessel; and they thought that the reference in section 74 to the liability of the master or person in charge implied that the owner of the abandoned vessel was not to be made liable for its drift.

But neither did that view commend itself to your Lordships' House. Lord Blackburn pointed out that the ship was not a derelict, and, if in any case a ship by the act of man is brought to such a position that in the ordinary course with tide or wind she will thereafter come into collision with a pier, the fact that she is then left by her master and crew ought not in reason to affect the question of the owner's liability.

There are two ways of reading the judgment of Lord Justice Mellish. According to one view the liability would accrue whenever the accident was due to some act of man. According to the other it would only accrue when the accident was due to the negligent act of some man, it does not matter who. This latter is the view of his judgment taken by Lord Blackburn, though apparently not by Lord Cairns.

However this may be, it seems to me that the ratio decidendi in your Lordships' House is to be found in the adoption of the latter view by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Cairns, by Lord Blackburn, and, in very hesitating terms, by Lord Hatherley and not expressly dissented from by Lord O'Hagan, that the shipowner is intended to be made liable in cases where the damage can be traced to the actionable negligence of some person, or, to put it in other words, to negligent human agency, the idea being that in this case the shipowner should be, as it were, the medium through which the dock-owner recovers his damage, that he should directly compensate the dock-owner and bear the loss if it is due to the negligence of himself or those for whom he is responsible, but get reimbursement from any ulterior person who is the real cause of the mischief. For instance, if ship A, by its bad navigation, forced ship B into collision with a pier, the owner of ship B would pay the pier-owner and look to recover over against the owner of ship A ; or if a shipowner has placed his ship in the hands of a ship-repairer, and the ship-repairer or his servants has done damage to a dock, the shipowner would have to pay the dock-owner and seek his remedy against the ship-repairer, while at the same time the right of an employer to recover against his own negligent servants is affirmed.

Lord Cairns calls the section a clause of procedure only, and says that it deals with the mode in which a right of action for damages already existing should be asserted and does not create a new right.

This, speaking with all respect, is a juridical idea of an unusual nature, because a right in A to recover from B is a different right from that of A to recover from C.

But for the purpose of the statute Lord Cairns treats the right as one in the abstract which exists in A and can be transferred from being one against B to being one against C. Actionable human agency is, therefore, according to these judgments, the test. This view receives confirmation, as he says, from the fact that an exception is made in the case of compulsory pilotage.

I read Lord Chancellor Herschell's judgment in the case of The Crystal (10 The Times L.R., 551 ; [1894] A.C., 508) as putting this construction upon the judgment in the River Wear case (supra).

The contention of the railway company before your Lordships was that human agency of any kind, though innocent, made a shipowner liable, and if that were so they would succeed in the present suit. But the result of my study has brought me to the conclusion that this is not what is intended by the judgment of the House on the River Wear case (supra). And as the proof given at the trial in the present case does not indicate that there was negligence on the part of anyone, I think the shipowners are entitled to succeed.

If it had appeared that the leading steamship had been negligent, and that the ultimate misfortune was the consequence of that negligence, then I suppose the shipowners would have had to pay, and to look to recover over against the owners of the leading steamship.

Lord Blanesburgh.—My Lords : I accept with all your Lordships the view just expressed by Lord Phillimore that the master and dock pilot of the Mostyn are to be absolved from all imputation of personal negligence in connexion with the navigation of their vessel on this occasion. I reach that conclusion for the reasons given by my noble friend, and I proceed at once to the inquiry whether in view of that finding the statutory liability of the respondents as owners of the Mostyn is at an end or whether it still subsists.

The hypotheses of fact upon which this inquiry must proceed are now made clear. It is convenient to collect them. They are, first, that at the relevant time the Mostyn was not under compulsory pilotage, or, in other words, that the respondents are not entitled to rely on the pilotage exception in section 74 ; secondly, that the damage done by the Mostyn to the appellants' harbour property resulted from the voluntary act of her master and pilot ; but, thirdly, that it was not due to any negligence on the part either of the respondents, or of the master or pilot, or of any persons on board of or connected with the vessel at the time. I have myself been helped by this statement, for it discloses, as in a flash, the correspondence between the facts of the present case and the words of the section in relation to a state of things to which the section has direct reference. The correspondence is striking, so striking indeed that one is tempted to affirm that had the present dispute been the first to call for judicial determination, it would have seemed that this statutory liability of the respondents was too plain for argument.

The general intent of the section is now, I think, generally accepted. It has been judicially described in varying terms, but with no different result. I take as a specially apt description that of Lord Justice Mellish in Adamson's case (1 Q.B.D., 546 ; 2 App. Cas., 743). "I think," he says, "looking at the language of the section, it clearly was the intention of the Legislature to extend the liability of the owners of vessels, in favour of the owners of piers and harbours, beyond the liability which is imposed on them by common law ; because, if that is not the intention, it is not easy to see the object of the section at all." That assertion begs no question as to the precise limits of the extension of liability effected by the section, but it does warn a Court of construction against the danger of denying its plain meaning to any expression found there, merely in order to avoid the imposition of a liability upon owners of vessels which had not hitherto been part of the law of the land.

Thus duly warned, I find on referring to the words of the section that the owner of every vessel is thereby made "answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel . . . to the harbour . . . or works connected therewith," and if there be any doubt as to the generality of that liability, in relation, at all events, to the presence or absence of negligence, with which alone the House is, in the present case, concerned, that doubt is, I suggest, resolved by the contrast to be found in the words which immediately follow, "and the master or person having the charge of such vessel . . . through whose wilful act or negligence any such damage is done shall also be liable to make good the same." The meaning of these latter words is surely quite clear. It is that the master or person having charge of the vessel is by them only made liable if the damage done is attributable to his wilful act or negligence. That such is the case is the view, amongst others, of Lord Cairns expressed in his judgment in Adamson's case (2 App.

Cas., at p. 753), of Lord Hatherley (at p. 753), and of Lord Justice Mellish (1 Q.B.D., at p. 553). I fortify myself by reference to these authorities only because of the somewhat different signification attributed to the words by Lord Justice Sargant here.

It is now possible to arrive at the full effect of the section so far as it applies to a case like the present. It is that the owner of a vessel as such, without any qualification in regard to the presence or imputation of negligence on his part, is made answerable for damage to harbour property done by his vessel ; that the master or person having charge of the vessel is also fixed with liability to make good the same damage, but, in his case, only if the damage be due to his wilful act or negligence, and not otherwise. And, my Lords, I would here observe that this contrast in the nature of the liability which by the section is imposed upon the owner on the one hand, and upon the master (using that term compendiously), on the other, is heightened by the terms of the pilotage exception, to which some reference must now be made. That exception, it will be remembered, extends to the "owners" only. It does not touch the "master," clearly, in my suggestion, because the liability of the owner under the section exists apart from any question of fault on his part ; while in the case of the master his liability is conditioned on personal negligence, not to be excused by the presence of any pilot on board.

And this leads me here to add one further statement as to the section, more general in its application. It is that this statutory liability is confined to two classes of persons and to them only : first, the owner, secondly, the "master," with, in his case, the qualification just stated. There is nothing on the face of the section to indicate that the owner's liability is in any sense representative. It is, so far as the section is concerned, as final and as personal as is that of the master. The significance of this, together with the fact that his liability presupposes no fault on his part, will emerge later.

And by these statements progress is made in resolving the one further difficulty which, so far as the present case is concerned, seems to be presented by the wording of the section. That is as to the connotation of the word "damage" as there used. The word, I venture to think, is employed to denote physical or material damage or injury to the harbour or works. If there were any doubt as to its signification when used in relation to the owner, there can, I suggest, be none when in reference to the same "damage" the master is required "to make it good." And not only by this indication is it shown that the word is being used in a material sense and not as a juridical term. Section 74 is one of a fasciculus of clauses (69-76) grouped under the heading : "And with respect to the protection of the harbour, dock, and pier, and the vessels therein, from fire or other injury, be it enacted as follows." And just as that heading refers to "fire or other injury," so it will be found that the penal sections, 69-73, are all directed to the protection and safeguarding of the harbour and shipping against physical injury of one kind or another. Accordingly, I cannot myself doubt that this word "damage" where it occurs in section 74 is used in that sense also.

In the result I can see no escape from the conclusion that, on the plain words of the section, the liability of the respondents thereunder for the damage here sued for is, in the circumstances now disclosed, clearly established.

And at this point I would observe that in the case of liability imposed upon an "owner" by section 56 of the Act, upon words not more express than the words of section 74, where also an unqualified construction is not assisted by such a contrasted provision as is found in section 74, a majority of this House in The Crystal (10 The Times L.R., 551 ; [1894] A.C., 508) held that an owner was thereby made liable without negligence on the part of himself or of his servants for damage for which, apart from such negligence, he was at common law under no liability at all. I use this case only to indicate that, if your Lordships do finally attach liability to the respondents in the present case, you will to this extent merely be bringing section 74 of this statute into line with section 56, as already interpreted in this House.

But, my Lords, while such a decision would involve no new principle and while it is necessary fully to appreciate, as applied to the facts of the present case, the unambiguous clarity of provisions which must be ignored if the respondents here are to escape liability, I necessarily recognize that the real difficulty which confronts the House now is to keep within its proper limits, as applicable to the facts here, its own decision in Adamson's case (supra). For I agree, of course, at once, that by the ratio decidendi of that case—if it can be discovered—and by the decision itself—whether its ratio decidendi can be discovered or not—your Lordships are as much bound as is at least every English Court.

There is, however, one circumstance in Adamson's case (supra) not yet alluded to which may require your Lordships in the present case to regard that decision from a very special point of view. Curiously enough—helpfully enough perhaps one ought to say—three of the noble Lords out of the four who there decided that there was, under section 74, no liability on the owner concurred at the same time in the view that on the true construction of the section an owner, on the facts of the present case, would be and remain liable for the harbour damage. That conclusion is clearly implied in Lord Hatherley's speech in the two middle paragraphs of page 753—which I refrain from setting forth only in the interests of economy of space. It is expressly so stated by Lord O'Hagan and by Lord Blackburn.

At page 760 of the report Lord O'Hagan says :—

"The Legislature may have fairly said, that greater protection was due to [the undertakers] than they derived from the law which had grown up before that commerce and those works had been created, involving the necessity of safeguards theretofore uncalled for and unknown. Accordingly, the Legislature made the owner—a person easily and always to be found—'answerable' as owner, and dispensed with the proof of negligence or any other proof, save of the fact of injury by the vessel—in all the cases contemplated by the Act."

And amongst these cases, as Lord O'Hagan had previously held, was the case where, as here, the vessel was in charge of a master at the time of the damage done. But Lord Blackburn is the most express of all.

At page 768 he says :—

"My Lords, reading the words of the enactment and bearing in mind what was the state of the law at the time when it was passed, it seems to me that the object of the Legislature was to give the owners of harbours, docks, and piers more protection than they had. It seems to have occurred to those who framed the statute that in most cases where an accident occurs it is from the fault of those who were managing the ship—and in most cases those are the servants of the owners—but that these were matters which in every case must be proved, and consequently that there was a great deal of litigation incurred before the owner, though he really was liable, could be fixed : and with a view to meet this, the remedy proposed was that the owner, who was generally really liable (though it was difficult and expensive to prove it), should be liable without proof either that there was negligence, or that the person guilty of neglect was the owner's servant, or proving how the mischief happened, and this is expressed by saying that the owners shall be 'answerable for any damage done by the vessel or by any person employed about the same' to the harbour."

My Lords, when you find that three out of four noble Lords who were at one in exempting from liability the owners in Adamson's case (supra) are there equally in agreement in the view that owners in the circumstances of this case would be liable, does it, for present purposes, matter what the ratio decidendi of all or any of them was ? I greatly doubt. In any case, at the least, these views so expressed strengthen the conclusion at which I should have arrived independently, that Lord Cairns alone in Adamson's case (supra) committed himself to what I may call the "procedure" view of the section, the only view of it adequate to protect the respondents here from liability. From this consideration this consequence also follows—that if your Lordships, following Lord Cairns, are minded now affirmatively to treat this section as a section of procedure, thereby exonerating the respondents, you must be prepared also to dissent from the views of the section, as applied to such a case as the present, taken and expressed by a majority of the House in Adamson's case (supra) itself. For myself, for reasons already given, I am not prepared to do anything of the kind ; and to avoid being under that necessity, I am encouraged to examine with a freedom which otherwise I should have regarded as presumptuous the view that section 74 is a procedure section only.

My Lords, an examination of Lord Cairns's judgment shows that he was led to this conclusion in the expectation and belief that two main results were thereby attained. First, the undertakers were relieved of the burden of finding, for the purposes of suit, the real wrongdoer. The owner in every case was the only necessary defendant, and that was a great concession to the undertakers. Secondly, the owner was not seriously embarrassed by the burden so placed upon him, because section 76 gave him a right over against the actual wrongdoer, whoever he might be.

My Lords, if Lord Cairns had had the opportunity of weighing and considering some of the observations since made upon his judgment, he must, I think, have found that neither of these expectations was realized by the effect which he attributed to the section. He must, I think, have seen that so far as the undertakers were concerned the advantage presented to them was almost illusory, and he would have realized that, so far as the owner was concerned, to call the section merely a procedure section was to speak of peace when there was no peace. But in my view, if I may respectfully state it, the main objection to the procedure theory is that it is really denied to a Court of construction by the very terms of the section itself.

My Lords, I will deal with these points in their order. As to the first, Lord Justice Atkin has pointed out with striking force that negligence cannot be treated as a thing separate from the person alleged to be guilty of it. May I for myself add how difficult both for plaintiff and defendant, and how unprecedented it would be, to conduct and frame a suit in which negligence had to be proved against him but to which the actual wrongdoer need be neither party nor privy ? The section on this view of it, while it would apparently sanction a procedure altogether novel, would really be of no advantage to the undertakers.

Now take the position of the owner. Lord Cairns's view was that the statute in every case gave him his right over against the wrongdoer, and this conclusion encouraged him to read the section as he did so far as it related to the owner. But here, if I may most respectfully say so, Lord Cairns overlooked the fact that, just as the section itself imposes its statutory liability only upon the owner and, subject to conditions, upon the "master," so by section 76 it is, as you would expect, only against the negligent "master" that the owner is given a right of recourse. If the negligence causing the damage was that of anyone else—the hirer, the ship-repairer, anyone on board but not in charge—the section on this procedure view of it would leave the owner to bear the burden himself, a consequence not anticipated by Lord Cairns. And is there not to be found in this consideration the strongest argument of all against this procedure view of the section ? That section, as an enactment, imposes liability for the benefit of the undertakers on two classes exclusively, viz., owners and masters of vessels. Section 76 adjusts the incidence of that liability between these two, and it goes no further in the way of adjustment because there is no other liability to adjust.

But lastly, my Lords, the procedure view of the section is, I very respectfully suggest, not open on the construction of the section itself. The procedure construction gives no weight to the distinction in this matter of negligence drawn by the section between the liability thereby imposed upon the owner and that imposed upon the master. That construction requiring also, as it does, personal or imputed negligence on the part of the owner in every case gives the go-by to the limited terms of the pilotage exception already alluded to. Lastly, it does not inquire how the conception of unrestricted representative liability is, on construction, permissible, when by the section itself the statutory liability is confined to the owner and the master exclusively.

For all these reasons, my Lords, treating this matter as one open to the House to determine, I express the view, with the utmost reverence for any opinion of Lord Cairns, that this procedure construction of the section is not admissible.

But I may properly be asked whether in saying this I loyally recognize that the House is bound by its own order in Adamson's case (supra), and whether I have governed myself accordingly. My Lords, I am glad to be bound by the decision in Adamson's case (supra). Had I then been a member of this House I should have agreed entirely with the view of the majority. Accepting, in the words of Lord Cairns, the position that the injury in that case was one that could not have been prevented by any human instrumentality, but that it was occasioned by a vis major, namely, by the act of God in the violence of the tempest, I should have reached the conclusion that the owners were free of liability on two separate grounds, each quite satisfactory to myself. The first would have been that the liability imposed by the section on the owner in relation to his ship was of the type in Fletcher v. Rylands (L.R., 3 H.L., 330) and was subject, as that liability always is, to the reservation that the damage is not attributable to an act of God, being what Lord Blackburn in Adamson's case (supra) called a common misfortune. Alternatively I should have arrived at the same conclusion on the ground stated by Sir G. Jessel, to which, as I read his judgment, no answer has, so far as I can find, ever been given, and which is to me quite satisfactory.

My Lords, Sir George Jessel—and I refer to him alone and I except from the reference both Chief Baron Kelly and Mr. Justice Denman—found the key to the section on this point, not, as has been so often supposed, but as I venture to think under a misapprehension of his meaning, in the words of substantive enactment alone, but in those words taken in connexion with the pilotage exception. My Lords, here I entirely agree with my noble friend Lord Dunedin, if I may respectfully say so, that this House in Adamson's case (supra) must be taken to have been of opinion that an exception of an act of God could not be read into the words of enactment here standing alone. But Sir George Jessel, unlike Chief Baron Kelly and Mr. Justice Denman, did not find the exception in these words alone ; he found it in them taken in connexion with the pilotage exception. He pointed out that under that exception where a vessel in charge of a pilot was overwhelmed by tempest there would be no liability either on the owner, by reason of the exception, or on the pilot under the law. In that case, therefore, any damage done by the vessel to the harbour would have to be borne by the undertakers. Could it in these circumstances be supposed that the Legislature had in the same event by the substantive words of the clause imposed a liability on the owner for the irrelevant reason that there was no pilot on board ? The same view might perhaps be expressed thus. As Lord Blackburn said in Adamson's case (supra), the exception of an act of God may be implied in the terms of an instrument imposing the liability ; it need not be expressed. Is not such an exception necessarily implied in this section by the presence there of the pilotage exception ? The Legislature has exempted the owner from liability when his vessel at the time of doing the harbour damage is in the hands of a pilot to whose appointment he has had to submit by the constraint of temporal authority. Is it to be supposed that the Legislature when giving this exemption was not proceeding upon the footing that under the section, apart from the exception, the owner was already immune in a case where the navigation of the ship had been taken out of the owner's control, not by a mere pilot imposed upon him by administrative constraint, but by an irresistible and unsearchable Providence nullifying all human effort ?

My Lords, the announcement by some of the noble Lords in Adamson's case (supra) to the effect that the Court of Appeal had been too ready to imply from a liability imposed by statute an exception in favour of an act of God may preclude me from expressing, as now permissible, the first of the reasons above given. But I do not find that what Sir George Jessel really, as I believe, said has ever been dealt with adversely by anyone in this House, and it seems to me that Lord Blackburn and Lord O'Hagan were in no way opposed to his view, while Lord Justice Mellish's human agency limitation was merely a paraphrase of it stated as a result. I believe, therefore, that I am still entitled to hold and express it.

But if I must, in view of the decision in Adamson's case (supra), cherish both of these grounds only for my own private and personal satisfaction, I have still remaining a sufficient justification for the opinion which I hold that a decision in favour of the respondents here is quite consistent with the decision in Adamson's case (supra). I find that justification in the fact that it was the opinion also of three of the noble Lords who concurred in the decision in Adamson's case (supra), and I am not required to particularize the reasons which they gave for that conclusion.

The result, in my view, is that the owner of a vessel has, under this section, been made answerable to the undertakers for the damage referred to in the section, with no obligation on the part of the undertakers to prove more against him than that the damage was done by his vessel and that he was her owner at the time. To such a claim when so far proved only two defences are open to the owner :—

(a) The pilotage exception ;

(b) that the damage was in fact attributable to the agency of what, in the language of a simpler age, is known to the law as an act of God.

The object of the section being to provide exceptional protection for the undertakers, I do not myself think that the enactment on this view of it imposes on owners of vessels a burden that can fairly be regarded as oppressive.

On the whole case I concur in the motion made by the noble Viscount on the Woolsack.

THE JANERA.*

Ship—Collision—Motion to stay proceedings.

A collision having occurred in Egyptian waters between a British steamship and a German steamship an action in respect thereof was instituted by the owners of the British vessel in the Egyptian Courts against the German shipowners, who in due course put in bail. Subsequently the German shipowners also issued a writ in the Egyptian courts against the British shipowners, but eventually they abandoned their proceedings in Egypt and issued their writ in the present action. On a motion by the British shipowners to set aside the writ and stay all subsequent proceedings on the ground that the action in this country was in the circumstances vexatious and oppressive,

Held, that the fact that a plaintiff in the English Courts was a party, as defendant only, to proceedings elsewhere, was not a ground for depriving him of his undoubted right to sue in this country, and the motion must be refused.

This was a motion by the defendants, the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields, Limited, to set aside the writ and stay all proceedings in an action in personam brought against them by the plaintiffs, the owners of the German steamship Masconomo. The ground of the motion was that the proceedings were vexatious and oppressive.

Mr. G. P. Langton, K.C., and Mr. H. G. Willmer appeared in support of the motion ; Mr. C. R. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. R. H. Balloch for the plaintiffs.

Mr. LANGTON said that the matter arose out of a collision in Egyptian waters between the Masconomo and the defendants' steamship Janera, on July 8, 1927. On August 16 the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields, Limited, issued a writ in the Egyptian Courts and in due course obtained bail from the defendants in that action, the owners of the Masconomo, who were Germans resident in Hamburg. On August 20 the owners of the Masconomo issued a writ in a cross-action against the owners of the Janera. Meanwhile, the Egyptian Courts had appointed an expert to investigate the cause of the collision, and that expert reported in favour of the Janera. Thereupon the German owners discontinued their cross-action in Egypt, and on October 18 issued the writ in the present action, and the defendants were now seeking to set it aside.

* Reported by A. W. GRANT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE HILL.—Is there any authority for saying that you can stop a plaintiff from proceeding here merely because he has been made a defendant in proceedings elsewhere ?

Mr. LANGTON.—No, my Lord. My point is that both parties entered upon the proceedings in Egypt with their eyes open ; that those proceedings can be most conveniently tried in Egypt, all the witnesses being at hand ; and that the further proceedings in this country, to which the Janera never comes, are unnecessary, and, therefore, vexatious and oppressive.

Counsel went on to suggest that the German plaintiffs had abandoned their cross-action in Egypt and issued a writ in this country merely for tactical reasons—they had, presumably, no assets in this country, and the owners of the Janera, having obtained bail in Egypt, could not demand bail again in this country. He submitted that the Court had power to stay proceedings under section 41 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925.

Counsel for the plaintiffs were not called upon.

MR. JUSTICE HILL.—In my view this motion fails. It is a motion to stay an action in personam brought by the owners of the German steamship Masconomo against the defendants, the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields, Limited. The ground of the application is that it was vexatious of the plaintiffs to issue their writ and that they ought not to be allowed to sue here. The collision happened somewhere near Egyptian waters, and the present defendants, the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields, Limited, began an action in the Egyptian Courts against the Masconomo, the steamship of the present plaintiffs. At some stage of those proceedings the present plaintiffs issued in the Egyptian Courts a cross-writ against the owners of the Janera, but I have to deal with the matter as it stands now. While these proceedings and this motion were pending the present plaintiffs withdrew their writ, and therefore they are not parties, as plaintiffs, to any proceedings in Egypt. They still remain parties to proceedings in Egypt as defendants in the action by the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields, Limited, against the owners of the Masconomo. It seems to me quite clear that the Court ought not to stay a plaintiff in the Courts of this country on the ground that he happens to be a defendant elsewhere. Therefore, as things are at present, I see no ground at all for staying the plaintiffs' action. It is said that I ought to stay the action here because up to a point the plaintiffs took part in the proceedings in Egypt and themselves at one time were plaintiffs out there. I do not think I ought to do more than consider the state of the proceedings in the one country and the other at the time when I am asked for a stay. If the plaintiffs have brought proceedings in Egypt which they have since abandoned it is to be presumed that the Mixed Tribunal in Egypt will be able to give the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields, Limited, all the costs that have been thrown away by these proceedings of the German owners which have been abandoned. The Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields, Limited, have bail in a sum which appears to be in excess of the damage which they have suffered, and it seems probable that they will be able to apply in Egypt for any costs that they have incurred by reason of the present plaintiffs having commenced the proceedings which have now been abandoned. Therefore, I cannot think that I ought to stay an action properly brought in this country solely because the people who have brought that action are defendants in proceedings in Egypt relating to the same collision. I have asked for authority on the subject and the defendants cannot find any, and in that position I can see no justification for staying the present action. In general, if the proceedings on the part of the present plaintiffs were still continuing in Egypt I think the proper course would have been to put them to election, but as they have already elected and acted upon their election and abandoned the proceedings in Egypt, and there are no proceedings by them any longer anywhere else than in this country, it seems to me that I cannot interfere to deprive them of a right, which undoubtedly they possess, to sue in this country. The motion must be dismissed with costs.

1927. Dec. 19.

BOW'S EMPORIUM, LIMITED v. A. R. BRETT AND COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Principal and Agent — Agent's commission — Sale of business—Claim for commission from purchaser — Concurrent findings of Courts below.

Although commissions on sales are usually paid by the vendor, an express bargain may throw the commission upon the purchaser.

Where an agent is employed to make inquiries about a particular business with a view to his employer's acquiring it, on the terms of his being paid by the purchaser a commission on the purchase price if business is transacted, and where the parties are brought together through his agency, he is entitled to commission, even where the actual purchase is ultimately effected through the intervention of another agent, provided that his services are really instrumental in bringing about the transaction.

In an action by an agent for a claim for commission from the purchaser on the sale of a business, the Lord Ordinary found on the facts that the agent had earned his commission and his decision was affirmed by the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland.

Held (Lord Phillimore and Lord Blanesburgh dissenting), that the concurrent findings of the Courts below ought not to be disturbed.

* Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland adhering to an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, Lord Morison.

The respondents, who carried on business at Manchester and Birmingham as agents for the sale or purchase of businesses, estates, &c., on commission, sued the appellants, who were outfitters of Glasgow, for commission on a transaction by which the appellants acquired as a going concern in September, 1925, the business of R. Wylie Hill and Company, Limited, of Glasgow. The negotiations were conducted by Mr. Fairhurst, who was the manager of the respondents' Birmingham business.

According to the respondents' case, the respondents were advertising certain businesses for sale and, as the result, the appellants communicated with them, and on November 14, 1924, an interview took place in Glasgow between Mr. Fairhurst and Mr. R. W. Bow, who represented the appellants. At that interview Mr. Bow stated that the businesses in question, being English, did not interest him and suggested that Mr. Fairhurst should submit for his consideration other businesses of the kind which he indicated, and he mentioned the business of Wylie Hill and Co., Limited. Mr. Fairhurst's version of that interview was that Mr. Bow, on behalf of the appellants, engaged the respondents, as agents, to inquire regarding the businesses indicated by Mr. Bow and submit particulars with a view to purchase, but this was denied by Mr. Bow.

Mr. Fairhurst then communicated with Wylie Hill and Co., Limited, and ascertained that their business might be acquired, and he obtained from them a balance-sheet. On December 4, Mr. Fairhurst called on Mr. Wylie Hill, who had a controlling interest in the business in Glasgow, and mentioned Mr. Bow's name. Later, on the same day, he called on Mr. Bow and informed him that Mr. Wylie Hill was willing to entertain proposals for the purchase of the business. The question of commission was mentioned and Mr. Fairhurst intimated that his company expected a commission of 2 per cent. Mr. Bow replied that he would treat him fairly in the matter. After some correspondence on that point Mr. Bow wrote in February, 1925, that he was definitely off the idea of purchasing the Wylie Hill business, but in the following September the appellants, through the immediate intervention of an actuary employed by the purchasers and the vendors, acquired the business.

At the trial there was some conflict of evidence between Mr. Fairhurst and Mr. Bow, but the Lord Ordinary preferred the evidence of Mr. Fairhurst. In the result he held that the appellants had come under an obligation to pay a reasonable commission on the purchase price of the business and allowed a commission of 1 per cent.—namely, £1,350—as being a reasonable commission. No question was now raised as to the amount.

The First Division (the Lord President, Lord Sands, Lord Blackburn, and Lord Ashmore) affirmed the decision of the Lord Ordinary.

Mr. Graham Robertson, K.C., Mr. King Murray (both of the Scottish Bar), and Mr. R. A. B. Powell (of the English Bar) appeared for the appellants; Mr. Craigie Aitchison, K.C., Mr. Arthur P. Duffes (both of the Scottish Bar) and Mr. Dewar Gibb (of the English and Scottish Bars) for the respondents.

VISCOUNT HALDANE.—My Lords: In this appeal the question before us has been one mainly of fact. Two Courts below have examined the facts, and have arrived at conclusions which are substantially identical and turn on the evidence of witnesses and certain relevant letters. In the circumstances, I think that one ought to be reluctant to reverse the decisions so come to unless there is clear reason for dissenting from them. I do not myself find any such clear reason in this case. The restriction on our freedom does not arise from any statute or common law principle. It is due to a convention of the Constitution which has several applications of varying stringency. The Supreme Court of the Empire does not generally hold itself free to review the findings in a criminal trial in the Dominions or India, nor will it usually review concurrent findings of fact by two Courts below. As a rule, it will only rarely and reluctantly interfere where successive Courts below have concurred in a conclusion of fact based on evidence. In the present case I think this last rule applies, and that the burden lies heavily on the appellants to discharge themselves from its effect. But while I do not find that in the circumstances before us that burden has been successfully discharged, it is by no means only on that ground that I have arrived at a conclusion. On the evidence and correspondence I think that the conclusion arrived at by the Court of Session on the merits was the true one.

My Lords, the question which we have to decide is whether the respondents, who carry on business as agents for the sale and purchase of businesses and other properties, are entitled to commission on a transaction. The appellants, who are a company carrying on a large business as outfitters in Glasgow, acquired in 1925 as a going concern the similar business of R. Wylie Hill and Company, Limited, in that city. The respondents to some extent were instrumental in bringing about this result. If they were entitled to a commission at all, its amount has been restricted to £1,350, and the amount itself is not now in question.

The Lord Ordinary, before whom a proof was conducted, found that the appellants employed the respondents to make inquiries with the view of the appellants' acquiring the business of Wylie Hill and Company, and that the employment was made at a meeting between Fairhurst, the respondents' manager, and Bow, the managing director of the appellants. The Lord Ordinary also found that the appellants afterwards took advantage of the respondents' initial services and introduction, and that these were the real foundation on which the ultimate purchase of the business by the appellants rested. He applied the principle that where an agent first introduces the purchaser to the vendor he is entitled to a commission if, as he held, the bargain was that the purchaser was to pay the commission.

My Lords, no doubt it is true that where a sale is negotiated by an agent his commission is usually paid by the vendor. But this is a rule which yields to circumstances. It may well be that, where the agent is employed to approach the owner of a particular business in order to negotiate its sale by a vendor who is to be thus set in motion, the parties may bargain, or be taken to have bargained, that the commission is to be paid by the purchaser on whose behalf the agent has succeeded in setting the vendor in motion.

What the evidence showed was this. Fairhurst, who was the manager of the Birmingham branch of the business carried on by the respondents with its head office in Manchester, sent the respondents' October catalogue, with their lists of businesses for purchase or sale, to the appellants. It was received by Mr. Bow, who appears to have had some idea of extending the business of his company. The latter cut out of the catalogue entries relating to two of the businesses in it, and sent them to the respondents requesting full particulars. Fairhurst proceeded to Glasgow a few days later, and on November 14, 1924, called on Bow. The latter, on finding that the two businesses were in England, said that they did not interest him. But he added that among other businesses there was one, Wylie Hill's, of which the man who ran it was over 70 and had no sons to carry it on, and that he (Bow) had the feeling that some new management would be bound to take it over. According to Fairhurst, who knew nothing of the Glasgow firms, he asked Bow whether there was any chance of getting hold of Wylie Hill's business or of another the name of which Bow did not mention. The latter replied, according to Fairhurst, that this was what he wanted Fairhurst to find out for him.

Fairhurst then got into confidential communication with Mr. Hill, the managing director of the Wylie Hill Company, and ascertained that the business, with the shares and debentures in the company, might be acquired. He was given the last balance-sheet and report. He next arranged to meet Hill in Glasgow on December 4, 1924. In anticipation of this visit Fairhurst wrote to Bow on November 28 that he had particulars of a good business in the North which he thought might be of interest to him, and that he would be glad if Bow were willing to pay his commission—namely, two per cent. on the purchase price—but only if business were transacted. Bow replied on the 29th that owing to his Christmas trade he had no time to go into the matter, but that all the same he should be pleased to see Fairhurst on the following Thursday. Fairhurst went to Glasgow and first saw Hill. They discussed the contemplated sale to the appellants, and Fairhurst was shown over the premises. He told Hill that the appellants were his clients and that he had no reason to think that they were not in a position financially to take up the transaction. Fairhurst then saw Bow, told him of the interview with Hill and of the latter's willingness to negotiate, and handed him a copy of the Wylie Hill balance-sheet. The Lord Ordinary finds that what followed was that Bow thanked Fairhurst for the information, and promised to let him know further on the matter. Fairhurst explained that, if the transaction went through, his firm's usual commission was two per cent., and asked Bow to give him a written note on the subject. This Bow declined to do, but said that the respondents need have no fear about their commission, as the appellants would treat them fairly in the matter of commission. Mr. Bow admits in his evidence that he may have said, "You need not worry about commission," but says that "we never discussed commission," and that his whole desire was to "get finished" with Fairhurst.

The Lord Ordinary, after finding the facts as above stated, says that he accepts Fairhurst's evidence, which was in his own opinion sufficiently corroborated by the correspondence. His conclusion was that the respondents duly carried out their mandate, on the footing agreed to by Bow that they were to be paid a fair commission for their services. They tendered these services to the appellants with a view to carrying out the purchase, but the appellants, as they were entitled to do, declined these services. As the sale went through on the basis of what Fairhurst did, the respondents were, in the learned Judge's opinion, entitled to commission as contracted for.

Bow received letters from the respondents after the New Year asking how matters were progressing and for a written guarantee of the commission. On January 12, Bow replied that, "owing to the illness of our chairman, I have not been able to raise this question with him. At the same time, I may say that I am now rather off the idea altogether. Regretting the trouble you have been put to in the matter," &c. The Lord Ordinary points out with reference to this letter that Mr. Bow, having obtained valuable information from Fairhurst, so far from being in the frame of mind indicated in what he wrote, was about to negotiate through another channel for the purchase of the Wylie Hill business. The auditor both of that business and of Mr. Bow's business was a Mr. Taylor. The Lord Ordinary finds that, without disclosing his intention as to acquiring the business, Mr. Bow, taking advantage of the information given to him by the respondents, on February 11 approached Mr. Taylor and asked if he had heard that the Wylie Hill Company were disposing of their business. Taylor replied that he had not, but would inquire at the first opportunity.

My Lords, this proceeding on Mr. Bow's part becomes the more significant because it is inconsistent with a letter that he wrote about this time. On February 12, having been asked by Fairhurst by letter whether he had finally decided against the Wylie Hill purchase, and requesting him in that event to return the balance-sheet in order that they might put it before another client, he replied that he was definitely off the idea, and returned the balance-sheet as requested. Now it was on the day before he wrote this letter, on February 11, that Mr. Bow had approached Taylor, the auditor of the Wylie Hill business as well as of his own. Taylor, some days thereafter, told Hill that he had clients who were inquiring whether his business was for sale. Hill asked at once whether the appellants were the clients, and Taylor admitted that they were. Hill informed Taylor that he was willing to consider a reasonable offer for his business, and to give him some account of his previous communications with the respondents in December. Four days after this Taylor reported this conversation to Mr. Bow, but the latter took no immediate step. In September Hill appears to have got an offer for his business from an English syndicate. He thought it a good thing, remembering the introduction of the negotiation which the respondents had effected, to ask Taylor if the appellants were "still interested." Taylor then approached Bow. This was the opportunity which, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, the latter desired, and, after a brief negotiation, the appellants purchased the Wylie Hill business for £135,000. The Lord Ordinary has held that the appellants employed the respondents to make inquiries with the view of acquiring that business; that the employment was made at the meeting of November 14, 1924, and confirmed at the meeting which followed on December 4. He went on to hold that the employment was acted on by the respondents and that they implemented their contract by obtaining Hill's consent to negotiate, tendering their services to Bow in order that the transaction might be concluded. It was, in the learned Judge's view, clear that the appellants were to pay a commission. Bow had said to the respondents that he would "treat them fairly," and where there is an agreement to pay (the mere amount is not really in dispute in this case) the agent who has got an agreement to be paid the commission, and who has introduced the purchaser, is entitled to it, even where the actual sale is not ultimately effected through him. The question is whether the services of the agent were really instrumental in bringing about this transaction.

The conclusion to which the Lord Ordinary came was based on his view of the credibility of the witnesses. He says that he has no hesitation in preferring, where there was a conflict, the testimony of Mr. Fairhurst to that of Mr. Bow. It is said that Fairhurst used expressions in certain of his letters which, so far as they go, amount to deliberate misstatements. I think that this is true, but the misstatements do not concern the point on which the Judge decided in his favour. On the other hand, Mr. Bow made a much more serious misstatement in the letter of February 12, when he said that he was definitely off the idea of the purchase at the very period when he was instructing Taylor to inquire for him. Possibly he thought that he might in this way get out of paying commission. Anyhow, it is clear that he was not candid on a most material subject, and the Lord Ordinary appears to have been justified in laying stress on this when he rejected his testimony as a witness.

The learned Judges in the Inner House were unanimous in adopting the decision of the Lord Ordinary on what was really no more than a question of fact. It is quite true that they decided as they did with some reluctance. They thought that even the reduced commission as agreed on was a large sum to pay for very little work. That may have been why Lord Blackburn said that he could not help feeling that justice was not being done in the case. But not the less he was clear that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary must be affirmed. He thought Fairhurst an unduly plausible person. But the conclusion come to about the evidence he thought that a Court of Appeal could not ignore.

My Lords, I am for the reasons that I have stated of opinion that it is our duty to affirm the judgment and dismiss the appeal with costs. The point in issue is purely one of legal right, and sentiment must not be allowed to enter into its consideration.

Viscount Dunedin.—I concur in the judgment which has been read by my noble friend on the Woolsack and also in the judgment about to be read by my noble friend Lord Shaw.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—My Lords : The respondents carry on business as agents for the sale and purchase of properties, businesses, &c., on commission. The whole question in the case is whether, in the circumstances about to be narrated, they earned commission.

If they did so, there is no dispute as to the amount due ; the parties have agreed that it should be 1 per cent. upon the sale.

There was oral evidence in the case that was heard by the Lord Ordinary, and it appears to have been most carefully reviewed also by the First Division of the Court of Session. The Lord Ordinary, having had Mr. Fairhurst, of the respondents' firm, and Mr. Bow, the managing director of the appellants' firm, before him, says expressly that he has no hesitation in preferring the testimony of Mr. Fairhurst to that of Mr. Bow, and gave a decree for the agreed sum in favour of the respondents. The First Division, acting as I think both on sound principle as well as on authority, declined to disturb this judgment, as the Lord President concisely puts it, conceiving their duty to be "not to disturb the Lord Ordinary's findings on the matters of fact involved in the dispute, unless there be room for holding that he has drawn a wrong conclusion from the facts found to be established." They went, in my opinion, farther than that, and with some doubts, but after having carefully investigated the evidence they appeared to reach the same conclusion upon it as was reached in the Outer House.

Lord Blackburn, however, goes so far as to make the conjecture that the Lord Ordinary had been misled by the plausibility of a witness. I think it would be unfortunate if the verdict of a Judge who heard and saw a witness and believed him were to be weakened or upset by another Judge sitting on appeal, who had not these advantages but made a conjecture of the kind described.

Beyond that incident this is an ordinary case of a conflict of testimony in which the Courts in Scotland concur in the same conclusion. It would be a notable infraction of the practice of this House to upset the Courts below on a matter of fact (e.g., Clarke v. Edinburgh and District Tramways Company, Limited [1919] S.C. (H.L.), 35). I am accordingly of opinion that both in substance and in its grounds the judgment of the First Division was right.

A strenuous argument of a twofold character was presented to this House. The Lord Ordinary was criticized for calling Mr. Fairhurst a candid and accurate witness. There is force in the criticism to this extent, that undoubtedly he was a pushful person who took quick advantage of an inquiry made to his firm by the appellants as to some other businesses, and that he seized the occasion to get into touch personally with the appellants by visiting Glasgow on November 14 and seeing Mr. Bow. He, Fairhurst, was clearly anxious to extend his business connexion into the Glasgow district. But when these parties met it is established that Mr. Bow mentioned that the Wylie Hill business might possibly come into the market, and I hold it proved that he did entrust Mr. Fairhurst with the business of making an approach to Messrs. Wylie Hill. Mr. Fairhurst did make that approach and made it with success. He found the crucial fact in the case, namely, that the firm would be willing sellers, that the business was open to be bought, and, armed with that information and certain facts to be derived from the balance-sheet, he returned to Mr. Bow and informed Mr. Bow as to how matters stood. This is cardinal : a relation between a willing buyer and a willing seller was begun ; it might ripen into a transaction. A purchase of that business was afterwards made by Bow from Hill.

The case of Bow is that the transaction of purchase had no relation to the information thus gathered and communicated by the respondents ; that if they did anything, it was just to put a question and get an answer, and that the respondents were mere messengers and had no ground for more than the trivial fee which would be a messenger's due.

The Lord Ordinary's judgment, while expressed as a preference between two witnesses who flatly contradict each other, of course involves not only that he believed Mr. Fairhurst but that he disbelieved Mr. Bow. The argument of the appellants' counsel was that your Lordships should upset the Courts below and the practice to which I have alluded by reason of the correspondence which passed. I admit that that correspondence is valuable, but I agree in holding that it does not support but, on the contrary, strongly refutes the appellants' case.

After the interview in Glasgow on November 14 the respondents were not idle. On the 19th they wrote to Messrs. Wylie Hill inquiring "whether you would be open to dispose of your interest in the lease or freehold of the above premises" and offering to go into the matter. On the 20th they received an answer from Mr. Wylie Hill, "the business as a going concern might be acquired"; and on the 25th and 28th they wrote to Mr. Hill asking for an appointment. On the latter date they also wrote to the appellants that their representative would call on December 4. The letter contains the enigmatic sentence, "I have particulars of a good business in the North which I think might be of interest to you"; this was the Hill business, and, although Mr. Bow says that he did not know what the language referred to, that was made clear enough when the parties met on December 4. In the same letter of November 28, however, Mr. Fairhurst writes, "I shall be glad to know if you are willing to pay our commission, namely, 2 per cent. on the purchase price." He says that he had, without success, mentioned that to the vendor as a possible charge upon the latter; and I think this statement of his to be very doubtful. Then came the interview of December 4 and there can be no doubt whatever that commission was then mentioned between Mr. Fairhurst and Mr. Bow. Mr. Bow admits that it was mentioned and further admits that he assured Mr. Fairhurst that he would treat him fairly. This had no other meaning than fair treatment in the matter of commission, and (secondly) it disposes of the suggestion that the respondents were to look for commission from the seller.

Then on December 11 the respondents wrote to the appellants per Mr. Fairhurst:—

"As I told you last week, it is usual for us to get a written guarantee from the prospective purchaser to pay our commission, namely, 2 per cent. on the purchase price if business is transacted."

This is plain beyond all question, and it deserved, as did the previous letter, a plain answer. The matter is put to Mr. Bow quite properly in cross-examination and the thing culminates in this way:

"Question.—If the suggestion there contained in that letter was absolutely a false suggestion, why didn't you reply to Mr. Fairhurst and say so?"

"Answer.—Well, I replied to very few of his letters. I just shoved them aside; I was not really interested in anything he was writing about."

It now turns out, however, that the true state of matters is that Mr. Bow was, in fact, very deeply interested. So much was this the case that, while he was endeavouring to shoulder off the respondents, he was at the very same time opening negotiations through another quarter, namely, through the joint auditor of the two businesses, and that he was putting Mr. Taylor, the auditor, in possession of the fact that Messrs. Wylie Hill wanted to sell their business, and, as the events show, he wished confirmation of the fact that Messrs. Wylie Hill were still open as willing sellers. On January 12 he answered the letter of the 11th, in which the respondents desired a written guarantee for the 2 per cent. on the purchase price if business resulted, and in this answer he says, "I might say that I am now rather off the idea altogether." It now appears that this is entirely inaccurate; he was very much on the idea; and inquiries and negotiations were already set on foot the previous day and Mr. Taylor was charged with the matter.

It is clear that, if the correspondence be fairly looked at, it is a correspondence which largely confirms the evidence of Mr. Fairhurst and quite destroys the evidence of Mr. Bow. Three things stand out as plainly established. First, Mr. Fairhurst was, to the knowledge of Mr. Bow, acting as a commission agent; secondly, he had been promised to be fairly dealt with as such; and thirdly, a willing buyer having been procured, for him a willing purchaser, Mr. Bow ultimately bought the business in a transaction of which the material and crucial element was that Mr. Bow and Mr. Hill were brought together through the agency of Mr. Fairhurst.

One is unwilling to characterize further the part played by Mr. Bow on January 11-12. Thereafter there was a lull of events, it being, possibly, clear enough to Mr. Bow that to push the transaction on the seller would lift the price; but the matter was ultimately arranged and in the fall of the year the business was bought.

The appellants' counsel seemed to maintain that no commission was due because there was not an "introduction" of the two parties, seller and buyer, to each other. My Lords, such transactions may be conducted and concluded without any introduction, in that sense, whatsoever. Introduction is not a vox signata; all that is meant is that the agent shall have been the means of bringing a willing seller and a willing buyer into relations with each other in regard to a business transaction, and that a business transaction results.

Much was made by the appellants of the case of Moss v. Cunliffe and Dunlop (2 R., 657), a case in which the Second Division of the Court of Session reversed the Lord Ordinary, Lord Curriehill, in which the Lord Justice-Clerk Moncrieff dissented, and in which on very special facts it was held that the order to build a ship was not the direct result of a certain shipbroker's intervention. My Lords, I would only say of that case that, if it went further than its own special facts, it was a very doubtful decision. In particular, certain expressions of Lord Gifford seem, in the light of modern practice, to be somewhat surprising. "The claim," says he, "is for introduction and recommendation—for the use, so to speak, of the agent's influence or intervention in bringing the parties together and then leaving them to make their own contract, and this is not the ordinary way in which a commission is earned." The learned Judge had laid down that "in general commission is due to the agent as recompense or payment for his skill, trouble and responsibility. In the present case, the claim for commission is somewhat peculiar; it is not laid upon skill, or work, or trouble, in the special transaction. The agent did not carry through the contract of sale. He did not even initiate it." I leave the case with the observation that, if it ever comes to be cited as illustrating this branch of the law of agency, it will have to be very carefully considered.

In Scotland, later decisions appear to me to have come exactly into line with the acknowledged law of England. I refer to Walker, Donald and Co. v. Birrell, Stenhouse and Co. (11 R., 369), and to Kennedy v. Glass (17 R., 1085, at p. 1087)—and in particular to the judgment of Lord Adam, in which the common sense of the matter is put as a principle of law:

"It is a known principle that if one man uses another for the purpose and with the effect of doing business, the ordinary rule is that the person employed is entitled to some remuneration."

This was a case in which remuneration was granted to an agent who was not a professional broker. I desire, however, with your Lordships' leave, to adopt the judgment of Lord Dundas in Walker, Fraser and Steele v. Fraser's Trustees ([1910] S.C., 222, at p. 229). "Shortly put," says Lord Dundas, "I think the test is whether or not the ultimate sale of Balfunning was brought about, or materially contributed to, by actings of the pursuers, as authorized agents of the defenders. Actual introduction of the purchaser to the seller is not a necessary element in a case of this sort; it is enough if the agents introduce the purchaser to the estate, and by their efforts contribute in a substantial degree to the sale."

It comes in the end back exactly to the line which has been so long adopted in the law of England, which is thus expressed by Chief Justice Erle in Green v. Bartlett (14 C.B., N.S., 681, at p. 685):—

"The question whether or not an agent is entitled to commission on a sale of property has repeatedly been litigated; and it has usually been decided, that, if the relation of buyer and seller is really brought about by the act of the agent, he is entitled to commission although the actual sale has not been effected by him."

There is no difference whatsoever, as it appears to me, between the law thus laid down by Chief Justice Erle and by Lord Dundas. (1) When it is proved—and it must, of course, be proved—that parties to a transaction are brought together, not necessarily personally but in the relation of buyer and seller through the agency of an intermediary employed for the purpose, the law simply is that if a transaction ensues, then that intermediary is entitled to his reward as such agent; (2) nor is he disentitled thereto because delays have occurred, unless the continuity between the original relation brought about by the agent and the ultimate transaction has been not merely dislocated or postponed but broken; and (3), finally, the introduction by one of the parties to a transaction of another agent or go-between does not deprive the original agent of his legal rights, and he cannot thus be defeated therein.

Lord Phillimore (read by Viscount Dunedin).—My Lords: The discussion of this case turned largely upon the question of the respective accuracy and credibility of the two principal witnesses, Fairhurst (the representative of the pursuer company) and Bow (managing director of the defender company). But as a result of the long debate I have come to the conclusion that it does not much matter whether your Lordships agree with the Lord Ordinary in preferring Fairhurst or whether you do not.

It is true that, if you do not agree with the Lord Ordinary, the case is settled at once in favour of the defenders, and that it takes more trouble in working out the matter if you take the other view. But in my judgment the ultimate result is the same.

The pursuer company sues upon a contract made by word of mouth on November 14, 1924, and at no other or later date. Upon it lies the burden of proving the contract. Let us take the few happenings before and on November 14 and see what they come to.

My respectful complaint of the Lord Ordinary is that he has taken these happenings as being only outlines and filled in a picture which is the result not of the evidence but of the imagination and desires of Fairhurst.

The company which Fairhurst represents acts as commission agents. It published a circular in which it offered for sale three large and costly drapery businesses. The circular reached Bow, who cut out the page and sent it back with an inquiry, no doubt showing by his action that he was a possible purchaser.

Fairhurst thereupon wrote to him and followed up his letter by a visit to Glasgow. Bow inquired where the businesses were, and learning that they were in England said they did not interest him. Thereupon a general conversation ensued, and Bow said that there was a firm called Wylie Hill in Glasgow which might be inclined to sell its business, and in the end—I am accepting Fairhurst's story—told Fairhurst to inquire whether it was likely to sell and to report the result. This is all that Fairhurst said in his examination-in-chief.

In cross-examination, he expanded this into saying that he was to try and get the business. No doubt (if the terms were satisfactory), but in what capacity? He had come there as a seller's agent. If he had gone round Glasgow and picked up a firm, and, knowing that Bow had a purchasing mind, introduced that firm to Bow, and business had resulted, he would have claimed commission from the selling firm. If he had found Wylie Hill, this would be so. Is he to make a claim upon Bow because Bow saved him the trouble of finding Wylie Hill? It must not be forgotten that there are purchases and purchases. Bow may be taken as willing to purchase at a price. But he showed no inclination to purchase coûte que coûte. And now I have narrated all that happened on November 14.

Fairhurst went away and got into touch with Wylie Hill and performed his mandate, if it may be so called. It was a mandate that he was probably very glad to have, because it enabled him to go to Wylie Hill and escape being kicked out as impertinent, as he could always say: "If you, Mr. Wylie Hill, have any idea of disposing of your business, I think I know a client who would be ready to buy." That is a way in which commission agents get into touch with vendors. As to retainer for the unusual position of purchaser's agent to be paid by commission on the price, the evidence falls short of such a contract.

It might be natural for Bow to employ a stranger to act as a feeler and find out whether his fellow-townsman was likely to sell; but to suppose that a Glasgow man would entrust a perfect stranger, of whose character he knew nothing, to effect a bargain for him, putting in his way the temptation of making the price against him, is, I venture to think, unreasonable.

Fairhurst's subsequent action does not lend colour to his story. When he wishes to announce that he has made progress with Wylie Hill, he writes a letter in general terms to Bow, saying that he has found a good business in the north which might interest him. He gives a lame excuse for putting the matter in these general words, but I pass that by. If, instead of its being Wylie Hill's business, it had been the business of somebody else whose name had never been mentioned on November 14, the words would be equally appropriate, and yet in such a case it would be clear that it would be the seller that would pay the commission. It might just as well have been another business, and Bow might well have thought so.

Again, when he wishes to get Bow into the unusual position of paying a commission as purchaser, he tells an untruth as to what had passed between him and Wylie Hill.

My Lords, by the conclusion of the debate we had, I think, all agreed as to what usually happens as to commissions upon sales. They are usually paid by the vendor. But an express bargain might throw the commission upon the purchaser.

If a millionaire wants a Raphael or a Turner, he might in this way stimulate the activity of someone who is a persona grata to the owner, or has special capacity, if he thinks it is worth his while to pay any sum to procure the desired object. During the argument an illustration was well put, if I may say so, by the noble Lord on the Woolsack—the procuring of a ship at certain periods during the late war. Even so, however, the usual thing would be to offer a large fee, because even a millionaire does not want to increase the price against himself or to pay more than he need. A purchaser may often pay to his agent a fee, and a handsome fee ; but a percentage commission is a different matter.

Your Lordships also had some discussion on the point out of whose pocket the commission comes. That depends on circumstances. If an owner is not eager to sell, and he has a price in his mind in round hundreds of pounds below which he will not go, and he is told that he will have to pay a commission of 2 per cent. to the agent, he fixes each £100 at £102, or, if strictly mathematical, at £102 and some pence. Then it may be said that in this case the purchaser in the long run pays the commission, because if there had been no agent to remunerate he would only have paid clean hundreds.

But if a vendor needs to sell and is told that the purchaser will not spring, will not go beyond a clean sum of hundreds, he has to take that and pay the commission out of it and go away with so many sums of £98.

My Lords, I have not gone into the further question in this case—namely, whether upon the general well-established rules of law the action of Fairhurst may be taken to have been the efficient cause of the ultimate sale or not. It is a matter upon which I have not made up my mind, as in the view which I take it is of no importance. I should be for reversing this judgment, because I think that the alleged contract by the purchaser to pay commission was not proved.

Lord Blanesburgh.—My Lords : It may well be, as Lord Phillimore has just shown, that the respondents' case here does not succeed even if Mr. Fairhurst's evidence is accepted at its face value. But if his evidence is discredited, their case fails altogether. The burden of proof is upon the respondents, and the conflict between him, their only witness, and Mr. R. W. Bow is complete. How is such a situation to be resolved ? The House had to deal with that question in McKenzie v. British Linen Company (6 App. Cas., 82, at p. 107) and Lord Watson's statement there of the true method of inquiry is so apposite here that I venture to quote it, trite though it be :—

"In estimating the relative weight of their conflicting statements," he says, "it is of course necessary to take into account the whole facts and circumstances of the case established by evidence independent of the testimony of these . . . witnesses, and also to consider the degree of probability attaching to their respective statements."

In the present case, there is no indication on the face of the Lord Ordinary's judgment that before reaching his conclusion of fact in favour of Mr. Fairhurst he had gone through the process so outlined by Lord Watson. The conflicting evidence is certainly not examined from that angle in any judgment of the Inner House. I have accordingly thought that I might properly enough make the examination for myself, and I have found the exercise illuminating.

The position of the parties is not without its suggestiveness. The appellants are a private limited company with a board of four directors. On 1924, Mr. Bow, senior, was chairman and managing director. Mr. R. W. Bow was one of the three ordinary directors only. On December 4, long before any dispute arose, he told Mr. Fairhurst, so the latter deposes, that he had of himself no power to bind his company even to a commission note. Its business is that of house furnishers and warehousemen. It has so far been carried on only in Glasgow.

The respondents employ themselves differently. In their list of businesses, to be mentioned in a moment, they describe themselves as "outfitters, valuers, fire assessors, and agents for the sale of businesses." This description has been somewhat expanded when in the record they make any reference to themselves. The word "purchase" in conjunction with the word "sale" creeps in there a little insistently. This, however, is merely a passing observation. I have no doubt that their memorandum of association is wide enough to enable the respondents, when they are so minded, to act as agents for the purchase as well as for the sale of businesses, or indeed of anything else. It just happens that in no disclosed documents of theirs of date prior to the summons is this particular activity referred to. Thereafter it is not forgotten. Their registered office is at Manchester. They have a branch office at Birmingham, and of that branch Mr. Fairhurst is the manager. In 1924 they had apparently no business interests in Scotland. They had certainly done no business in Glasgow up to that time. Mr. Fairhurst's call upon Mr. Bow on November 14 was his first call there. He had never been in Glasgow before.

The respondents' list just referred to is a list of businesses of which they are agents for sale. They circulate it half-yearly. Each business included is particularized sufficiently to indicate its nature generally, but not sufficiently, of course, to disclose its identity. In October, 1924, one of their then current lists reached the appellants. It was opened and read by Mr. R. W. Bow.

This was the beginning. Three businesses on the list—your Lordships will note the number—attracted Mr. Bow's attention. They were all of them drapery businesses—not businesses, therefore, which had so far been within the range of the appellants' activities. He wrote for particulars of them. Nothing came of the inquiry. The businesses turned out, all three of them, to be in England and of no further interest on that ground alone to Mr. Bow. He indicates in his evidence that this whole incident was by the way ; I do not know that it matters whether it was so or not. It is, however, well to note here that the interview with Mr. Fairhurst, directly traceable to this inquiry of Mr. Bow's, and on which everything now turns, was at the time so lightly regarded by him that it did not become even a subject of conversation with his co-directors. This was his statement, and it was not challenged. But the inquiry, for whatever reason made, apparently suggested to the respondents the possibility of business with the appellants, and accordingly Mr. Fairhurst was despatched to Glasgow to interview them.

In a letter from Birmingham of November 13, 1924, Mr. Fairhurst announced his intention of calling upon the appellants at 10.30 next morning, and he arrived about half an hour after his letter. Mr. Fairhurst said in evidence, with reference to this visit, that he came to Glasgow on the instructions of the appellants. No one suggests that that statement was true. I note the fact now, that he made it in the witness box. It was at the respondents' own instance that Mr. Fairhurst came to Glasgow on this occasion. To Mr. Bow he was a complete stranger. Before their list came to his hand a month or so earlier he had never heard of the respondents, and he knew nothing of them then beyond what that list told him.

Such was the situation of the two parties to the interview of November 14, and such are the circumstances in which it took place. It lasted only a little over half an hour, and Mr. Fairhurst's final story with reference to it is that before it was over he had been definitely instructed by Mr. Bow on behalf of the appellants to acquire for them, and as their agent, not one only but either of two large Glasgow businesses both previously entirely unknown to Mr. Fairhurst, but whose names and addresses were then given to him by Mr. Bow. It is important to note that two Glasgow businesses, and not one only, were included in the mandate deposed to at the trial by Mr. Fairhurst. The significance of this fact as one by which the truth of his whole statement may be tested has, I think, been overlooked in the Court of Session.

My Lords, it is only at the latest stage, as will hereafter appear, that an agreement in such terms is evolved by Mr. Fairhurst, and even if the case had stopped with Mr. Fairhurst's final statement of this mandate, I should have hesitated long before accepting that statement. My feeling would have been that there must be some mistake somewhere. That Mr. Fairhurst, a complete stranger to Mr. Bow, with no previous knowledge of or business connexion with Glasgow, English himself and representing an English company, should have been definitely selected by Mr. Bow, himself merely one of four directors, without having or seeking any opportunity for consultation with his chairman or any of his colleagues, to acquire on behalf of the appellants either of two large Glasgow businesses from Scottish owners, to whom he was entirely unknown, would have struck me as being almost fantastic, imaginary altogether, or capable only of the explanation that Mr. Bow had been misunderstood, or that he, a Glasgow man in a large way of business, was in no way true to type. I have read and re-read his evidence to see whether it discloses any unusual mentality. I have not found any, and when I discover Mr. Bow, in language too forcible to be feigned, branding Mr. Fairhurst's story as a lie, I feel that his own account of the interview will indeed be an odd one, if, as Lord Watson would put it, he is not to have, at any rate, the probabilities on his side.

What, then, is Mr. Bow's account of the interview? It is that when it appeared that he had no interest in any business on the respondents' list, Mr. Fairhurst explained that this was his first visit to Glasgow, and that he would like to do a little business there. He asked the names of the principal business streets, about Glasgow businesses generally and whether any of them were likely to be soon for sale. Mr. Bow mentioned several businesses by name—not confining himself to the two to which Mr. Fairhurst has since alone referred. As to these two, he spoke of the first, the business of Boness, Limited, as being one that from trade talk he thought might soon be for sale, and he spoke of the Wylie Hill business as another that might also come into the market because Mr. Wylie Hill was advancing in years and he had no son to succeed him. It was in the above connexion that the question of the possible sale of either business was referred to. That he either directly or indirectly employed Mr. Fairhurst or gave him authority to act for the appellants as their agents to purchase or negotiate for the purchase of any business, Mr. Bow hotly denied.

Now, my Lords, it is at this interview, if at all, that the agreement now sued on was made, and you have there the conflict as to it between the two witnesses. The Lord Ordinary accepted the story of Mr. Fairhurst. He gave his reason for doing so. Mr. Fairhurst appeared to him to be both a candid and an accurate witness. He accepted his evidence, as appears from his judgment, almost textually—even in its inaccuracies—to the extent, for instance, of Mr. Fairhurst's statement, more than once repeated, that Mr. Bow's original inquiry was about two businesses, whereas, in fact, it was an inquiry about three—a small matter certainly, but serving to indicate that the Lord Ordinary's acceptance of Mr. Fairhurst was quite uncritical.

Now, while the improbabilities in Mr. Fairhurst's story already alluded to might well have made the Lord Ordinary pause, if he considered them, it is of course quite clear that, having regard to his definite finding, this House would not reject Mr. Fairhurst's story on such a ground alone. If it is now to be rejected, it must be for some more definite cause not dealt with by the Lord Ordinary : as that his story is contradicted by his own subsequent actings : that his evidence is not only in conflict with Mr. Bow's as to the interview, but that it is as to later matters in direct conflict with that of another witness, whose veracity is unquestioned : that, instead of being the candid and accurate witness described by the Lord Ordinary, he stands convicted on his own admission of being neither. If these things are shown, as I think they can clearly be, then, even if Mr. Fairhurst is discredited only to the extent already intimated by the noble Viscount on the Woolsack, I believe your Lordships would have the Lord Ordinary himself with you in rejecting his testimony, for he has become a witness neither candid nor accurate. Add to this the unlikeliness of his tale, and there is nothing of it left. It will have become as untrustworthy as it always was inherently improbable.

What, then, did Mr. Fairhurst do with his alleged mandate? This is the matter to which I would first direct the attention of the House. It related, so he says, to two businesses. As to Boness, Limited, he did nothing at all, and in reference to it he made in his evidence two apparently quite inconsistent statements. In chief he said that on December 4 he gave Mr. Bow particulars of that business and that he turned it down and said it was too much money, the stock being too heavy for one thing. In cross-examination he seems to say exactly the opposite. He did not try to tempt Mr. Bow with the business, and Mr. Bow did not turn it down. Mr. Bow, on his side, does not remember the business being then mentioned at all. So far there may be room for adjustment, although it is not easy to find it. But as to this business there remain two assertions which can be made with certainty. The first is that, as Mr. Aitchison agreed on the point being put to him, Mr. Fairhurst's alleged mandate on November 14 with reference to the Boness business was as immediate and as serious as that with reference to the Wylie Hill business. "He asked me to get that business for him," Mr. Fairhurst told the Court (page 150). Yet there is not in the papers or elsewhere a trace of his having done anything whatever in relation to it. Most certain in any case is it—and this is a consideration which will prove to be, as I think, completely destructive of his veracity—that by November 28, when he wrote the letter presently to be mentioned, he had made to Mr. Bow, in relation to this business, no communication at all.

But what did Mr. Fairhurst do with reference to the Wylie Hill business? The answer is, nothing until his return to Birmingham. From there, five days later, on November 19, he wrote a letter addressed to the managing director of that company—he evidently did not even know his name—headed "20, Buchanan-street," stating that his firm had received a special inquiry for "business premises" in that thoroughfare, and begging to inquire whether his correspondent "would be open to dispose of his interest in the lease or freehold of the premises."

It seems a little strange that the terms of the inquiry are so remote from those of the mandate he now alleges he was then fulfilling. But he received from Mr. Wylie Hill the following reply, dated November 20, addressed from Perthshire, and headed "20, Buchanan-street, Glasgow."

"I am chairman and managing director of R. Wylie Hill and Co., Ltd., who are the occupying owners of the above premises.

"The business as a going concern might be acquired. If you have any proposal to make it might be placed before the shareholders. The shares and debentures are mostly held by myself and family.

"I enclose the last balance-sheet and report.

"Any further communications should be sent to this address."

Now, if Mr. Fairhurst's story is true, this letter was, of course, the appellants' property. It ought at once to have been handed or its contents communicated to them. Nothing of the sort was done. Instead of doing either of these things—in itself a most significant omission—Mr. Fairhurst, on November 28, a week later, wrote to Mr. R. W. Bow personally a letter which supplies, as it appears to me, the most decisive test available of the truth or untruth of his story. The letter is as follows:—

"Dear Sir,—I hope to call upon you on Thursday next, December 4, about 2.30 p.m. I shall be glad to know if this is convenient to you. [I have particulars of a good business in the North which I think might be of interest to you.

"I shall be glad to know if you are willing to pay our commission, namely, 2 per cent. on the purchase price.]

"I mentioned this to the vendors, but they say that they would only have to put our commission on to the purchase price which would work out to the same thing.

"This, of course, is only if business is transacted and provided we do not obtain our commission from the vendors.

"I shall be glad if you will let me have a reply by return as I leave for the North on Monday evening.

"Assuring you at all times of our best service and attention.—We are, &c.,

"A. R. Brett and Co., Ltd.,

"R. Fairhurst, Manager."

It is regrettable that the considerations arising from this letter to which I now propose to advert are not in any way dealt with by the Lord Ordinary. Your Lordships cannot therefore know what his mind upon them was or would have been. To the Lord Ordinary the letter is merely part of the narrative, throwing no light or shadow on Mr. Fairhurst's credibility, and he confines himself to reading without comment as he passes along the two sentences from it which I have set in square brackets.

My Lords, it is only from the whole letter that its full significance on this inquiry can be gathered, and that significance is great.

If Mr. Fairhurst's story is true, what was his position at that moment? He was the mandatory of the appellants to acquire for them if he could one of two named and specified Glasgow businesses. If Mr. Bow's story is true, Mr. Fairhurst was not the mandatory of the appellants for any purpose whatever. He remained the representative of a company engaged in the sale of businesses with reference to three of which Mr. Bow had previously made inquiries, and a person from whom he might quite well be expected to inquire again in relation to a business not in England. With which of these two positions is the letter most consistent? Is it consistent with Mr. Fairhurst's at all?

My Lords, on the face of it, this is the letter of an agent for sale intimating his intention of placing before his correspondent "a business in the North" of which he then had particulars and which had not previously been the subject of conversation between them. It is the letter of such an agent endeavouring to arrange in advance for payment of his commission by the proposed purchaser in the event of the vendor's adhering to his refusal, then operative, to provide the commission for his own agent. And it is nothing more. And so the letter was read by Mr. Bow, as he said in his evidence; and his reply on the next day was: "At the moment I really have not the time to go into a matter of this kind owing to the Christmas trade, but all the same will be pleased to see you on Thursday next at 2.30 p.m."

My Lords, I should have thought that reply was entirely consistent with the position of a man who had read the letter of the 28th in the only fair sense of its wording, and I am a little surprised that two of the learned Judges in the Inner House have apparently found in this reply of Mr. Bow some justification for their reluctant adherence to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. It is suggested that Mr. Bow should have repudiated the letter of the 28th. For myself, I do not know what repudiation he could have made. The letter asks for a bargain in relation to an entirely new proposition. I cannot see what there is in it to repudiate.

But, my Lords, significant as all this is, the importance of this letter does not end there. Whether you take the letter itself or the evidence by which Mr. Fairhurst sought to turn its terms to bear a meaning which then suited him, the whole incident is a lamentable exhibition. I begin with the admission which he had to make in the box that his statement that the vendor had refused to pay commission was entirely untrue; he had had no communication with any vendor as to commission or at all; and he could give no answer, except one which he withdrew, to the suggestion that he untruly stated that the vendor had refused to pay commission in order to induce Mr. Bow to agree to provide it. His evidence as to the reason why he referred, as he said he did, to the Wylie Hill business by the remote description of "a good business in the North" was no less disastrous. He said he used this phrase because Mr. Bow would know the business he was referring to; and he refrained from specifically mentioning it lest the letter should be seen by the staff. Neither explanation will serve him. Mr. Fairhurst, in giving his first reason, forgot that his mandate, according to his own story, extended to two businesses and not to one only. How, even on his own explanation, could Mr. Bow know which of the two was meant? And the solicitude indicated in the second explanation was strangely absent on December 4 when at an interview with Mr. Wylie Hill he, without permission or authority so to do, told him that the appellants were the inquirers referred to in his letter of November 19.

Now, my Lords, when that letter of November 28 was written the whole service in respect of which the respondents now claim in this action had been rendered. The justification for their demand for £3,000, put forward by Mr. Bauville, the governing director of the respondent company, is that "they claimed to have induced Mr. Wylie Hill to sell," that is, to write his letter of November 20, for that is all he ever did at their instance. All that they had done was to write their strange letter of the 19th.

But Mr. Fairhurst later, on December 4, had an interview with Mr. Wylie Hill, by arrangement and before he went on to see Mr. Bow on the same day. Here we find Mr. Fairhurst again in a conflict of testimony, but this time with Mr. Wylie Hill. He attributes to the latter at that interview, amongst other particulars, the statement that their stock in their business premises was much larger than that shown on the balance-sheet. Mr. Wylie Hill gave no figure, but he called it "hidden stock." This alleged conversation was put to Mr. Wylie Hill. His answer was that Mr. Fairhurst got nothing more from him than the balance-sheet, a public document, that he told Mr. Fairhurst, who asked for details, that he could not go into details until he had got into closer communication. But as to his alleged statement that he had hidden stocks, he replied: "That is nonsense." He had never done that; he had never said it.

My Lords, this account by Mr. Fairhurst of his interview with Mr. Hill is a notable instance of his apparently inveterate habit of improving the occasion regardless of truth in order to magnify the extent of his services.

It has not been suggested that any agreement was reached between Mr. Fairhurst and Mr. Bow at their only other interview on December 4, and I pass on to some later correspondence in order that I may say a word with reference to a letter of Mr. Bow's which, it is contended, shows that he was no more trustworthy as a witness than was Mr. Fairhurst.

On January 19, Mr. Fairhurst writes to Mr. Bow referring to the Wylie Hill business—

"I shall be glad if you will give the matter your careful consideration and let me have your final decision before I offer it to another syndicate who are waiting."

There was no other syndicate waiting. This was another flourish of Mr. Fairhurst's as he admitted in the box. The important point, however, is that he is still, in relation to this Wylie Hill business, regarding his firm as agents for sale.

On February 10 he again writes to Mr. Bow:—

"I shall be glad to hear if you have finally decided re Messrs. R. Wylie and Co., Glasgow. Should you have decided against same will you kindly let me have balance-sheet so that I can place same before a London syndicate."

Still agents for sale. And again, there was no such syndicate, but of course Mr. Bow did not know that, and on February 12 he answered—

"In reply to your letter of the 10th inst. re R. Wylie Hill and Co., we are definitely off the idea and enclose balance-sheet as requested."

Now, if Mr. Bow's idea in writing that letter was to intimate quite clearly to Mr. Fairhurst that the appellants were not standing in the way if he wanted to offer the business to a London syndicate or to anyone else he liked, Mr. Bow could not have chosen a better way of saying so. But it is urged that the letter cannot bear this innocent construction because it is shown that on February 11, the very day on which he received the letter of the 10th, in conversation with the appellants' auditor, Mr. Taylor, who was calling on other business and who happened to be the auditor also of Messrs. Wylie Hill, Mr. Bow asked him whether he had heard that Wylie Hill's were disposing of their business; to this Mr. Taylor replied that he had heard nothing whatever of the subject, but that he would take an opportunity of asking Mr. Wylie Hill the first time he saw him. Mr. Taylor, who was called by the respondents, said that the conversation was entirely casual, not in any way in the nature of a business approach; that his own impression was that Mr. Bow's attitude was one of curiosity that there should be such a thing as Wylie Hill's being in the market and that it was not a question of his having any serious intention of acquiring any share in it at all. Mr. Taylor did not see Mr. Hill until nearly a month later, on March 9, and he reported to Mr. Bow on the 13th what Mr. Hill had said. What that was does not appear in the evidence but, whatever it was, nothing was done upon it by Mr. Bow. It was not until September that the matter was revived and then, as is common ground, not at the instance in any way of the appellants but at the instance of Mr. Wylie Hill himself, who—being unwilling to sell his business to a syndicate who were inquiring about it—desired to find out whether the appellants might be possible, as they would be preferable, purchasers. This inquiry may have been the result of a service rendered by the respondents to Mr. Wylie Hill when Mr. Fairhurst on December 4 informed him that the appellants were the inquirers, but it had nothing to do with any service rendered to the appellants, for it was Mr. Bow who gave Mr. Fairhurst the information as to Mr. Wylie Hill, and it was not otherwise.

Now, my Lords, I do very earnestly suggest that no charge, either of bad faith or untruthfulness, can be brought home to Mr. Bow on the strength of these facts. That he was definitely off any idea of buying Wylie Hill's business in February is, I submit, clear. He would have been neither surprised nor disappointed if Mr. Fairhurst's London syndicate had in due course materialized.

My Lords, I do not go into the later details of the story. Your Lordships know how, following the purchase in October, 1925, of the shares in the Wylie Hill business by the appellants and some of their own shareholders, this action was commenced on December 21.

It is important, however, to note how the agreement, finally alleged by Mr. Fairhurst in evidence, was gradually evolved in the proceeding.

In paragraph 3 of the condescendence the allegation is that on November 14, 1924, Mr. Bow suggested "that Mr. Fairhurst should submit for his consideration other businesses of a class suitable for acquisition by the defenders which he indicated to Mr. Fairhurst. At said interview Mr. Bow on behalf of the defenders engaged the pursuers as agents for them to inquire regarding such businesses and submit particulars with a view to purchase."

This is a long way off the agreement finally set up.

At the trial, in chief, Mr. Fairhurst's statement of his alleged agreement was that Mr. Bow said to him:

"If you could get for me the business of Mr. Wylie Hill or another [mentioned] I should be very glad."

Mr. Fairhurst then asked: "Is there any chance of getting these businesses?"

Mr. Bow replied : "That is what I want you to find out for me."

Only later in his evidence did Mr. Fairhurst reach the statement of the unqualified agreement now set up.

My Lords, has he proved it ? The burden is on the respondents, and his is their only evidence.

The examination of that evidence which I have made demonstrates, I suggest, that Mr. Fairhurst in this matter is a witness who cannot be trusted to speak the truth either in the box or in his correspondence. His evidence is contradicted not only by his own acts, but by the reliable testimony of at least one other witness. Some of his assertions upon oath—for example, his assertion that the first of his two visits to Glasgow was made on the invitation of the appellants—show that in his evidence, no more than is admittedly the case in his correspondence, is he at pains to tell the truth when an untruth seems better to suit his purpose. If candour be indicated by an aggressive readiness to admit detected falsehood, then Mr. Fairhurst may be entitled to the description of a candid witness, but the examination of his evidence which I have made demonstrates, I submit, that his testimony is not that either of an accurate or of a candid witness in any commendatory senses of these terms, but is the evidence of an experienced and, where the supposed interests of the respondents are concerned, an irresponsible witness.

My Lords, this, I believe, is one of the rare cases in which it is better for a Judge of fact not to see the witness. I do not doubt that Mr. Fairhurst was one of the most plausible beings who ever entered a witness-box. I have been a Judge of first instance myself, and I know from experience how readily, under the glamour of an attractive personality or of consummate art, the hard facts may be hidden from him. In such a case the truth or falsity of a story may be better discerned, perhaps can only be discovered, by the calm consideration of the printed page tested at every point by the probabilities of the thing, the inferences flowing from the witness's own acts, the contradictions of other witnesses, and, perhaps beyond all, by the witness's admitted or established mendacity in important parts of his evidence.

Tried by those tests Mr. Fairhurst's evidence, I submit, disappears. The Lord Ordinary did not so try it, and it, in my judgment, became the duty of the Inner House to bring it to that acid test. They, too, refrained, and now it is, I believe, incumbent on this House to do so for itself.

One word more. This is a case of an alleged agent for purchase claiming, by agreement, commission on the basis of purchase price. I do not doubt that such an agreement is possible. With Lord Phillimore, I believe it to be very unusual and it is one which, when it exists, is almost invariably in writing. Be that, however, as it may, it is an agreement under which the agent is put in a position in which his interest may conflict with his duty, and it is accordingly one to be established by evidence on which a Court feels that it can safely rely. I venture to suggest to your Lordships that the uncorroborated testimony of such a witness, as Mr. Fairhurst has been shown to be, cannot be sufficient for such a purpose.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed.

I desire, however, to add that if the appeal must be decided on the basis on which Lord Phillimore proceeds, then I am entirely of the opinion expressed by him on that view, and I concur with him in the conclusion which he has reached on the case as so regarded.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Hill, J.) } 1927. Dec. 15.

THE TOURAINE.*

Ship — Damage to cargo — Bill of lading incorporating the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924 (Australian statute)—Neglect or default in management of the ship — Surrender of statutory immunity.

Cargo, consisting of bales of opossum skins, was shipped at the port of Sydney, New South Wales, under bills of lading which, pursuant to s. 6 of the Australian Commonwealth Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924, contained the following :—"Paramount Clause.—This bill of lading is to be read and construed as if every clause therein contained which is rendered illegal or null and void by the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924, had never been inserted therein or had been cancelled and eliminated therefrom prior to the execution thereof, and is issued subject to all the terms and provisions of and to all the exemptions from liability in such Act."

By Art. IV., Rule 2, of the Schedule to the above Act, "Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from (a) act, neglect or default of the master, mariner, pilot, or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship . . ."

During the voyage a seaman, by using an iron rod for the purpose of clearing an obstruction in a lead pipe, which carried off waste water from the crew's wash-house to the ship's side, pierced or cracked the pipe, with the result that water leaked into the ship's strong-room and did damage to the opossum skins which were stored therein.

Held, that the act of clearing the pipe of an obstruction was the management of an essential part of the crew's accommodation and therefore of the ship ; that the use of an iron rod with such force as to pierce or crack the pipe was negligence on the part of the seaman ; and that therefore the damage to the cargo was due to neglect in the management of the ship for which the carrier was exempt from liability.

By Article V. of the schedule, "A carrier shall be at liberty to surrender in whole or in part all or any of his rights and immunities or to increase any of his responsibilities under the Rules contained in any of these Articles, provided such surrender or increase shall be embodied in the bill of lading issued to the shipper . . ."

* Reported by A. W. Grant, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Inasmuch as the bills of lading expressly stated that "the carriers are not to be responsible for faults or errors of navigation," but no mention was made therein of responsibility for faults of management, it was contended by the cargo-owners that the carrier had impliedly surrendered the immunity in respect of faults of management.

Held, that the surrender of a statutory immunity must be clearly stated and was not to be inferred from the needless repetition of another immunity.

This was an action brought by the owners of nine bales of opossum skins laden on board the steamship Touraine at Sydney, New South Wales, for delivery at Hamburg, to recover the damage sustained by the said skins during carriage. The defendants were the owners of the Touraine.

The skins were shipped in October, 1926, under bills of lading which, in compliance with section 6 of the Commonwealth of Australia Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924, contained an express statement that they were to have effect subject only to the provisions of the Rules as applied by that Act.

Rule 2 of Article IV. of the Schedule to the Act of 1924 declares that "neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from (a) act, neglect, or default of the master, mariner, pilot, or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship."

Article V. says :—"A carrier shall be at liberty to surrender in whole or in part all or any of his rights and immunities or to increase any of his responsibilities and liabilities under the Rules contained in any of these Articles, provided such surrender or increase shall be embodied in the bill of lading issued to the shipper."

The bills of lading contained, among a number of express exemptions, the following :—"The carriers are not to be responsible for faults or errors of navigation." There was no express reference to liability for faults of management.

The skins in question were carried in the strong-room of the Touraine. Above the strong-room was the crew's wash-house, which had a cement floor. The crew were in the habit of washing themselves and sometimes their clothes in buckets in the wash-house, the water afterwards being poured on to the cement floor so that it might run down a leaden pipe which passed from the wash-house, through the strong-room, to the ship's side. During the voyage the waste pipe became choked by refuse, and in order to clear it and so free the floor of the wash-house from water, a seaman used an iron rod, and used it with so much force as to pierce or crack the leaden pipe at a bend inside the strong-room. In consequence of the leak so caused a large quantity of waste water found its way into the strong-room, doing the damage complained of.

The plaintiff cargo-owners alleged, inter alia, that the Touraine was unseaworthy, that the strong room, by reason of the presence and character of the waste pipe, was unfit for the reception and carriage of the skins, and that the carriers had failed to exercise due care and diligence to make it fit. They denied that the damage to the skins was caused by any act, neglect, or fault in the management of the ship, so as to come within the exemptions in Rule 2 (a) of Article IV., and further contended that the carriers, by expressly exempting negligence in the navigation of the ship, had impliedly surrendered their immunity in respect of faults of management.

The defendants, on the facts set out above, denied the allegations of unseaworthiness and unfitness and contended that the damage resulted from neglect in the management of the ship and they were therefore exempted from liability.

Mr. C. R. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. L. F. C. Darby appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. G. P. Langton, K.C., and Mr. J. St. C. Lindsay for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Hill, in a considered judgment, said :—This is a claim under five bills of lading in respect of bales of opossum skins shipped in Sydney in October, 1926, for delivery at Hamburg, and delivered damaged. The damage was by water, whether fresh or salt is immaterial. It was water which entered the strong room in which the skins were stored from without. The defendants say that the damage was caused by negligence for which they are not responsible. That is the first question to be decided. The plaintiffs, while denying such cause, say that the cause was the unseaworthiness or unfitness of the ship. That is the second question. If the defendants fail on these points, they say that (a) they are not liable at all for furs, or (b) they are liable only to the limited extent per bale fixed by the Act. That depends on the bill of lading read in the light of the Act. The Act applicable is the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924, of the Australian Commonwealth.

I have come to a clear conclusion as to how the damage was caused. The skins were the only cargo stored in the strong room. The strong room was aft and between the main and shelter decks. Above it, at its fore end on the starboard side, was the sailors' wash-house. This wash-house was on the shelter deck. It had a cement floor. Waste water was carried from the floor of the wash-house to the ship's side by a leaden pipe which passed through the strong room. There was a hole in the cement communicating through a hole in the shelter deck with the upper end of the pipe, which was fitted by a flange to the under side of the shelter deck. At the lower end the pipe was fitted by a flange to a hole in the ship's side, which was fitted with a storm valve. There were two bends in the pipe. The upper one was a sharp bend a little below the upper end of the pipe. The pipe, and also a pipe from the w.c.'s adjoining the wash-house, were cased in with a wooden casing, the object of which was to protect the pipes from injury. On the floor of the strong room were scuppers leading to the bilges. The only access to the strong room was by a trunk hatchway opening on the poop deck. Before the skins were loaded there was no sign of moisture in the strong room. During the voyage, before the ship reached Aden, some scraping work was done in the trunk-way and the skins were shifted to the fore part of the strong room, and thereby brought nearer to the pipe. At this time nothing wrong was noticed. There was no water in the strong room. At Hamburg the skins were found wet and very seriously damaged. There was water on the floor of the strong room, sufficient to have shifted the dunnage wood. The scuppers were choked and the water had to be baled out. The water had entered the strong room by a hole or crack in the lead waste pipe at the bend a little below the shelter deck. The water had come from the wash-house. It is, in my judgment, impossible to suppose that this hole or crack existed before the voyage began. It must have come into existence during the voyage. The wash-house was in regular use. It contained a shower bath. It also contained basins, which seem not to have been used ; but the sailors brought into the house pails of fresh water and there washed themselves and sometimes their clothes. The pails were emptied on to the floor. The wood casing in the strong room was not water-tight. Had the hole or crack in the pipe been in existence during the earlier part of the voyage, water must have got into the strong room and some signs of water must have been obvious when the chief officer was in that room in connexion with the scraping work and the bales were shifted. It was suggested that the hole or crack might have been there all along, but plugged by refuse. I cannot believe that any refuse which could get down the pipe could have so effectually stopped an existing crack as to prevent the percolation of any water.

How was this hole or crack which came into existence during the voyage made ? I find it proved that it was made by the seaman Olsen. He found the pipe choked and that there was water on the floor of the wash-house, and he used an iron rod to clear the obstruction, and used it with such force as to pierce or crack the lead of the pipe in the neighbourhood of the bend. It is true that in the log the leak was stated to be due to a break in the pipe caused by straining of the ship ; but at that time the pipe had not been seen by the master or the chief officer. The carpenter reported a crack and made the pipe water-tight with a stocking of marlin and red lead. It was not until after the next round voyage that the pipe was taken out and examined by surveyors, and the real nature of the damage to it ascertained. The sailors were then questioned. Naturally, until questioned, they had not volunteered information which might reflect upon Olsen, and indeed may not have supposed that what they had seen Olsen doing had damaged the pipe.

In my judgment, upon these facts, it has been proved by the defendants that the cause of the damage was the negligence of the seaman in making the hole or crack in the pipe ; and in my judgment such negligence was "neglect in the management of the ship." It was neglect, for it was negligent to use an iron rod, and to use it with such force as to pierce or crack the pipe. The wash-house and the waste pipe therefrom were essential parts of the crew's accommodation, and therefore of the ship. The act of clearing the pipe of an obstruction was a management of that part of the crew's accommodation and therefore of the ship. If I need authority. I have it in The Rodney (16 The Times L.R., 183 ; [1900] P., 112). It was contended that Olsen was not doing an act of management because he was clearing the obstruction only for his own benefit. I do not agree. It was done in order to put the wash-house floor in a proper state. Mr. Dunlop, for the plaintiffs, contended that the defendants were not entitled to rely upon an exception of negligence in management. The argument was this : The bill of lading contains a very large number of exceptions, including this : "The carriers are not to be responsible for faults or errors of navigation." In accordance with section 6 of the Act it also contains an express statement that it is to have effect subject to the provisions of the Rules as applied by the Act. The section is in the following terms :— "Every bill of lading or similar document of title issued in the Commonwealth which contains or is evidence of any contract to which the Rules apply shall contain an express statement that it is to have effect subject to the provisions of the Rules as applied by this Act."

By the Rules, Article IV. (2) : "Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from (a) act, neglect, or default of the master, mariner, pilot or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship " ; but by Article V. a carrier is at liberty to surrender any of his immunities under the Rules, provided such surrender is embodied in the bill of lading. Now, says Mr. Dunlop, by retaining the exception of faults of navigation the carrier has impliedly surrendered the immunity in respect of faults of management. I do not accept that argument. The immunity is created by the statute and the surrender must be embodied in the bill of lading. In my opinion, the surrender of a statutory immunity must be clearly stated. It is not to be inferred from the needless repetition of another immunity.

There remains the question whether the ship was unseaworthy or the strong room unfit or unsafe for the carriage of the skins, and whether the damage arose or resulted from such unseaworthiness or unfitness. The allegation in the statement of claim was that the pipe was fractured. As the case developed other charges were made and were embodied in amended particulars. The attack was still in the main upon the pipe, and I will deal with that first. There was nothing unusual in the construction of the pipe or in the fact that it was carried through the strong room. A lead pipe is more usual for sanitary purposes, and is indeed more costly than iron. The material of the pipe was good. The size of the pipe was sufficient. It had been fitted with a rose sunk in the cement ; but the rose was broken. Mr. Camps said it was a matter of opinion whether a rose was advisable—many ships had no rose to such a pipe. No one gave evidence to the contrary. It is obvious that, rose or no rose, some refuse from the wash-house—soap and bits of rag and so forth—might get down the pipe, and that more refuse might get down if there was no rose. It was also possible that such refuse might accumulate at the bend and cause an obstruction to the flow of the water from the wash-house. It is the sort of thing with which we are all familiar. It happened on board the Touraine and had happened before the voyage in question. But the choking of the pipe by itself would not cause water to flow into the strong room. The water would accumulate on the floor of the wash-house until it rose above the sill and then would flow on to the deck and away to the ship's side. When the pipe choked, the seamen would be likely to do their best to clear the obstruction. They had on previous occasions cleared the obstruction by using a wire. If such an instrument were used the pipe could not be pierced or cracked. If a stiffer instrument, such as an iron rod, were used, and used with sufficient force, the pipe might be pierced at the bend, as happened when Olsen used the iron rod. I cannot, however, think that anyone concerned with the ship ought to have anticipated that so foolish a means to clear the pipe would be used, or that the sailors ought to have been warned not to act in such a way.

The question which I have to ask myself is that indicated by Lord Gorell in The Schwan (25 The Times L.R., 742 ; [1909] A.C., 450, at p. 463), and it is this : Was the vessel in respect of this pipe "reasonably fit to be worked in the way which might ordinarily be expected " ? I think it was. If so, then in respect of the pipe the ship was not unseaworthy nor the strong room unfit or unsafe.

There is, in my judgment, no substance in the matters alleged by the plaintiffs. Had they been set forth in the statement of claim the defendants might have obtained further evidence; but upon the evidence as it stands I do not think the plaintiffs have made good any case of unseaworthiness or unfitness. To take them in their order the allegations are: (b) No means of ascertaining whether any water did get into the strong room. It is not usual to have sounding pipes in such a compartment, which lies high above the load line. There is no necessity for them, for water is not expected to find its way into such a space. (c) The scuppers were choked or likely to get choked. It is true that they were found to be choked when examined after the voyage, but I see no reason at all to suppose that they were choked before the voyage in question began. The strong room had been examined before the skins were shipped. A choking of the scuppers would be a natural consequence of the water from the washhouse, carrying some refuse with it and collecting more from the floor of the strong room and from the wrappings of the bales. But over and above this I doubt if a strong room such as this would be unfit for the bales of skins even if it had no scuppers. There was no reasonable probability that water would enter the strong room. Scuppers in such a place are provided mainly to carry off water when the compartment is washed out. They also serve to carry off moisture from a cargo liable to sweat. The scuppers were amply sufficient to carry off any such condensed moisture. (d) Ventilation. There was in fact sufficient ventilation, and indeed, with the quantity of water in the strong room, it made very little difference whether there was ventilation or not. (g) The point about a storm valve was not insisted on. There was a storm valve and the water came from the washhouse and not from the sea. The other points (a), (e) and (f) I have already sufficiently dealt with.

The result is that, in my judgment, the ship was not unseaworthy nor the strong room unfit or unsafe. The question of due diligence therefore does not arise. In view of these findings it is not necessary to decide upon the remaining answers of the defendants or the reply thereto of the plaintiffs. As at present advised I should have had great difficulty in reconciling with the Rules either a total exemption in respect of furs or the plaintiffs' argument that Article IV., Rule 5, did not fix a limit per bale of £100. There must be judgment for the defendants.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P.) } 1927. Dec. 20.

BARKWELL v. BARKWELL.*

Probate—Evidence—Lost will—Parol evidence of revocation clause — Earlier wills revoked by revoked last will—Intestacy—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict., c. 26).

Parol evidence is admissible to show that a will, presumed to have been destroyed animo revocandi, contained a revocation clause revoking all anterior wills, thereby creating an intestacy.

In this action the plaintiff, Mr. William Samuel Bryers Barkwell, of Toronto, asked for a grant of probate of the will of his brother, the late Dr. Richard Herbert Barkwell, a medical practitioner, formerly of Lavender-hill, S.W., who died at Bournemouth on October 26, 1926, aged 73. He claimed as the sole surviving executor of a will dated July 26, 1891, and asked that a grant of letters of administration of the estate obtained by the defendant, Mr. Herbert Bryers Wood Barkwell, the testator's son, on December 2, 1926, should be revoked.

The defendant put the plaintiff to proof of the due execution of the will of 1891, and said that, if properly executed, it was revoked by a later will, and that this will and subsequent wills were revoked by a will of 1925, which could not be found and was therefore presumed to have been revoked. He said that his father died a widower and intestate, and asked the Court to pronounce against the will of 1891 and that the letters of administration be handed out to him as the only person entitled to the estate on intestacy.

Mr. Cotes-Preedy, K.C., Mr. Bush James, and Mr. V. O. Williams appeared for the plaintiff; Sir Patrick Hastings, K.C., Mr. Bayford, K.C., and Mr. Walter Frampton for the defendant; and Mr. T. Bucknill watched the proceedings for Mr. Oliver Cromwell Barkwell, a nephew of the testator.

Due execution of the will of 1891 was proved, and evidence was given by the defendant that there was no foundation for his father's belief in 1925 that he (the defendant) was leading a prodigal life. Several witnesses testified to the testator's having obtained at Bournemouth in 1925 will forms each containing a revocation clause, to his having written what he described as his will on one of them, which will was duly executed, and to his having spoken in that year of having recently made a new will. One of the witnesses to this document said that the form used was similar to the one produced containing a revocation clause. The will was not found on the testator's death, and correspondence was read purporting to show that the testator, who had during his life made a number of wills, towards the end of his life indicated that he had revoked the 1925 will. The rest of the evidence, so far as it is relevant to the issues, is discussed in the judgment.

Mr. Cotes-Preedy claimed that the defendant had adduced no evidence to satisfy the requirements of the Wills Act, 1837, as to the due execution of the 1925 will or that it had revocatory effect. He said that there was no decided authority on the question of parol evidence being allowed as to animus revocandi. He referred to Hellier v. Hellier (9 P.D., 237) and cited the following passage from the speech of Lord Herschell in Woodward v. Goulstone (11 App. Cas., 469, at p. 474):

"Nothing can be more dangerous, I think, than to accept as any evidence, to carry with it weight, of the contents of a will the evidence of persons of statements made to them of bounties which they are to receive after the death of the person who made those statements. . . . Of course I do not say that in no case can a will be established by parol evidence. . . . I think that in order to support a will propounded, when it is proved by parol evidence only, that evidence ought to be of extreme cogency, and such as to satisfy one beyond all reasonable doubt that there is really before one substantially the testamentary intentions of the testator."

Counsel cited a passage from Williams on Executors in support of his argument that parol evidence was not admissible as to the execution or contents of the will of 1925, and he referred to Brown v. Brown

* Reported by William Latey, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(8 E. and B., 876) and Newton v. Newton (12 Ir. Ch. Rep., 118).

LORD MERRIVALE.—The principle is mostly discussed in cases where it is sought to set up a lost will, but the defendant does not seek to set up the lost will of 1925. I might find that there was a will but it did not contain a revocation clause.

SIR PATRICK HASTINGS and Mr. BAYFORD, replying on behalf of the defendant, argued that there was abundant evidence upon which the Court could find that the testator made a will in 1925 containing a revocation clause.

LORD MERRIVALE.—What authority is there to show that a statement by a testator that he has executed a will can be received in evidence ?

SIR PATRICK HASTINGS.—You can give secondary evidence of a will as well as of any other written instrument. If I can give secondary evidence of the contents of a will, cannot I give secondary evidence of its proper execution ?

He said that this was the sort of case of great testamentary difficulty such as was referred to by Lord Russell of Killowen in Atkinson v. Morris (13 The Times L.R., 83 ; [1897] P., 40) when he said : "No one can doubt that this lady intended to revoke her will, and the Court ought to be astute to give effect to that intention, if it can do so consistently with the established and settled principles of law." He relied on Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1 P.D., 154) in support of the contention that parol evidence was admissible in this case to show that the lost will of 1925 revoked all previous wills.

LORD MERRIVALE delivered the following considered judgment :—

In this suit legal questions of considerable importance were raised and I thought it advisable to give considered reasons for the conclusions at which I have arrived. The deceased, whom I will call the testator, died at an advanced age, possessed of property estimated as of the gross value of about £16,000. He was a man of eccentric habits, and very pronounced views on many subjects, was much addicted to what may be called testamentary exercises, and very apt to change his testamentary intentions upon sudden provocation. In his later life he also showed himself apt in correspondence with his relatives overseas to attract them to him upon a prospect of benefits to be secured to them by will. During the time under review the testator's differences with his wife, and in recent years an unfavourable view that he had taken of his son, the defendant, were powerful incentives in his decisions about the disposal of his estate. The plaintiff is a brother of the testator. He seeks to establish a will, made in July, 1891, before the birth of the defendant, but in the midst of his father's disagreements with his mother. The plaintiff lived in Canada and the will was sent to him there. He is the survivor of two executors named in the will. The plaintiff has brought in a will of 1888—apparently holograph. It commences with a revocation clause, and besides some exiguous gifts to the wife, consists mainly of dispositions in favour of the plaintiff and others of his family. The will propounded by the plaintiff also begins with a revocation clause of like tenor with that of 1888.

By written and oral evidence it was established that in 1901 the testator declared that he had recently made a will leaving all that he possessed to his son, the defendant. In 1902, his solicitor, Mr. G. A. Nichols, drafted a will to dispose of all the testator's property which he suggested should take the place of an instrument which the testator had apparently forwarded to him, and as to which the solicitor wrote : "The inconsistent statements and directions which you made in your so-called will would only lead to the whole matter being thrown into Chancery for the protection of your trustee." Amongst the testator's papers there was found at his death the draft copy of a purported will in his handwriting disposing of all his estate, bearing date August, 1908, and representing itself to have been signed by the testator and two witnesses. Nothing was known of this document, however, except what appeared on its face. In April, 1910, the testator produced to Mr. D. N. Forbes, who was called before me, a paper signed by himself, which he described as his will and as to which he said that he had thereby made Mr. Forbes his executor and left him one-fourth, and his son the remaining three-fourths of his property. As described by Mr. Forbes the paper appeared to be in the form of a will with the attestation clause in the usual position.

In 1925 the testator identified as a will, in the making of which he was engaged, a writing upon a will form recently purchased at his direction, and after he had completed the writing he signed the document in the presence of two witnesses, Alfred Day and Emily Whilde, who duly attested his signature, and one of whom was called as a witness. Upon this instrument the questions between the parties mainly depend. After the death of the testator search was made and, no will being found, the defendant as next of kin made the necessary affidavit for obtaining letters of administration, and a grant was made thereupon in the usual course. Shortly afterwards the plaintiff arrived in England and produced the will of 1891 for which he claims probate.

At the hearing proof was given of due execution of this will propounded by the plaintiff, and the substantial question in the case came to be whether it had been revoked. Counsel for the defendant submitted that, whatever else was in doubt, there could be no doubt that the testator at all material times intended to revoke the will of 1891 and to leave it revoked. They also claim to have proved the contents of a will of August, 1908, and the contents and execution of a will of 1910, each of them revocatory of every anterior will. They likewise contended that they had shown that in the spring of 1925 the testator made a will which expressly revoked any earlier will. Finally, as no such will could be found on the testator's death, and as many letters which he wrote in 1925 discussed his testamentary position on the footing that this will had been revoked, they submitted that intestacy was proved.

On the plaintiff's behalf two main contentions were made. It was argued that on a correct view of the authorities ex post facto declarations of the testator as to the various wills said to have been made by him after 1891 were inadmissible. It was also urged that inasmuch as the alleged will of 1925 was asserted by the defendant's pleadings to be a revoked will no secondary evidence of its contents could be admitted. The question what declarations of a testator are admissible in evidence to establish testamentary acts stands to-day where it was left by the statement of Lord Herschell, Lord Chancellor, in the House of Lords, in Woodward v. Goulstone (11 App. Cas., 469) upon consideration of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in relation to this matter in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1 P.D., 154, at pp. 226-228), that is to say, it remains doubtful and difficult concerning the admissibility of statements of a testator as to the contents of an intended will made before the execution of the will. In Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (supra), which confirmed numerous earlier decisions, the Court of Appeal held that certain statements made by the testator in that case after the execution of a will were admissible, and as matters stand, notwithstanding the doubts expressed in Woodward v. Goulstone (supra), the judgment in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (supra) must be regarded as having declared the law so far as it has been authoritatively declared.

As to the application of the rule which was considered in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (supra), two well-known principles are always to be borne in mind. Inasmuch as the Wills Act, 1837, denies all effect to any will unless it shall be made in writing and executed in the prescribed manner, that statute plainly ought not to be evaded by the admission of parol statements, made after the event, to make out execution. Under the common law, however, which since 1857 has governed proceedings in this jurisdiction, a fact which is in issue may, subject to the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837, be proved by any kind of lawful evidence, provided that it be the best available. To exclude a subsequent statement of a testator as to the fact of execution of a will is one thing. To exclude or to admit his statements as to the contents of a writing no longer in being is another. It may be that the observance of this distinction will some day help in the decision of the vexed question what statements of the testator can be given in proof.

In the present case it is not pretended that there is legal proof of due execution of any will of the testator in 1901, 1902, or 1908. A negative finding on the allegations of the defence as to the wills suggested to have been made between 1891 and 1910 is not resisted. As to the paper produced to Mr. Forbes in 1910, there are reasons for believing that it was a duly executed will. It bore the testator's signature. It had what appeared to be an attestation clause. It was described as his will by a man uncommonly versed in such matters. I think a verdict of a jury that it was duly executed might be sustained, but I do not make such a finding because no signatures of witnesses were made out, and I am not convinced that they were there. The case depends then upon the view to be taken of the alleged will of 1925. As to this instrument there is the evidence of one of the witnesses of the fact of execution. There is a good deal of testimony as to statements of the testator before and during the preparation of the document, and after the date when it was signed, concerning the contents or effect of what he called his will. Counsel for the plaintiff, however, contended that, apart from the question of admissibility raised in Woodward v. Goulstone (supra), none of this material is available by reason that the will, if it ever existed, is declared by the defendant to have been revoked in the lifetime of the testator.

To the proposition that a revoked will must be treated as non-existent there are obvious limitations. No one would doubt, I suppose, that after the death of the testator a document executed by him as a will but afterwards revoked could be used to show his knowledge during life of matters of fact of which it contained evidence. Again, in a suit wherein due execution, validity, revocation, and republication come in question as to one will, its origin and its contents might be among the main facts for the consideration of the Court. Further, in the case of a testator who has made successive complementary dispositions by will or codicil, and has revoked some of them by a will, subsequently itself revoked by cancellation, the ascertainment of the true effect of these several testamentary acts would be impossible if the rule were as is contended, even though every material document were in being. Yet no rule of evidence under the common law, so far as I know, presents any such impediment to the administration of justice. What is said for the plaintiff is that the rule contended for has been established by various decided cases based upon the Wills Act, 1837, and it is set forth in text-books of recognized authority. The citation mainly relied upon, which does seem to be in point, is that made from Williams on Executors (11th edition, p. 258) in the words following: "Since a will which has been destroyed animo revocandi cannot be revived by a subsequent codicil, for not being in existence it cannot be incorporated in, or republished by such codicil by reference, it follows that secondary evidence of what the contents of the destroyed will were is not admissible."

None of the cases cited in Williams is a direct authority for the proposition therein enunciated. Indeed they seem on the whole to impugn it. In the Irish case of Newton v. Newton (12 Ir. Ch. Rep., 118), which is one of these decisions, Mr. Justice Keatinge, who tried the action, said this at p. iii of the Appendix: "If, indeed, the deceased had made no will or codicil subsequent to the will of the 4th February, 1858 [the execution of which was proved], and if on his death that will could not be found, and if there was no evidence to rebut the presumption that he had himself destroyed it, and that consequently parol evidence could be given of its contents, and if it became necessary to go into such evidence . . . to show that it contained a clause of revocation . . . then the draft might be good evidence of what was contained in it at the time of its execution."

There is, moreover, something like direct authority against the proposition made on behalf of the plaintiff. In the Goods of Hodgkinson (9 The Times L.R., 650; [1893] P., 339) is a case in point. There a will had been revoked by the testator by cutting off his signature. Evidence of its contents was received which showed that this will had revoked some only of the dispositions in an earlier will. In this Division and in the Court of Appeal the effect of the revoked will upon the earlier will was adjudicated upon. Here it was held that the earlier will stood entire and unaffected by the will made later and revoked, but the Court of Appeal decided that the revoked will had effectually rescinded the dispositions to which it related in the earlier will, and that probate of the earlier will must be limited to the parts of the testator's estate to which the second will did not relate.

The view taken in Hodgkinson's case (supra) is entirely in accordance with the judgment given in the well-known case of Brown v. Brown (8 E. and B., 876), decided in the Court of King's Bench in 1858. There an heir-at-law was claiming realty upon an intestacy and he was held entitled, in support of an allegation of intestacy, to give evidence of the contents of the will which he alleged to have been revoked, in order to show that that will contained a clause revocatory of an earlier will.

It is proper to say that the passage in Williams which is relied upon has not the authority of Sir Edward Vaughan Williams and has no place in the editions of his work which were published during his life.

Looking at the matter on principle, there can, I think, be no doubt as to the rule. A question of fact is in dispute—namely, whether the will of 1925 contained a revocation clause. The document cannot be found, and presumably it was destroyed by the testator. Apart from statute, the evidence to be required is what is called in the opening sentences of Roscoe's Nisi Prius Evidence : "The best evidence, or rather the highest kind of evidence of which the nature of the case admits." The only relevant statute is the Wills Act, 1837. Section 9 of that Act enacts that no will shall be valid unless it shall be in writing and executed in the prescribed manner. Sections 18 and 20 prescribe the means whereby a will may be revoked. Section 22 directs that no revoked will shall be revived otherwise than by re-execution or by a codicil duly executed showing intention to revive. All that the statute really requires here is that I should see whether what the defendant seeks to do is to revive the will of 1925. In my judgment he does not. What he seeks is to show that when the testator attached his signature to the document of 1925, it was, within the terms of section 20 of the Wills Act, 1837, "another will or codicil . . . or . . . some writing declaring an intention to revoke." Section 24 of the Act has no relevant effect. The language of this section is plain. A will is to be "construed with reference to the real and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will."

The intention which appears by this will was that upon its execution previous wills should be revoked. Cases beyond number have made it clear that words of revocation contained in a will operate immediately upon its execution so effectually, that without some express act of revivor the revoked testament has thenceforward no existence as a will. The principle is illustrated in Brown v. Brown (supra) and In the Goods of Brown (1 Sw. and Tr., 32).

What remains is to ascertain whether the writing of the testator witnessed by Alfred Day and Emily Whilde of 1925 was expressly or by implication a will which revoked any will previously in being. I know as to the substance of the transaction many material facts. The testator, for a substantial period before his signature was witnessed, had been engaged, according to his own statements, fortified by abundance of corroborative circumstances, in the preparation of a will. He wrote upon a printed form what he said was his will. He named persons whom he intended to benefit. He concluded the document with sentences expressive of pious opinions such as he had often before expressed in the like connexion. The printed form was one of two brought to him by his messenger from a shop of a firm of law stationers at Bournemouth, and it contained a revocation clause in absolute terms. Bearing in mind the practical experience of the testator, the knowledge that he had of will making, and the numerous occasions on which he had demonstrated it, I am satisfied that the document witnessed by Mr. Day and Miss Whilde was the will of the testator, and that he thereby in express terms revoked all earlier wills.

Having ascertained the fact of revocation, I have no concern with the declarations of the testator, sooner or later, as to the contents of the will in question, or with any statements concerning subsequent testamentary acts or intentions. No later will appears and in respect of all these matters the extent of the rule of law which excludes some declarations and includes others becomes immaterial.

The defendant is entitled to judgment in the action. I therefore pronounce against the will propounded by the plaintiff and direct that the letters of administration granted to the defendant in his proceedings in common form be handed out to him.

On the question of costs, his LORDSHIP said that he must apply the ordinary rule in the Probate Division, that where the conduct of the testator had necessitated the inquiry as to what in truth were his testamentary dispositions the costs must come out of the estate. In this case the testator left his affairs in confusion after making a variety of testamentary dispositions, raising questions of revocation and dependent relative revocation. It was a matter of public concern that the testamentary act of a deceased person should be ascertained, and the costs of all parties would come out of the estate.

STOTT AND ANOTHER v. SHAW AND LEE, LIMITED.*

Bills of Sale—Validity — Consideration — Contemporaneous mortgage forming part of contract—"Defeasance or condition"—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict., c. 31), ss. 8, 10 (3).

By the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 8 : "Every bill of sale . . . shall set forth the consideration for which such bill of sale was given." By s. 10 (3) : "If the bill of sale is made or given subject to any defeasance, or condition, or declaration of trust not contained in the body thereof, such defeasance, condition or declaration shall be deemed to be part of the bill, and shall be written on the same paper or parchment therewith before the registration, and shall be truly set forth in the copy filed under this Act therewith and as part thereof, otherwise the registration shall be void."

The grantor of a bill of sale for £1,000 was being pressed by other creditors and approached the grantee for further financial assistance. It was ultimately agreed that the grantee should pay the other creditors a sum of £600, and receive a new bill of sale from the grantor for £1,600, the old bill being cancelled. The new bill of sale stated : "In consideration of the sum of £1,600 paid to [the grantor] by [the grantee] (the receipt of which sum [the grantor] hereby acknowledges) [the grantor] doth hereby assign, &c."

Held, that although the sum referred to had not in fact passed from the grantee to the grantor the consideration for the bill of sale was truly stated within the meaning of s. 8 of the above Act.

Credit Company v. Pott (6 Q.B.D., 295) followed.

Contemporaneously with the bill of sale, and as part of the same bargain, a mortgage instrument was executed by way of collateral security. The bill of sale provided for the repayment of the principal "on the 24th day of December next," and the mortgage instrument provided as follows : "The mortgagor . . . covenants with the mortgagee to pay to him on the 24th day of December next the sum of £1,600 . . . and it is hereby agreed and declared that (subject to the right of the mortgagee to require repayment of the said principal sum on the 24th day of December next according to the foregoing covenant by the mortgagor or at any time thereafter) the principal money secured shall be repaid by instalments of not less than £20" on agreed dates.

Held, that the above agreement in the mortgage instrument merely gave the grantee an additional right to sue at his option in personam for a separate portion of the principal debt, and, as that particular personal covenant did not affect either the right of the grantor to redeem or the right of the grantee to seize the goods under the bill of sale, it did not amount to a "defeasance or condition" not contained in the body of the bill and accordingly invalidating it under s. 10 (3) of the above Act.

Edwards v. Marcus (10 The Times L.R., 255 ; [1894] 1 Q.B., 587) explained and distinguished.

This was an appeal from the Judge of the Salford County Court who had given judgment in favour of the claimants in an interpleader issue. The claimants, Messrs. Stott and Another, were the executors of one Albert Stott (hereinafter called "the deceased"), who died on December 10, 1926, and the appellants, Messrs. Shaw and Lee, Limited, were a firm of moneylenders who held a judgment against one Robert Thornley. In 1910 Thornley had been minded to build a laundry at Flixton, Lancashire, and he bought some land from the deceased for that purpose. As Thornley was unable at that time to find the whole of the purchase money, it was arranged that a mortgage of £150 in favour of the deceased should be left on the land, and by 1912, as the result of a further series of loans, Thornley's indebtedness to the deceased had been increased to £600. In 1913 the deceased lent Thornley a further £400, taking as security to cover the entire £1,000 a bill of sale dated May 30, 1913.

In June, 1925, Thornley was being pressed by the appellants in respect of a series of loans which they had made to him on various occasions, and he again approached the deceased for further financial assistance. On June 24, 1925, the deceased found a further £600, which he paid direct to the appellants to clear Thornley's debt to them. It was agreed between Thornley and the deceased that the former securities should be withdrawn and that Thornley should give the deceased a new bill of sale on the machinery and chattels in the laundry to cover the entire £1,600 owed by him, and also a mortgage for the same sum on the building as a collateral security. The material portions of the bill of sale, which was dated July 1, 1925, were as follows: "In consideration of the sum of £1,600 paid to Robert Thornley by Albert Stott on the 24th day of June, 1925 (the receipt of which sum the said Robert Thornley hereby acknowledges) . . . Robert Thornley doth hereby assign unto . . . Albert Stott, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all and singular the several chattels and things specifically described in the schedule . . . and the said Robert Thornley doth further agree and declare that he will duly pay to the said Albert Stott the principal sum aforesaid with the interest then due on the 24th day of December, 1925. . . ." By the mortgage instrument, which also was dated July 1, 1925, the mortgagor covenanted "in consideration of the sum of £1,600 paid by the mortgagee to the mortgagor on the 24th day of June, 1925, being the amount already advanced by the mortgagee to the mortgagor on the security of a bill of sale dated the 1st day of July, 1925," to "pay to [the mortgagee] on the 24th day of December next the sum of £1,600 with interest thereon" ; and it was further provided that "subject to the right of the mortgagee to require repayment of the said principal sum on the 24th day of December next according to the foregoing covenant by the mortgagor or at any time thereafter, the principal money hereby secured shall be repaid by instalments of not less than £20" on agreed dates.

In January, 1927, the appellants seized the chattels of Thornley in order to satisfy a judgment for £157 9s. 6d. which they held against him. The executors of the deceased paid that sum into Court, and on an interpleader summons they were made claimants and the present appellants were made respondents. It was contended on behalf of the execution creditors that the bill of sale of July 1, 1925, was invalid, first because the collateral mortgage constituted a defeasance or condition, which was not written on the same paper or parchment as the bill before registration, as required by section 10 (3) of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878 ; and secondly, because the consideration for the bill of sale was not truly stated in the bill. The County Court Judge held that the bill was not invalidated on either ground, and that therefore the claimants on the issue were entitled to judgment.

The execution creditors appealed.

Mr. E. W. Wingate-Saul, K.C., and Mr. J. C. Jolly appeared for the execution creditors ; Mr. J. E. Singleton, K.C., and Mr. J. Lustgarten for the claimants.

Mr. Justice Shearman.—The argument in this case on both sides has been very good and the questions arising are difficult. I am delivering the judgment that I am about to deliver with much hesitation because I do not think that this particular case is covered by any other decision, although there are numerous decisions touching both points which have been submitted to us. But in giving my judgment, which is that this appeal must be dismissed, I say at once that I give it with great hesitation, and I trust with modesty, because I think the issue is very difficult and I should be very glad that it should be considered elsewhere if either party so desires.

The two points which arise in the case and the facts on which they arise are very short, and I will endeavour to summarize them. The grantor, at the time of the execution of the bill of sale, which is now attacked on two grounds, owed a sum of exactly £1,000 to the grantee which was due at that particular time under a previous bill of sale. At the same time he also owed to other creditors, the present execution creditors, another sum on another bill of sale. The grantee was asked to lend some more money to relieve the grantor of his difficulties, and what eventually happened was that the grantee paid off the other creditors, the exact sum being £600. It was agreed, on one day and in pursuance of one bargain, that the grantee should pay the creditors £600 and take a bill of sale from the grantor for £1,600, the £1,600 being made up of the two sums, the existing debt of £1,000 then due and payable at that moment, and the £600 paid to the creditors as part of the transaction and part of the bargain. The grantor, therefore, remained indebted at that moment, and in consequence of those considerations, in the sum of £1,600, for which he granted a bill of sale in the statutory form.

To deal with the first point (and I am going to take it very shortly) the bill of sale stated the consideration in these simple words : "In consideration of the sum of £1,600 paid to . . . Thornley by . . . Stott on the 24th day of June, 1925 (the receipt of which sum . . . Thornley hereby acknowledges) . . . Thornley doth hereby assign," &c. Now, it is perfectly clear that, strictly, that was untrue ; and it is argued that the consideration was not truly stated, and that that avoids the bill. It is true that not one halfpenny was paid to the grantor on that date ; but it is perfectly clear that the bargain was : "I will give you this bill of sale because I owe you this very day £1,600, for which you can sue by writ," and if the £1,600 had been produced in notes and had been handed over and £1,000 had gone back to the grantee, then it would have been paid and repaid. And similarly, though there was no evidence of it, it was stated that the grantor was actually present when the creditors were paid, and it is quite clear that he would not have signed the bill of sale unless his debt had been in fact cleared off ; and that constitutes a request in law. If the £600 had been paid to the grantor and immediately handed to his creditors, the result would have been the same.

Now, once upon a time the question whether the consideration was truly stated was being argued in one of the Courts of this august building every day of the year, and a number of cases (the important ones) are reported in the quasi-official reports and others are reported in local newspapers, and altogether the number of cases reported runs to scores. There have been waves of feeling, one way and the other—sometimes the matter was regarded as one to be considered strictly and sometimes otherwise. But there is one case that has always been regarded with great respect in all the cases, and that is the case of Credit Company v. Pott (6 Q.B.D., 295). I do not wish to prolong this judgment, but it has been pointed out over and over again in these cases that, on the principle of lex neminem cogit ad vana seu impossibilia, if the legal effect of the transaction can be derived from the words used, one must not palter with small objections ; if the legal or business or commercial effect of the transaction is the same as that described, then the Courts will hold the consideration to be truly stated. In that case Lord Selborne used these words, citing a dictum of Lord Justice Mellish in Spargo's case (L.R., 8 Ch., 407) : "It is a general rule of law that in every case where a transaction resolves itself into paying money by A to B, and then handing it back by B to A, if the parties meet together and agree to set one demand against the other they need not go through the form and ceremony of handing the money backwards and forwards." In Credit Company v. Pott (supra) the words used were "in consideration of £7,350 now paid." I think that case (I need not refer to the other cases which have followed and been distinguished from it) decided that, if both sums are due, one can say "now paid" or "then paid," and the same applies just as much if the grantee hand a sum to a third person at the request of the grantor. It seems to me that that case is a cardinal and leading case on the subject, and that, therefore, this objection that the consideration was not truly stated fails. I may add that I do not doubt that one may find in other cases dicta which are inconsistent with my decision in this case, but those dicta must always be looked at with regard to the facts of the case in which the words were used, and that is the reason why they do not, and cannot, in my view, be held to override the main principle laid down in Credit Company v. Pott (supra).

Then a second objection was taken, which was dismissed by the County Court Judge, but that, to my mind, raises much more difficult considerations. The facts are these. Contemporaneously with and as part of the same bargain as this bill of sale, a second document was executed containing a clause relating to repayment of the principal, and this clause was not included in the bill of sale, which was simply made in the statutory form. That second document was a mortgage of certain other property as collateral security, and it contained this expression with regard to the consideration : "£1,600 paid by the mortgagee to the mortgagor . . . being the amount already advanced . . . on the security of a bill of sale" ; and also this clause : "The mortgagor hereby covenants with the mortgagee to pay to him . . . £1,600 with interest." There is the same date for payment of the principal as in the bill of sale ; the same amount of interest as in the bill of sale is fixed, and then comes this expression, which does not appear in the bill of sale : "And also (by way of separate covenant) so long after that date"—that is, after the due date of repayment of the principal—"as any principal money remains due under this mortgage to pay to [the grantee] interest thereon at the same rate." Then the covenant goes on to say "by equal quarterly payments on the 24th day of March, the 24th day of June, the 24th day of September, and the 24th day of December," and then occurs a clause which does not appear in the bill of sale : "It is hereby agreed and declared that (subject to the right of the mortgagee to require repayment of the said principal sum on the 24th day of December next)"—those are the opening words that govern the words which follow, "the principal money hereby secured shall be repaid," and then four usual quarter days are given, and the first payment is "to be made on the 24th September, 1926, and the aforesaid interest shall be payable on the balance of the principal money remaining owing on this security." Now it was argued before us that those words mean nothing—that as, according to the provisions of the deed, the principal was subject to be repaid on a certain date and interest was payable after that date on the whole as long as any part of the principal should be due, those words mean nothing at all because at any moment the grantee could say, "No, I will not have your instalments." I think that the contention is correctly expressed by stating that the grantee could always say, "No, I will not have them. I have a greater right, and I am not going to take them," and the result is that there remains only the provision, "If I allow you, you may repay by certain specified instalments." It was argued on behalf of the claimants that such a provision meant nothing. I am unable to see that it means nothing. I think it was part (of very small and very little value, but still a part) of the bargain, and the effect of it was a provision : "If I, the grantee, should not after a certain date require the full payment, then there are certain specified instalments which I can sue for as separate debts at my own option instead of being obliged, if I want to realize, to sue personally for the whole principal." It gives the grantee a right, at his option, to sue for a separate part of the principal in personam—for a portion of the debt—a right which he would not have had under the bill of sale alone ; but I think that is the only right which it gives.

It was argued on behalf of the appellants that by reason of an extended right of redemption which could be determined, the words in the bill of sale, that the grantee could not seize except for breaches of section 7 of the Act of 1882, were altered and that there was in the mortgage deed something which altered the effect of the right to seize under the bill of sale. If I had felt no doubt that these words come under what is called the "defeasance, condition, or declaration of trust" clause, the position might be different ; but I am unable to see that they in any way defeated or affected the right of the grantor to redeem on payment of the sum described in the bill of sale and according to its terms. I therefore am of opinion, on the construction of this document, the mortgage, as distinct from the bill of sale, that it gave a particular personal covenant and did not in any way affect the title either of the grantor or of the grantee to the goods—that it did not impair the grantee's right to seize or the grantor's right to redeem.

That being so, we have to consider this question which was argued, and which, to my mind, is a very difficult question—Do those provisions avoid the bill of sale under section 10 (3) of the Act of 1878 on the ground that the bill of sale was in fact given subject to a defeasance, condition, or declaration of trust not contained in the body thereof ? In my view they do not, and those words are not a defeasance, nor a condition, nor a declaration of trust.

We were pressed very strongly with the case of Edwards v. Marcus (10 The Times L.R., 255 ; [1894] 1 Q.B., 587). It was contended that we were bound, in consequence of that decision, to hold that all previous decisions had been overruled ; and that the notion that the defeasance must be one only in the interests of the grantor was disposed of, and that, in considering whether a term of the bargain amounts to a defeasance or condition within the section, it makes no difference whether it is in favour of the grantor or of the grantee. Now, to my mind, that entirely depends on this consideration : Do the words "defeasance or condition" mean the defeating of certain rights ? I think it is clear that in this clause there is nothing defeating the rights of either the grantor or the grantee as expressed in the bill of sale. It is obvious that there is no declaration of trust. Is there any condition ? To my mind, the decision in this case depends on the narrow question : Does "condition" in a bill of sale mean any term of the bargain entered into between the grantor and the grantee—any personal term entered into on the same date—or does it mean something really affecting the title of one or the other to the goods under the bill of sale ? Now, a case with regard to this point (I need not mention all the cases) is the original decision of Lord Justice James in Ex parte Collins—In re Lees (L.R., 10 Ch., 367), which was overruled and set aside in Edwards v. Marcus (supra). Lord Justice James, in considering what was the meaning of the words "defeasance or condition," said this : "The question is whether the non-registration of the memorandum avoided the whole transaction. The Act, after providing that every bill of sale shall be registered, has in its second section this provision," which he read. "The question, then, is whether this memorandum is a defeasance, condition, or declaration of trust subject to which the bill of sale was made or given. It certainly is not a defeasance, nor is it a declaration of trust. Is it then a condition either in the technical or ordinary sense of the word ? Conditions may be either precedent, subsequent, or inherent. A condition is precedent where, unless it is complied with, the estate does not arise ; it is subsequent where, if it is broken, the estate is defeated ; it is inherent where the estate is qualified, restrained, or charged by it ; in every case it denotes something which prejudicially affects the interest of the donee." Lord Justice James proceeded to say that he was of opinion that the rights of the grantee were not affected by the memorandum being unregistered. When that matter was considered and discussed in Edwards v. Marcus (supra), the portion of the earlier judgment dissented from was the expression "something which prejudicially affects the interest of the donee." In the judgments in Edwards v. Marcus (supra), I find words which are consistent with the interpretation of the word "condition" as meaning something affecting the title to the goods, or the right to seize them, on the one side or the other. Lord Justice Lindley, as he then was, decided in that case that the term of the bargain which had not been put into the bill of sale was something which imposed a fresh burden upon the donor, as it undoubtedly did, and therefore it obviously would be, and must be, a condition, and he uses these words (10 The Times L.R., 255 ; [1894] 1 Q.B., at p. 592) : "Any condition, whether it is prejudicial to one party or to the other, seems to be within the mischief struck at, and that was the view taken by the Court in Counsell v. London and Westminster Loan and Discount Company (19 Q.B.D., 512). Ex parte Collins (supra) was not cited in that case, but when you see that the document"—in Ex parte Collins (supra)—"was not a condition"—and the document in the Collins case (supra) was something very much like the document here—"and would not affect the title of the donee, that case does not conflict in any way with the later case." Then Lord Justice Lindley, in stating the ground of his judgment, goes on : "The title of the grantors is most prejudicially affected, because the grantee can hold these chattels until he is paid his principal and compound interest. Therefore I think the case is brought within the section." He then goes on to say : "Looking at the matter as men of business, the result is that you cannot split the bargain"—but he continues—"and put into the bill of sale what is allowed by the statute, and what is not allowed into the contemporaneous mortgage." Now there is in this contemporaneous mortgage nothing which could not have been put into the bill of sale. It would not have offended, in my view, against the provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts. The other judgments I will not go through, but they are to the effect that the whole bargain must be set out in the body of the bill. To my mind, if and wherever those words are used, the proper meaning to put upon them is that where there is an agreement affecting either the right of the grantor to redeem or of the grantee to seize, that causes the bill of sale to be given subject to a condition within the meaning of the section.

Now, I have only this to add, that that disposes of the two points in this action adversely to the appellants. But I desire to say that the learned Judge in the Court below gave his decision in reference to a judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham in the case of In re Leber (52 Sol. Jo., 483). In my view he was right, and although I cannot fully understand the meagre report of that case, it is quite clear that Mr. Justice Bigham in that case was considering something which did affect the personal rights of one of the parties to the bill of sale. There there was a contemporaneous mortgage under which the grantor undertook to keep the premises in repair and therefore became pecuniarily responsible if he did not do so, and that was part of the bargain; and Mr. Justice Bigham said that that had nothing to do with the bill of sale. That statement perhaps does not help one very much, but at any rate it shows that he did take the view that something which had nothing to do with the mortgage of the chattels was not a condition within the meaning of section 10. For these reasons (and I have given them not without very great doubt) I am of opinion this appeal must be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE FINLAY.—I agree with my Lord in everything; I agree with him in the tribute that he paid to counsel, and without in the least depreciating the arguments that we heard from the front row yesterday, I may perhaps be allowed to say that I personally have been assisted by the singularly able arguments presented from the back row this morning—by Mr. Lustgarten and Mr. Jolly. I agree also with my Lord in regard to the doubt and difficulty on one point in the case. With regard to the first point, that is, the statement of the consideration, I can add nothing, and I desire to add nothing, to what my Lord has said. I think there is no substance in the objection taken and I think the authority of Credit Company v. Pott (6 Q.B.D., 295) completely meets that point. I, like my Lord, feel very great difficulty on the second point, and, indeed, my view has fluctuated about it more than once during the argument. I do not desire to review the cases—that has been done quite sufficiently. All that I desire to say is this, that I think the truth of the matter is that there was here an additional term of the bargain, in this sense and in this sense only, that there was a collateral contract whereby a term having some operation (though not, I think, a very important operation) was introduced, but there was no variation and no alteration of the terms of the bill of sale, nor any addition to those terms, if by that is meant something which affected either the rights or the liabilities of the parties to the bill of sale. Those rights and liabilities under the bill of sale are, as I conceive, exactly what they would have been if this contemporary document had not been entered into. None of the rights or liabilities under the bill of sale is in any way affected and, in my view, both on principle, so far as there can be said to be any principle on a subject of this kind, and on a general survey of the authorities, the better view appears to me to be that the bill of sale in these circumstances is not made or given subject to any defeasance or condition. My Lord has dealt so fully with the authorities that I do not desire to add anything with regard to them.

On that short ground (though I fully share the doubts that have been expressed) I am, on the whole, of opinion on this point also that the conclusion arrived at by the learned County Court Judge was sound, and I, therefore, agree that this appeal fails.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Sargant and Lawrence, L.JJ.)
1927. Nov. 29.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BELILIOS.*

Revenue — Estate duty — Succession duty—Foreign disposition—Settlement of property situate in Hong-kong by testator domiciled there—Appointment of English trustees of settlement—Applications to English Courts by trustees—Trust funds abroad—No direction in disposition to establish trust in England—Original succession not changed—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict., c. 51), s. 2—Finance Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., c. 30), s. 2 (2).

Under the will made in English form of a testator domiciled in Hong-kong his residuary property, which mainly consisted of investments in local companies and real estate in Hong-kong, was left, subject to an annuity to his widow, upon trust for his son for life, with remainder to the son's two infant children. The testator died in 1905. The tenant for life desiring to borrow money, the lenders insisted on English trustees being appointed, and by a deed of appointment made in 1911 he appointed English trustees of the settlement along with himself. Later, it having been discovered that the tenant for life, while sole trustee, had drawn upon the capital of the trust funds, various applications were made, against his wish, to the English Court in the Chancery Division for directions regarding the administration of the trust, and orders were made thereon, and his sons were made wards of Court. The trust property remained in Hong-kong. The tenant for life died in 1922. The Crown having claimed succession and estate duty upon the property, Rowlatt, J., held under section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, that a trust was established in this country as a result of a foreign disposition, and therefore estate duty was payable, although the trust was not so established here as a result of any directions in the disposition, but that no succession duty was payable, as section 24 of the Finance Act, 1925, was not retrospective. On appeal, as to estate duty,

Held, that the succession was originally a foreign succession, having been established by the death of the testator abroad in 1905, and that it could not be changed into an English succession or settlement by any acts of the successors not amounting to an entirely new disposition, and that as there was no direction in the testator's will directing that any trust should be established in England, it remained a succession under the laws of Hong-kong, and the property was not liable to estate duty.

* Reported by H. LANGFORD LEWIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Statement of Lord Cranworth in Wallace v. Attorney-General (L.R., 1 Ch., 1) applied.

Attorney-General v. Campbell (L.R., 5 H.L., 524) and Attorney-General v. Jewish Colonization Association (17 The Times L.R., 106 ; [1901] 1 K.B., 123) distinguished.

Dictum of Bacon, V.-C., in Thompson v. Birch ([1876] W.N., 177) overruled.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 669) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 669) on an information filed by the Attorney-General against Vera Carlotta Belilios, Richard Owen Roberts, and Edward Elvy Robb, asking for a declaration that upon the death of Raphael Emanuel Belilios, who died domiciled in Hong-kong in 1905, succession duty and estate duty became payable on the residuary estate of the testator, wherever situate, other than the amount required for the payment of the annuity bequeathed to his widow, together with interest thereon at 4 per cent.

The facts are fully set out in the report of the proceedings below and are shortly restated in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt held that at the date of the death of the tenant for life in 1922 there was a trust established in this country as a result of a foreign disposition, the appointment of English trustees, and applications by these trustees to the Chancery Division upon which orders were made, and that, therefore, estate duty became payable on the trust property under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and the Finance Act, 1894, but that succession duty was not payable.

The defendants appealed, but there was no cross-appeal on the question of succession duty.

Mr. F. H. Maugham, K.C., Mr. A. M. Latter, K.C., and Mr. J. D. Israel appeared for the appellants ; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. M. J. L. Beebee appeared for the Crown.

At the conclusion of the arguments, the Court took time for consideration.

The Master of the Rolls.—This is an appeal from Mr. Justice Rowlatt, who, on June 17, 1927, gave judgment upon this information in favour of the Crown.

The relevant facts are few and not disputed. The testator, Emanuel Raphael Belilios, late of Victoria in the colony of Hong-kong, made his will dated October 1, 1883. By it, after making provision for his wife, he left his property, which included both real and personal property in Hong-kong, to his son for life, and then to his children. The information states that the testator declared that the will, so far as the case admitted, with an exception hereinafter mentioned, was to take effect according to the law of Hong-kong.

The testator died domiciled in that colony on November 11, 1905, and probate of his will with two codicils was granted there to his son on May 15, 1906. The son, Raphael Emanuel Belilios, who was domiciled at Hong-kong, died on October 17, 1922, in the United Kingdom. At his death the beneficial interest in the estate of which he had been tenant for life passed under the dispositions of the testator to the two infant sons of Raphael Emanuel Belilios. That estate consisted of, (a) some £1,300 in a bank in the United Kingdom, (b) shares in Hong-kong companies which realized £66,246 15s. 7d., and also some other shares, (c) some immovable property situate in the colony of Hong-kong.

Between the deaths of the testator and of his son a number of applications had been made to the Chancery Courts here, and new trustees, domiciled and resident in the United Kingdom, had been appointed. No question arises as to the property in the United Kingdom which passes under the testator's will ; but the appellants contend that the Crown is not entitled to be paid succession duty, on the death of the son in 1922, in respect of what may be called the Hong-kong property. Probate duty amounting to £7,634 was paid on that in the colony. The Crown contends that succession duty under section 2 of the Act of 1853 and likewise estate duty—which they admit rests on the same footing—is payable upon all the property passing on the death of the son in 1922, on the ground that "At the date of the death of the said Raphael Emanuel Belilios the will of the said testator was for the purposes of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, an English settlement in that the trust funds and property, although for the most part situate abroad, were vested in trustees who were all resident within the United Kingdom and subject to the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice, whose wards the said infants had become and then were by virtue of the orders hereinbefore referred to."

The question, therefore, to be decided is whether what was undoubtedly, so to speak, a foreign settlement in 1905 has now become a settlement subject to succession duty. For the appellants it is argued that the wide words of section 2 which would in their terms cover any property wherever situate—even belonging to a non-resident foreigner—must be governed by some limitation, and that it is limited to the succession to property of those who become entitled to it by the laws of this country.

The Attorney-General, contra, argues that a disposition—even if originally foreign—may come within the Act if there are British elements attached to or concerning it, so that British law is invoked, as was done in the present case. When a British forum is involved, and its aid invited, he claims that that gives a different effect to the disposition, which may and ought in the present case to be held to fall within the section.

The section opens with the words : "Every past or future disposition of property . . . and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property or the income thereof." Lord Cranworth had to consider these wide words in Wallace v. Attorney-General (L.R., 1 Ch., 1). At page 7 he rejects the suggestion that, where a person domiciled abroad makes a will giving personal property in this country by way of legacy, the legatee is a person becoming entitled within section 2 ; and he states his opinion : "I think that in order to be brought within that section, he must be a person who becomes entitled by virtue of the laws of this country."

These words appear to me to be supported, and not challenged by, or mistrusted in, the judgment of Lord Westbury in Attorney-General v. Campbell (L.R., 5 H.L., 524, at pp. 530 and 531). Lord Westbury does not doubt Lord Cranworth's decision, for he points out the "extraordinary conclusion" that was contended for, namely, that under the will of a man dying domiciled abroad the first legatee, though not liable to legacy duty, became liable to succession duty under the Act. Then he deals with the case before him, in which under the direction of the terms of the will a trust in this country had been created, and he pointed out that the character of the ownership was determined under the trusts directed to be created by the will.

The reasoning of the Master of the Rolls in In re Cigala's Settlement Trusts (7 Ch.D., 351) does not, in my judgment, run contrary to the above decisions. Applying the tests used by Sir George Jessel to the present case, the settlement in the present case is the testator's will, a settlement by and upon persons, who were foreigners to the law of this country of property which was situate in Hong-kong. If so, it remains a Hong-kong settlement and succession. "I am unable to find in the Act any warrant for the view that a succession once created can, by the act of the successor, cease to exist and another succession be substituted for it," said Lord Herschell in Lord Wolverton v. Attorney-General (14 The Times L.R., 519 ; [1898] A.C., 535, at p. 548) ; unless, however, by a direction such as was found in Attorney-Gencral v. Campbell (supra) there was a trust created subject to a different jurisdiction. The words of Lord Cranworth are accepted in the judgment in Harding v. Commissioners of Stamps for Queensland (14 The Times L.R., 488 ; [1898] A.C., 769, at p. 774). That judgment includes the great authority of Lord Watson and Lord Davey.

Finally, Lord Macnaghten, giving the judgment of Lords Halsbury, Davey, Robertson, and Lindley, as well as of himself, in Lambe v. Manuel (19 The Times L.R., 68 ; [1903] A.C., 68), repeats the approval of the case of Wallace v. Attorney-General (supra). It is also, I think, clear that the date when the character of the succession becomes attached to it is at the moment when the succession is conferred : "The date of the entitlement" as Lord Cave calls it in Lord Advocate v. Macalister (40 The Times L.R., 564 ; [1924] A.C., 586, at p. 591).

It seems, therefore, that 1905 is the dominant date to decide the nature of the settlement and of the succession. If so, this succession was foreign. What has happened to bring the succession or any trust relating to it within this jurisdiction ?

The facts of the present case do not bring it within the decision in Attorney-General v. Campbell (supra).

Lord Justice Stirling in his exhaustive review of the cases in Attorney-General v. Jewish Colonization Association (17 The Times L.R., 106 ; [1901] 1 K.B., 123) appears to hold that the question whether any property comes within the purview of section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case. He said : "Weighing all these circumstances as best I can, I think that there is nevertheless a preponderance in favour of the view that inasmuch as the settlement in question is an English settlement," &c.

The tests he applies are : (1) According to what law was the operative settlement made ? (2) Where was the legal control ? (3) What forum had cognizance of the trusts ?

Lord Justice Stirling does not suggest that the principle formulated by Lord Cranworth is incorrect, though he holds that his rule must be taken to be satisfied where property is found to be legally vested in a person subject to the jurisdiction of the English Courts, and the title to the beneficial interest in that property is regulated and capable of being enforced by the law of England ; see [1901] 1 K.B., at p. 142. These words must, I think, be estimated in relation to the facts of the case that he was considering, and not antagonistically to those of Lord Cranworth, in Wallace's case (supra), for he quotes the statement of the ratio decidendi of Attorney-General v. Campbell (supra), as given by Lord Westbury, which is not inconsistent with Lord Cranworth's proposition. I will not transcribe it : but the crucial part of it appears to be in the words : "The character of the ownership is no longer that of a legacy. The character of the ownership is under the trusts directed to be created by the will." See [1901] 1 K.B., p. 140.

Now in the present case there was no appropriation of any part of the property so as to make it English property, or to alter the character of the original disposition. The ownership passed in 1922 under the testator's will. The Hong-kong Courts would have had jurisdiction to secure that the disposition was effective to the successors on the son's death in 1922. It seems wrong to neglect this root of title, and to set aside the fundamental facts upon which the devolution of the property depends.

No doubt in the Jewish Colonization case (supra) there were strong facts to justify the decision, a deed in English form and language, to an English company with a registered office in London. The root of the disposition had been transplanted to London. But in the present case Hong-kong cannot be lost sight of. The preponderance lies in favour of the view that the settlement retained its original characteristics.

The case of In re Badart's Trusts (L.R., 10 Eq., 288) is an illustration of an appropriated sum which became liable to succession duty under the particular circumstances of the case, and it was distinguished from Wallace's case (supra).

There is, in my judgment, in the present case no such separation or other fact as involves the notional removal to this country of the property passing, or any part of it, in respect of which succession and estate duties are now claimed, and thus the conclusion must be reached that the duty is not payable. It is notable that in the case of Toronto General Trusts Corporation v. The King (35 The Times L.R., 450 ; [1919] A.C., at p. 685) the present Lord Chancellor treats the principle indicated by Lord Cranworth in Wallace's case (supra) as a test as to the limitation of the imposition of succession duty and adopts it.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt appears to have found himself bound by the case of Thompson v. Birch ([1876] W.N., 177) and quotes the words of Vice-Chancellor Bacon as to a fund established in this Court, "no matter by what means." I am not sure that I appreciate those words. But the authorities to which I have referred all strongly support the principle laid down by Lord Cranworth, and I cannot accept Thompson v. Birch (supra) if it does otherwise.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the claim of the Crown to these duties fails.

The appeal will be allowed with costs and the information discharged with costs.

Lord Justice Sargant.—The question under appeal here, namely, whether estate duty is payable on the general residuary estate of the testator, admittedly depends on whether succession duty would have been payable thereon under section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853. That section uses language of the widest character, sufficient on its bare terms to include a succession arising under any disposition British or foreign, and in respect of any property real or personal wherever situate. It would, for instance, include a succession under the will of a domiciled American to real estate in the City of New York. Some implied limitation must therefore be read into the words of the section for the purposes of reasonable construction. We have here to ascertain the extent of this implied limitation to see whether or not it prevents the application of the section to the succession now in question. There have, of course, been a good many decided cases in relation to the section, but none which is quite on all fours with the present case.

The succession in the present case is in relation to real estate in the colony of Hong-kong, and to personal property situate in the same colony, together representing the residuary trust estate of a testator who died domiciled in that colony in the year 1905. The will and two codicils of that testator gave this residuary estate upon trusts, in the events which happened, for the testator's son, Raphael Emanuel Belilios, during his life, and after his death upon trust for his two sons. The executors and trustees named in the will and codicils were four in number, namely, the testator's widow, the testator's son, and the respective managers for the time being in Hong-kong of two English banking companies ; but the only one of these four persons who actually proved the will and acted in the trusts thereof was the testator's son. The will was couched in terms familiar to English lawyers and, I should think, equally familiar to lawyers in Hong-kong. It was proved in Hong-kong, and on a subsequent appointment of trustees in the year 1911 by the testator's son he purported to act under the laws of that colony.

The testator's son, Raphael Emanuel Belilios, who remained domiciled in Hong-kong during the whole of his life, died on October 17, 1922, and it is on the occurrence of that event that duty is claimed to have become payable, on the ground that the beneficial interest then accruing to the two infant sons of the tenant for life constituted a succession within the meaning of section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853. This claim is resisted on the ground that this succession to property in Hong-kong under the laws of that colony did not on the testator's death constitute a succession within the meaning of the Act of 1853, and that nothing has since occurred sufficient to bring it within that Act.

The first case which defined the extent of the limitation which must undoubtedly be placed on section 2 of the Act of 1853 is that of Wallace v. Attorney-General (L.R., 1 Ch., 1). There the Lord Chancellor, Lord Cranworth, said that in order to come within the section the successor must become entitled by virtue of the laws of this country. It is argued for the Crown that subsequent decisions show that this limitation was too broad ; and it is no doubt the case that in subsequent judgments the test adopted by Lord Cranworth has not been always applied in the precise terms employed by him. But I do not think that his language has ever been disapproved or, indeed, adversely criticized. And, in the cases in which the Courts have since had to consider whether the documents in question created a taxable succession, I think that the various indications on which they have relied have almost always been indications as to the law under which the succession arises, and that the question so often put as to whether the documents form an English settlement is substantially the same as Lord Cranworth's test. And, further, it is to be noted that the test suggested in Wallace v. Attorney-General (supra) has been adopted in two comparatively recent cases of high authority, Winans v. The King (26 The Times L.R., 133 ; [1910] A.C., 27), Toronto General Trusts Corporation v. The King (35 The Times L.R., 450 ; [1919] A.C., 679).

It has, indeed, been argued for the Crown that the important case of Attorney-General v. Campbell (L.R., 5 H.L., 524) shook the general authority of Wallace v. Attorney-General (supra) and has shown that a succession originating under foreign law—in that case Portuguese law—may be taxable under the Act of 1853. But, in my judgment, the case when carefully examined does not conflict at all with Lord Cranworth's judgment. In Attorney-General v. Campbell (supra) the trust in question was not constituted by the Portuguese will itself, but was a trust created under English law, though by virtue of a direction in a Portuguese will that it should be so constituted. The distinction lies in the difference between executory and executed dispositions. The dispositions in the Portuguese will as to the annuity fund in question were purely executory ; they would naturally, in the first instance, be construed under that law, and no doubt were valid under that law since they were in fact carried out. But they were so carried out in accordance with their precise terms by the constitution of a new and separate English trust. And it was in relation to the succession created by this English trust that the question of duty arose. In my view the language both of Lord Hatherley and of Lord Westbury, in allowing the claim for succession duty, shows that this was the ratio decidendi.

The same considerations seem to me to account for the decision in Attorney-General v. Jewish Colonization Association (17 The Times L.R., 106 ; [1901] 1 K.B., 123). Neither in this case nor in Attorney-General v. Campbell (supra) would it be necessary, as the learned Judge suggests, for the Court to apply foreign law for the purposes of administration. In each case there is found a duly constituted English trust to be administered as such, though the origin of the constitution of the trust has been foreign.

In In re Cigala's Settlement Trusts (7 Ch.D., 351) an English lady on her marriage with an Italian gentleman settled both English and Italian property by a settlement in English form and with English trustees. This was held to create a taxable succession. The decision entirely satisfied Lord Cranworth's test. The successor obviously became entitled under English law to the beneficial interest devolving on him in either class of property. In Attorney-General v. Johnson ([1907] 2 K.B., 885) the succession held taxable was in property in Assam remaining unsold, but the succession was created by an English will devising the property to English trustees upon trust to sell and hold for beneficiaries here. The law creating and governing the trust was English.

In re Smith's Trusts (12 W.R., 933) was, it seems, concerned with a resettlement effected by the whole of the beneficiaries under an original settlement. A succession under this resettlement was held taxable. The case is obviously analogous to that of Attorney-General v. Campbell (supra). The effective document was the resettlement.

In the present case Mr. Justice Rowlatt has felt the force of the taxpayer's contention that the decision in Attorney-General v. Campbell (supra) depended on the fact of a new trust having been created in this country under English law ; but he has held himself precluded from adopting this view by what he describes as a ruling of Vice-Chancellor Bacon in a case of Thompson v. Birch ([1876] W.N., 177), also stated in Hanson on Death Duties, 7th Edition, page 393. But, when this case is examined, it appears that the Vice-Chancellor's remarks were not in the nature of a decision (his decision was on a different point, and was subsequently reversed, see [1876] W.N., 278), but was merely an obiter expression of opinion as to what duty would become payable on a future event. I think that Mr. Justice Rowlatt attached too much importance to this dictum even in relation to its effect in a Court of first instance ; in this Court, at any rate, it is open to review ; and it is, in my opinion, contrary to the general line of authority on this subject and is wrong.

It is important to observe that under the Act of 1853 a succession is constituted, if at all, immediately on the death of the testator, and not on the death of the tenant for life, or other limited owner, on whose death the successor becomes entitled in possession ; and the succession duty attaches immediately on the earlier event, and is merely postponed as to payment till the later event. The consequence is that the ultimate incidence of the tax cannot be avoided by any intermediate dealing. It has, however, been contended on behalf of the Crown that the converse does not follow ; and that, although in this case this Hong-kong will by a Hong-kong testator of Hong-kong property may not have created on his death a taxable succession in the hands of his two grandsons, it does not follow that intermediate events between the death of the testator and that of the tenant for life may not have rendered this succession a taxable one under the Act, even although during the whole period the two grandsons may have been infants.

Assuming, though without deciding, that such a result may be possible, what are the events on which the Crown relies as effecting this change ? They are set out in the information and are of two kinds. First, there is the indenture of May 4, 1911, under which the sole acting trustee and tenant for life, Raphael Emanuel Belilios, appointed as trustees in his stead four new trustees all resident in England. And, secondly, there are a number of orders made in the Chancery Division in this country on successive applications by the continuing trustees of the testator's will, by which certain proposed arrangements were approved in relation to the execution of the trusts of the will.

As regards the first point, I cannot think that a change in the personnel of the trustees of the will, effected as it was under the Hong-kong law, and in the necessary absence of any consent on the part of the infants, can have any effect in changing the nature or incidents of their succession, though the result was that for some time all the trustees were resident in this country, and that after a subsequent appointment, in which Raphael Emanuel Belilios resumed his character of trustee, the majority of the trustees were so resident.

As regards the second point, not only was no general order ever made here for the administration of the trusts of the will, a step which the Chancery Division here would, I think, have felt great difficulty in making, having regard to the local situation of the trust and the great bulk of the trust property, but the orders that were made went little, if at all, beyond the giving of advice to trustees here as to the steps it would be reasonable for them to take in the carrying out of a colonial trust constituted on lines similar to well-known forms of trust in this country. Indeed, I doubt whether, strictly speaking, the Chancery Division here could make orders, as to execution of the trusts of the testator's will, which would have the same binding effect in the colony of Hong-kong as orders to the like effect made here ; though the orders here would no doubt have a great practical effect should the bona fides of the trustees, or the propriety of their conduct, ever be questioned in proceedings in the Courts of Hong-kong. And, further, the infancy of the two grandsons until after the death of their father, Raphael Emanuel Belilios, negatives any suggestion of a consent on their part to a change in the character of their succession as a consequence of these proceedings. Mr. Beebee, who specially relied for the Crown on the change that had been effected, was asked to lay his finger on the particular transaction from which, and the particular point of time at which, the crucial change in the infants' succession occurred. The best answer he could give was to point to the indenture of appointment of May 4, 1911. There was no single one of the orders made by the Court which he was able to indicate as being conclusive for his purpose.

In my judgment the succession of the infants to the testator's residue was at the testator's death a succession by virtue of colonial law and to colonial property, and has never lost that character or fallen within section 2 of the Act of 1853. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed, with costs here and below.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—On this appeal the appellants rely upon the test laid down by Lord Cranworth in Wallace v. Attorney-General (L.R., 1 Ch., 1) as to the limitation on the imposition of succession duty under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and maintain that they are not accountable for any duty under that Act on the ground that the infant beneficiaries do not claim title by virtue of the laws of this country.

The Attorney-General did not challenge the general correctness of the test laid down by Lord Cranworth, which, in my judgment, must be treated as firmly established (see, amongst other cases, Lambe v. Manuel (19 The Times L.R., 68 ; [1903] A.C., 68) and Toronto General Trusts Corporation v. The King (35 The Times L.R., 450 ; [1919] A.C., 679)), but he strenuously denied that, in the special circumstances of this case, the application of that test, when correctly interpreted, led to the result contended for by the appellants.

The disposition which is alleged to have conferred a succession within the meaning of section 2 of the Act is the will of a testator who died domiciled in the colony of Hong-kong in the year 1905 possessed of movable and immovable property locally situate in that colony. It is not suggested that this will, when it first became operative on the death of the testator, constituted a disposition conferring a succession within the meaning of the section as interpreted by Lord Cranworth, but the Attorney-General contended that, by reason of certain events which had happened before the death of the tenant for life in the year 1922, it had been brought within the section and had become what has conveniently been called an " English settlement," that is to say, a disposition conferring a succession within the Act.

The case made for the Crown was that the crucial date when to ascertain whether the will was an English settlement or not was the death of the tenant for life, at which date it was alleged by the Crown that the facts were as follows : The trustees, in whom the legal title to the trust property was vested, were resident in England ; the English Courts had exercised jurisdiction in matters relating to the execution of the trusts of the will, in particular by giving directions as to the realization of the trust property ; the interests taken by the infant beneficiaries under the will were English choses in action ; and the infant beneficiaries were wards of an English Court.

The case so made raises, first, the broad question whether a disposition, outside the Act when made, can by the subsequent manipulation of the parties interested under it be brought within the Act and, secondly, if that question be answered in the affirmative the further question whether the events relied upon by the Crown have had the effect of bringing the present will within the Act.

Section 2 of the Act, so far as material, provides that every disposition by reason whereof a person becomes beneficially entitled to any property upon the death of any person, whether immediately or after an interval, either certainly or contingently and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, is deemed to confer on the person becoming entitled by reason of such disposition a "succession" and the term "successor" denotes the person so entitled and the term "predecessor" denotes the testator or other person from whom the interest of the successor is derived; section 10 imposes the duty on every such "succession"; section 20 makes the duty payable on the "successor" becoming entitled in possession to the "succession"; and section 42 makes the duty a first charge on the "succession." The provisions of these sections make it clear that a succession within the Act is established once and for all at the moment of time when the disposition is made and first becomes operative; at that moment the succession is deemed to be conferred on the successors and from that moment the duty is imposed and the charge attaches. That this is the true effect of the Act is well established and not open to doubt (see per Lord Herschell in Lord Wolverton v. Attorney-General (14 The Times L.R., 519; [1898] A.C., 535, at p. 548) and per Viscount Cave in Lord Advocate v. Macalister (40 The Times L.R., 564; [1924] A.C., 586, at p. 591)).

According to the scheme of the Act it would seem that the only date for ascertaining whether a disposition conferring a succession within the Act has been effected is the date when the disposition is made.

It is also well settled that when a succession within the Act has once been established no manipulation of the parties afterwards can get rid of it, and if authority be needed for that proposition it is to be found in the emphatic statement to that effect made by Lord Halsbury in the case of Duke of Northumberland v. Attorney-General (21 The Times L.R., 639; [1905] A.C., 406, at p. 409). Mr. Maugham, with great force and much reason, contended that the corollary to that proposition is that where a disposition does not establish a succession within the Act when it is made, no manipulation of the parties afterwards (short of acts amounting to the creation of a new disposition) can establish such a succession.

The Crown, whilst not disputing that a succession once established cannot be got rid of by the parties, contended that the converse does not hold good, and further that Lord Cranworth's test, when interpreted in light of the subsequent decisions, cannot be taken as having laid down the broad principle contended for by Mr. Maugham. In my opinion the authorities relied upon by counsel for the Crown do not support their contentions, nor do any of the authorities cited qualify or shake the test laid down by Lord Cranworth. The relevant cases have been fully dealt with in the judgments of the other members of this Court. I will therefore content myself with stating shortly the reasons why in my opinion those most strongly relied upon do not establish the contentions of the Crown or govern the decision in the present case.

Attorney-General v. Campbell (L.R., 5 H.L., 524) and Attorney-General v. Jewish Colonization Association (17 The Times L.R., 106; [1901] 1 K.B., 123) are cases where trusts were established in England by, or by the direction of, persons domiciled abroad, which trusts when established in this country constituted English settlements from the time of such establishment and consequently came within the Act. As in each of these cases the trust derived its origin from the directions given by a person domiciled abroad, the validity of the directions so given no doubt depended upon the law of the domicil of the person giving them, but that fact did not prevent the establishment of the trust in England, when actually effected, from being held to constitute an English settlement, under which the beneficiaries claimed title by virtue of the laws of England. In re Cigala's Settlement Trusts (7 Ch.D., 351) and Attorney-General v. Johnson ([1907] 2 K.B., 885) are cases where the trusts were established by persons domiciled in England and were English settlements from the moment when they were made, therefore constituting dispositions under which the beneficiaries claimed title by virtue of the laws of England.

In none of the cases which I have mentioned so far was there any question, such as has arisen here, of a trust effectively established abroad, and therefore not constituting an English settlement when first established, having subsequently been brought within the Act by the manipulation of the parties interested under it.

The two cases next referred to are nearer the present case. In re Smith's Trusts (12 W.R., 933) was a case where all the parties entitled under a will of a testator domiciled abroad executed a deed in England appointing new trustees and declaring trusts of the fund (which apparently had been brought to England) identical with the trusts of the will, and Vice-Chancellor Stuart held that succession duty was payable. The reasons for the decision of the learned Vice-Chancellor are not reported, but I think that that case must have been decided on the ground that the beneficiaries claimed title, not under the will, but under the English deed, and consequently that the latter constituted a disposition conferring a succession within the Act. If the beneficiaries were treated as claiming title under the will, the decision is, in my opinion, inconsistent with Lord Cranworth's test and must be treated as overruled by Wallace's case (supra).

Thompson v. Birch ([1876] W.N., 177 and 278: Hanson, 7th Edition, p. 393) contains a dictum by Vice-Chancellor Bacon which was relied upon by Mr. Justice Rowlatt and has been much relied upon by counsel for the Crown in this Court. In that case the main point was whether the testator was domiciled in America or in the United Kingdom. The testator there had appointed English trustees and his American executors had remitted the proceeds of the testator's property (consisting of American shares) to the English trustees, who had paid such proceeds into Court in an action commenced in England by the infant beneficiary to secure the trust fund. The learned Vice-Chancellor decided that the testator was domiciled in America, and in the course of his judgment expressed the opinion that succession duty would become payable on the death of an annuitant, who was then still alive, on the ground that the fund was "a fund established in this Court, no matter by what means." The learned Vice-Chancellor seems to have based his opinion on Campbell's case (supra), stating that he did not understand that case to depend on the fact that the testator there had directed an English trust to be established. With the greatest respect to the learned Vice-Chancellor I think he was wrong if he meant that the mere fact of payment into Court of a settled fund, whatever might be the trusts affecting it and the circumstances under which it was paid in, would attract succession duty. Such a proposition seems to me to be too wide and inconsistent with Lord Cranworth's test. Moreover, I think the learned Vice-Chancellor took an erroneous view of the decision in Campbell's case (supra), which, in my opinion, was based on the fact that the testator there had directed an English trust to be established. In any event the opinion of the learned Judge does not apply to the facts of the present case, as here no fund was ever established in an English Court.

Before leaving the authorities I would only add that I know of no case which supports the proposition that a will of a testator domiciled abroad effectively establishing a trust in respect of property locally situate in the country of his domicil has become an English settlement because at the date of the death of the tenant for life the trustees and beneficiaries happen to be residing in England and because the former had sought the protection of the English Courts in certain administrative acts and the latter had been made wards of an English Court. Such a proposition has at least the merit of novelty.

I now revert to the facts of the present case. Counsel for the Crown shrank from pointing to any particular act or event as having caused the will to become an English settlement, though Mr. Beebee, when pressed by the Court, seemed inclined to rely most strongly on the appointment of the English trustees in 1911 as being the crucial event. The main contentions of the Crown were, first that, as the language of section 2 was wide enough to cover a disposition of property situate abroad made by a person domiciled abroad, the onus lay on the appellants to prove that the present will did not fall within it, and secondly, if that were not the right view, that it was sufficient for the Crown to point to the facts existing at the date of the death of the tenant for life as showing that at that date the will was an English settlement and that it was not the concern of the Crown to prove how and when the will had first become an English settlement.

As to the first of these contentions, I think that it is ill-founded. As it is obvious that some limitation to the very wide words in the section must be implied, the duty of the Court is first to satisfy itself as a matter of construction what the true limitation to be implied is and then to ascertain whether the case has been brought within the section according to its true construction. Lord Cranworth's test shows the proper limitation to be implied, and according to that test the present will, when first it became operative, clearly did not fall within the section; therefore it rests on the Crown to prove that the will was subsequently brought under its provisions.

As to the second of these contentions, it is obvious that in order that the Court should be in a position to appreciate the true state of affairs at the date of the death of the tenant for life it is incumbent upon the Crown to adduce evidence of the relevant events which had occurred before that date; proof of the allegation that the will had become an English settlement at a particular date, in my opinion, necessarily involves proof of how and when such alleged event had in fact happened. The death of the tenant for life does not, of course, confer any new succession on the infants and the date of that death has no effect whatever on the character of the settlement; it is only material from the Crown's point of view, because if the will had before that date become an English settlement the duty would then have become payable.

The question of onus, however, is not really material in this case, as all the relevant facts have been placed before the Court by one or other of the parties, and the Court is in a position to reach a definite conclusion on the whole of the facts.

In considering the facts relied upon by the Crown in support of the contention that the will had, before the death of the tenant for life, become an English settlement it is of the utmost importance to bear in mind that the trust property had not been realized by the trustees and remained locally situate in Hong-kong, and, further, that the ultimate beneficiaries were infants and therefore powerless to assent to or dissent from any of the acts of the tenant for life or of the trustees.

The appointment of new trustees in 1911 was effected in accordance with the laws of Hong-kong, where the appointor and consequently his wife and infant beneficiaries were and remained domiciled. The motive which induced the appointment does not seem to me to be in the least material. In my opinion neither the appointment by the appointor of his wife and of the three other persons who were resident in this country to act jointly with himself, nor his subsequent retirement from the trusteeship (followed later by his resumption of office), had the effect of causing the will to become an English settlement. The mere vesting in the trustees of the legal title to the property in Hong-kong did not operate to bring that property into this country. The trustees in order to execute the trusts of the will would have to seek the forum of the country where the testator was domiciled and the trust property was situate and they would have to execute the trusts according to the laws of that country. The infant beneficiaries would, notwithstanding the appointment of trustees, claim title solely by virtue of the laws of that country. Even if the English Courts by virtue of their jurisdiction in personam had power to execute the trusts of the will, which is open to serious doubt, such Courts would, in executing such trusts, have to apply the law of Hong-kong. If the trustees were to go abroad, the English Courts would have no power to allow service of a writ for the execution of the trusts of the will to be served upon them out of the jurisdiction, as such trusts are not trusts to be executed according to the law of England. (See Order XI., rule 1 (d).)

Further, I am clearly of opinion that the giving of directions by the English Courts at the instance of the trustees in matters affecting the trusts of the Hong-kong property did not have the effect of causing the will to become an English settlement. In giving those directions the Courts could only have acted in exercise of their jurisdiction in personam and must have had regard to the Hong-kong law. How far the directions of an English Court would operate to exonerate the trustees if the trusts ever came to be executed by a Hong-kong Court I need not pause to consider.

If the appointment of trustees resident in England did not operate to make the will an English settlement it follows, in my opinion, that the fact that the infants acquired a right of action in England against such trustees, which is the natural consequence of the appointment, did not have any such operation.

The right which the infants have thus acquired is a right to have the trusts of the testator's will executed in the country where the testator was domiciled and where the trust property is situate. Such a right cannot, in my opinion, be properly called an English chose in action, such as the right of the beneficiaries was held to be in Attorney-General v. Lord Sudeley (12 The Times L.R., 224 ; [1896] 1 Q.B., 354), affirmed in the House of Lords (13 The Times L.R., 38 ; [1897] A.C., 11). The foundation of the judgments of the majority of the members of the Court of Appeal and of all the learned Law Lords in that case was that the testator there was domiciled in England, where his will was proved and where his estate was being administered.

Lastly, I find a difficulty in appreciating how the fact that the infants were made wards of Court here can affect the question whether the will under which they take beneficial interests has or has not become an English settlement. Such wardship does not alter the law by virtue of which they claim title to their shares in the testator's estate or affect their rights in any way. It would indeed be startling if the fact of the infants having been made wards of Court were to operate to their detriment by imposing upon them and their shares a liability for succession duty from which they would otherwise be free. In my judgment it has no such effect.

In the result I have arrived at the clear conclusion that, on the assumption that it might have been possible by some means to have caused the will of the testator to have become an English settlement during the lifetime of the tenant for life, the manipulation of the parties which has in fact taken place in the present case has (in the absence of the realization of the Hong-kong property and of the transfer of the proceeds to this country) fallen short of having brought about that result.

Having reached this conclusion, it becomes unnecessary for me to express a final opinion upon the broader question whether a disposition outside the Act, when made, could by any subsequent manipulation of the parties (short of an act amounting to a new disposition, which in this case would be impracticable owing to the infancy of the beneficiaries), become a disposition within the Act, though, as at present advised, I think that Mr. Maugham is right in his contention that consistently with Lord Cranworth's test it could not.

I agree that the appeal succeeds, with the consequences indicated by the Master of the Rolls.

ARNOLD AND WEAVER v. AMARI.*

Husband and Wife—Divorce costs—Wife guilty of adultery—Defence of divorce proceedings—Employment of solicitors—Pledging husband's credit—No authority at common law.

At common law a wife who has been guilty of adultery has no authority to pledge her husband's credit by employing solicitors to defend divorce proceedings. Her solicitors, therefore, cannot proceed against the husband for their costs after the decree, unless they have obtained from the Divorce Court an order for costs or for security for costs.

In this action, which was heard before his Lordship on December 2, 1927, Messrs. Matthew Arnold and Weaver, solicitors, of Watford, sued Mr. Sebastiano Amari, restaurant proprietor, of South Kensington, for £61 17s. 6d., for work done and moneys expended as solicitors in connexion with divorce proceedings instituted by the husband against his wife, for whom they acted.

Mr. P. B. Morle appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Robert Fortune for the defendant.

His Lordship, in giving judgment, said that the defendant took proceedings against his wife for a divorce, alleging two acts of adultery with a boy of about the age of 16 years. In November, 1926, after the wife was threatened with proceedings, she consulted and retained the plaintiffs as her solicitors. They made full inquiry into the matter, satisfied themselves of her innocence, and obtained evidence on her behalf. On April 7, 1927, the plaintiffs received a copy of a letter, which the wife had written to the husband, saying that, for the sake of the child, she did not intend to defend the suit. At that time all the costs, with the exception of a few pounds, had been incurred.

The solicitors inquired of the wife why she wrote the letter, and she told them that she did not admit the adultery, but that her husband had urged her to give up the defence and had said that he would make provision for her. The solicitors thereupon continued the defence, and subsequently received from the wife a letter dated May 11. They attended on May 12, the day of the hearing, with counsel, on behalf of the wife, and expected to find her there, but she failed to appear. As a consequence the suit was undefended. The petitioner and co-respondent were called and satisfied the President of the adultery, and he pronounced in favour of the husband. The wife's counsel applied for costs, but, unfortunately, owing to an error of the London agents, no security had been obtained from the husband for the wife's costs, and the President refused to grant costs, saying that he would leave the wife's solicitors to their remedy, if any, at common law.

The present action was then brought against the husband to recover the costs on the ground that the wife had his authority to incur them.

Two points were taken by the defendant—(1) that the plaintiffs must have known, or ought to have known, that the wife was not an innocent party ; and (2) that in law the action was not maintainable. As to (1), he (his Lordship) was in favour of the plaintiffs. He found that the plaintiffs did not know that the wife had committed adultery, that they were in no way negligent, and that they honestly believed the wife was innocent and that she would be successful in her defence. They attended on the day of hearing, and were surprised not to find her there. They had conducted the litigation properly, had fairly investigated the charges, and had a reasonable foundation for the defence.

The second point therefore emerged—could a wife in those circumstances bind her husband to pay her solicitors' costs of divorce proceedings in which a divorce was granted against her ? It was conceded that she committed adultery with the boy before she instructed the plaintiffs.

The case of Durnford v. Baker (40 The Times L.R., 757 ; [1924] 2 K.B., 587) decided that a solicitor who appeared in a suit begun by the wife could not recover costs incurred on her behalf against her husband. But the present point—that was, where a wife was respondent—was expressly left open by the Court of Appeal. The question was really one of the law of agency. It might be stated in general terms that a wife living with her husband bound him by a contract made for necessaries, whereas a wife who was living apart from her husband and who had committed adultery did not bind him. But could a wife bind her husband so as to make him liable for the costs of a solicitor whom she employed to defend her against proceedings taken by her husband for a divorce on the ground of her adultery where the adultery had admittedly been committed? The solicitor was not left unprotected or at risk, because he could always apply to the Divorce Court for security for costs. Indeed, the case of Franklin v. Franklin (37 The Times L.R., 894; [1921] P., 407) showed that the Divorce Court would grant costs where the amount secured was not sufficient to meet the sum expended. That, however, was a jurisdiction peculiar to the Court and did not alter the rights, whatever they might be, at common law.

* Reported by G. G. Beagley, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question remained—could the present solicitors, under the present facts, get judgment for their costs against the husband? The point was left open in Durnford v. Baker (supra), for at page 600 Lord Justice Scrutton said:—

"There may be—and in the authorities there is some ground for thinking that there may be—an exception where the wife is defending herself against proceedings brought by the husband."

And at page 601 Lord Justice Atkin said:—

"Nothing we have said has any bearing on the rules of law and practice as to costs in the Divorce Division. . . . That has nothing to do with the common law rule as to a wife's agency of necessity. I should like to reserve the point whether the rule is subject to an exception in the case of a guilty wife called upon to defend herself against proceedings brought by the husband. We have had no authority cited to us; it may be that even in that case her solicitor would have to defend in reliance on the Court's exercise of discretion."

The only cases referred to bearing upon the point seemed to be Otway v. Otway (4 The Times L.R., 523, 534; 13 P.D., 141) and possibly Holt v. Holt (28 L.J., P. and M., 12). It would be observed, however, that both those cases arose in the Divorce Court, where the matter, as already pointed out, was governed by the peculiar practice of that Court; and Lord Justice Cotton, in giving judgment in the Court of Appeal, said in Otway v. Otway (supra) at p. 155:—

"Although her adultery prevented her from pledging the credit of her husband, and prevented her getting any alimony or allowance from the husband, yet, in my opinion, it does not prevent her from requiring her husband to provide for the costs reasonably incurred in bringing her case against his appeal before the Court. Therefore I think we ought to allow her her costs of this appeal, as well as the costs of the proceedings in the Divorce Court."

In both these cases the Court was exercising its undoubted discretion as to costs when sitting as a Court of divorce, and was not depending upon the mere common law. Indeed, as pointed out, Lord Justice Cotton rather suggested that the adultery of the wife prevented her pledging the credit of her husband in the matter of costs. Neither could he (Mr. Justice Sankey) dismiss from his consideration the fact that the President in this case refused to exercise his discretion, although that was not germane on the question of the common law liability.

In these circumstances he could see no authority which compelled him to hold that the wife was entitled to pledge her husband's credit and to bind him to pay her solicitors' costs in circumstances such as the present.

As already pointed out, the solicitors were not without remedy, or, indeed, at risk, in such cases, and had they at the beginning obtained an order in the Divorce Court for the wife's costs, which was granted almost as of course, they would not be in their present unfortunate position.

It was not necessary to relax what he conceived to be the common law rule in order to do justice in such a case as this, but if it were a proper thing to do so he thought that any such relaxation of, and exception to, the common law rule should be made by the Court of Appeal rather than by a Judge of first instance. For those reasons he was of opinion that judgment must be given for the defendant.

IN RE BRIDGETT AND HAYES' CONTRACT.*

Settled Land—Vendor and purchaser—Land no longer settled land after death of tenant for life—Probate granted to executor of tenant for life—Title to convey—Special executors—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 20), s. 204 (1)—Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 23), s. 22 (1), 37 (1).

On January 1, 1926, A was tenant for life, under the Settled Land Act, 1925, under a settlement of land, which on A's death was devised on trust for sale. Probate of the will of A (who died in 1926) was granted to B, her sole executor, settled land not being excluded by the grant. In December, 1926, B contracted to sell part of the property. After the date of the contract, B and another trustee were appointed trustees of the original settlement. The purchaser objected to the title on the ground that the legal estate was vested in the surviving Settled Land Act trustee of the original settlement, under s. 22 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, and that neither B nor the new trustees, after an assent by B, could convey the legal estate.

Held, (1) that, so long as the general grant of probate remained unrevoked, B had power to convey the legal estate to the purchaser; (2) that, as on the death of the tenant for life the land ceased to be settled land, the persons who were immediately before the death trustees of the settlement were not special personal representatives under s. 22 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925.

This was a summons by the purchaser of certain leasehold property forming part of certain property held under the trusts of the will of Caroline Stoneley upon trust for sale on the death of the tenant for life, Mrs. E. M. Thornley. On January 1, 1926, Mrs. Thornley was tenant for life under, and John Jackson was the sole trustee of, the will of Caroline Stoneley. On January 17, 1926, Mrs. Thornley died and a general grant of probate of her will was made to T. W. Bridgett, whom she had appointed to be the sole executor thereof. In December, 1926, T. W. Bridgett entered into a contract in writing (in which he was expressed to be contracting to sell as personal representative) with a purchaser, G. W. Hayes, for the sale to him of certain leasehold premises forming part of the trust estate held under the will of Caroline Stoneley. On January 21, 1927, John Jackson, being desirous of retiring from the trust, appointed T. W. Bridgett and M. Bridgett to be new trustees of the will of Caroline Stoneley in the place of two deceased trustees and of himself. The purchaser objected to the title on the ground that J. Jackson, as surviving trustee for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925, must be deemed to have been appointed by Mrs. Thornley, the tenant for life, as her special executor in relation to the settled land; that the legal estate in the property was vested in him as such special executor; and that title could not be made until (1) the grant of probate to Mrs. Thornley's executor had been revoked so far as it related to the settled land; (2) a re-grant of probate, limited to the settled land, was made to J. Jackson; and (3) J. Jackson had, as special executor, assented to the vesting of the property in T. W. Bridgett and M. Bridgett as trustees for sale, or joined with such trustees in assigning the property to the purchaser. This summons was therefore taken out by the purchaser for a declaration that a good title had not been shown by the vendor.

Mr. G. P. Slade appeared for the applicant; and Mr. F. C. Watmough for the respondent.

Mr. Justice Romer.—It is common ground that up to the date of her death Mrs. E. M. Thornley, who was the tenant for life of this property now in question, had vested in her the legal estate in the property. It is common ground that that being so, on her death this legal estate passed to her personal representative by virtue of sections 1 and 3 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925. But then it is said that if you look at section 22 of that Act you will find that in such a case (in this case) the lady must be deemed to have appointed as her special executor in regard to this land the person who up to the date of her death, or just before her death, was sole surviving trustee for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925. Let me assume that that was so. On January 17, 1926, she died, and on April 7, 1926, a general grant of probate of her will was made to Thomas William Bridgett, a person whom she had thereby appointed as executor. In my opinion, as from that date at any rate, wherever the legal estate in this property may have been as between the date of her death and this act of probate, the legal estate in this land vested in Thomas William Bridgett and he, in my opinion, can, while that act of probate remains unrevoked, properly convey the legal estate in this property to the purchaser. Section 204 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, subsection 1, says this: "An order of the Court under any statutory or other jurisdiction shall not, as against a purchaser, be invalidated on the ground of want of jurisdiction, or of want of any concurrence, consent, notice, or service, whether the purchaser has notice of any such want or not." With regard to section 22, subsection (1) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (if the purchaser is right as to its application at all to this case), it provided that probate might have been granted to this sole surviving trustee. In point of fact the Court of Probate did not grant probate to him but granted probate to Thomas William Bridgett. That being so, it appears that section 204 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, applies to the case with regard to the taking of a conveyance from the legal personal representative. Further, the purchaser would be protected in the event of any subsequent revocation of that grant of probate by section 37, subsection 1, of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925. It can hardly be doubted that in this case if the purchaser does take a conveyance from the person to whom the grant of probate was granted he would be acting in perfect good faith.

The only difficulty I think as regards that point arises from the fact that if you turn to the definition section of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, which is section 55, it is provided by subsection (xi.) that: "'Personal representative' means the executor, original or by representation, or administrator for the time being of a deceased person." At present the only executor of this deceased person is Thomas William Bridgett. Then it adds: "And 'executor' includes a person deemed to be appointed executor as respects settled land." In my opinion, the later part of that section, the words I have just read, only refer to the case where in the circumstances it is proper that the word "executor" should be so read as to include a person deemed to be appointed executor as respects settled land, and the effect of the definition is not to vest in the person who is deemed to be appointed special executor the legal estate in settled land where the Court of Probate has granted general administration to somebody else.

Now the point still remains—having heard it argued I think it only right I should dispose of it—as to whether section 22 (1) applies to the present case, it being conceded on both sides that on the death of this lady the settlement came to an end. Let me read the words of section 22 (1): "A testator may appoint, and in default of such express appointment shall be deemed to have appointed, as his special executors in regard to settled land, the persons, if any, who are at his death the trustees of the settlement thereof, and probate may be granted to such trustees specially limited to the settled land." Then follow these words: "In this subsection 'settled land' means land vested in the testator which was settled previously to his death and not by his will." Section 22 is the first of three sections which come under the general heading "Special provisions as to settled land," and in section 23 "settled land" is referred to, and in section 24 "settled land" is also referred to, and in both cases is referred to as meaning land which after the death of the testator continues to be settled land. The words in section 22 (1) "'settled land' means land vested in the testator which was settled previously to his death and not by his will," refer, therefore, as in terms they refer, only to this particular subsection. I cannot help thinking that these words were merely designed for the purpose of making it clear that section 22 (1) did not apply to a case where the land was settled by the will of a testator. However, I have to deal with the words as I find them, and that being so I must read the earlier part of the subsection as follows: "A testator may appoint, and in default of such express appointment shall be deemed to have appointed, as special executors as regards land vested in the testator which was settled previously to his death the persons if any who are at his death the trustees of the settlement thereof." So far down to the words "in regard to settled land" the section applies to the present case, because here land was vested in the testatrix previously to her death. Then the subsection says she shall be deemed to have appointed as her special executors the persons, if any, who are at her death the trustees of the settlement. Now before anyone can apply to the Court of Probate and get probate specially limited to the settled land granted to him, he must be at liberty to say to the Court that he is to be deemed to have been appointed special executor of this land, because at the death of the testator he was trustee of the settlement thereof. If he says that, he can only say it truly in relation to the settlement then existing, and if the settlement comes to an end as soon as the testatrix dies, then nobody can say "I am the person to whom probate specially limited can be granted." It is to be observed that the subsection does not say the persons who immediately before the death of the testatrix were the trustees of the settlement, but the persons who at her death are the trustees of the settlement.

For these reasons I think this subsection does not apply in a case like the present, where upon the death of the testatrix in question the settlement previously existing up to the date of the death comes to an end.

GRANT v. KNARESBOROUGH URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Rating—Valuation list—Return demanded from occupier — Particulars required — Licensed premises—Gross takings—Tenant's remuneration and capital—Invalidity of form—Rating and Valuation Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 90), s. 40.

The Court granted a declaration that the defendants, a rating authority, had no right under s. 40 of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, and the Rating and Valuation Act (Return) Rules, 1926, to require the plaintiff, who was the licensee and occupier of licensed premises, to make for the purposes of valuation a return stating the gross takings for the last three years, the outgoings for the last three years, tenant's remuneration, wages and equivalents, breakages and depreciation, lighting, heating, &c., and tenant's capital, since these particulars were, upon the evidence, not such as in the words of s. 40 could be "reasonably required" for the purposes of the Act.

This was an action by Mr. James Grant, the licensee and occupier of the Golden Anchor Inn, Knaresborough, Yorkshire, against the Knaresborough Urban District Council for a declaration that the form of a return under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, attached to a notice by the council dated March 25, 1927, and served on him, was illegal, unauthorized, and ultra vires ; and that he was not under any obligation to comply with the requisitions contained in the form.

By section 40 of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, whenever a new valuation list is to be made the rating authority must serve notice on the occupier, owner, or lessee of every hereditament in its area requiring him to make a return "containing such particulars as may be reasonably required for the purpose of carrying out this Act." By section 42 penalties are imposed on a person failing to comply with the notice or making a false return. By section 58 the Minister of Health was authorized by rules to prescribe, inter alia, the form of any "statement, return, or other document . . . required or authorized to be used under or for the purposes of this Act." The Minister of Health accordingly made the Rating and Valuation Act (Return) Rules, 1926, giving the forms of the returns to be required to be made for the purposes of valuation. By the Rules the rating authority was allowed to vary the forms for the purposes of different classes of hereditaments by omitting clauses of the forms not required in the circumstances of the case, but nothing was said as to adding other forms.

The defendant council, who were the rating authority for the area in which the plaintiff's premises were situated, served upon the plaintiff a notice, dated March 25, 1927, requiring from him a return for the assessment of licensed premises in the form annexed thereto. The form contained 13 questions requiring particulars. The plaintiff took no objection to the first ten questions, but objected to questions 11, 12, 13, which were as follows :—

(11) Gross takings for the last three years. (12) Outgoings for the last three years. Tenant's Remuneration, Wages and Equivalents. Breakages and Depreciation. Lighting, Heating, &c. (13) Tenant's Capital.

The plaintiff objected that these three questions required particulars which were not reasonably required for the purposes of the Act of 1925 ; that they were in excess of and inconsistent with the requirements laid down in the Rules of 1926 ; and that they constituted an unreasonable and oppressive inquiry into the profits made by an occupier in the course of his business. None of these questions was included in the forms given in the Rules of 1926.

The plaintiff began this action and delivered his statement of claim. The defendant council delivered a defence putting in issue the illegality of the return required, but, on November 22, 1927, withdrew their defence. The action now came on for hearing.

Mr. Norman Birkett, K.C., and Mr. Tindal Atkinson appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. J. V. Nesbitt for the defendant council.

Mr. BIRKETT said that the plaintiff had to bring the action on for hearing, as he could not obtain the declaration asked for on a motion for judgment without evidence. The questions objected to required answers dealing with the profits made by the plaintiff, which had nothing to do with the proper valuation of the premises. The value of licensed premises did not depend on whether the occupier was competent or not, and the phrases "tenant's remuneration" and "tenant's capital" were technical phrases dealing with hypotheses and not with facts, which alone an occupier could be required to give. There was no reference in the Rules to any trade returns being made in the case of any trades. The questions required returns which could not be reasonably required and were oppressive, illegal, and ultra vires. It was decided in Dyson v. Attorney-General (28 The Times L.R., 72 ; [1912] 1 Ch., 158) that where one requisition was illegal the whole of the form requiring returns was invalid.

Three surveyors then gave evidence.

* Reported by E. K. CORRIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Philip Michael Faraday, who had been in practice for 31 years, said that in valuing a licensed house he would want to know the rent, if it were a free house, but not if it were a tied house. He would not require to know the gross takings. They would be most misleading, as one house might have taken five times as much as an exactly similar house owing to a difference in the quality of the liquor sold. He had never heard of the trade takings being required in the case of any trade.

Sir Herbert Trustram Eve said that he had had 40 years' experience. He had never required trade returns. He had already valued large numbers of licensed houses under the Act of 1925. The trade takings depended on the personality of the tenant, and they would unfairly bias the mind of the valuer. "Tenant's remuneration" and "tenant's capital" were technical terms of hypotheses, and a licensee would not know what they meant. They were required for a balance-sheet valuation, which was never made in the case of licensed premises. "Depreciation" must be purely a matter of guesswork.

Mr. Sidney Motion gave similar evidence.

MR. JUSTICE ASTBURY said that the particulars required in questions (11) (12) and (13) did not comply with the particulars specified in the Rules of 1926. It was clear from section 40 of the Act of 1925 that only such particulars could be demanded as were reasonably required for the purposes of the Act. The expert evidence called was conclusive that the answers to those questions were not reasonably required. They did not deal with facts, but with hypotheses. No trade returns were mentioned in the forms in the Rules. The Court could not have made the declaration without argument and without hearing evidence. The plaintiff was entitled to the declaration. By the decision in Dyson v. Attorney-General (28 The Times L.R., 72 ; [1912] 1 Ch., 158) the whole form was invalid.

Mr. NESBITT asked that the defendant council should only pay the costs down to the time when they withdrew their defence. If the plaintiff wanted the declaration, which was not necessary after the withdrawal, he should only have it at his own expense.

MR. JUSTICE ASTBURY held that the plaintiff was entitled to the costs of the hearing.

IN RE PETITION OF RIGHT OF MASON AND OTHERS.*

Limitations, Statute of—Lunatic—Funds in Court — Administration—Escheat—Payment out—Indemnity—Mistake of fact—Petition of right to recover—Lapse of time—Droits of the Crown—Limitation Act, 1623 (21 Jac. I., c. 16).

In 1799 and 1801 the Crown made an ex gratia grant of certain funds in Court, which were claimed as bona vacantia, and took an indemnity in respect of the funds so granted. These funds represented the residuary estate of the father of a female lunatic, and she was entitled to them at the date of her death in 1798. In 1794 the Master had reported that she had no heir-at-law or next-of-kin. In July, 1926, a petition of right was presented by persons alleging that it had recently been established that the lunatic did in fact leave next-of-kin surviving her, and that they represented the next-of-kin, and they sought to recover from the Crown the personal estate of the lunatic.

Held, that the Crown must clearly have thought that there were no next-of-kin in fact ; that the taking of the indemnity was an ordinary measure of precaution and could not be regarded as any indication that the Crown knew that the estate was being wrongly paid over ; and that the claim of the suppliants was barred by the Limitation Act, 1623.

Attorney-General v. Köhler (9 H.L.C., 654) considered.

This was a petition of right the object of which was to obtain the replacement and distribution among the suppliants of £45,000, representing the personal estate and effects of Maria L'Epine, a lunatic, who died intestate on April 30, 1798. The suppliants alleged that the property had erroneously vested in the Crown at her death, and they claimed to be entitled to the property as her next-of-kin.

The petition was presented by the following suppliants :—Miss Amy Knight Mason, Miss Jessie Margaret Mason, Miss Ethel Marion Mason, Mr. Alfred William Mason, Mrs. Emily Eliza Harrison (formerly a Miss Mason), Mr. Herbert Frederick Mason, Mr. Arthur Charles Mason, Mr. William Henry Knight, Miss Lucy Isabella Coldwell Knight, and Viscount Bangor.

The Crown alleged, inter alia, that the claim was barred by statutes of limitation.

Mr. Topham, K.C., and Mr. A. C. Nesbitt appeared for the suppliants ; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Stafford Crossman for the Crown. Mr. Nicholson Combe and Mr. C. Montgomery White held watching briefs for parties interested.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER delivered the following considered judgment :—Maria L'Epine died on April 30, 1798. At this date she was entitled to certain funds in Court representing the residuary estate of her late father, but subject to the payment of two annuities. In the year 1791 she had been found to be a lunatic, and in the course of certain proceedings in Chancery instituted for the administration of her father's estate the Master had, in July, 1794, reported that she had no heir-at-law or next-of-kin. This report was in due course confirmed by the Court. In these circumstances the Earl and Countess Howe obtained letters of administration of the estate of Maria L'Epine for the use and benefit of his Majesty King George III., and thereupon petitioned the Court for payment out to themselves as such administrators of the funds in Court, after appropriating a sufficient part thereof to answer the two annuities. An order was made on this petition on July 22, 1799, directing certain securities of the nominal amount of £15,000 to be appropriated to meet the two annuities and directing payment to Lord and Lady Howe of the balance of the funds in Court. It appears that Lord and Lady Howe had presented a memorial to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury alleging that it had been the intention of Maria L'Epine's father to give them the beneficial interest in the property left to her by his will in the event of her death, and praying that the Commissioners would intercede with his Majesty to grant to them for their use and benefit the personal estate and effects of Maria L'Epine, subject to any claim or right of the next-of-kin of the said Maria L'Epine, if any should thereafter appear entitled in that capacity. Before any such grant was in fact made, Lord and Lady Howe both died, and their only two surviving children—namely, Sophia Baroness Howe and Catherine Marchioness of Sligo—were their legal personal representatives. These two daughters then presented a memorial to the Commissioners asking that, subject to the payment of 10 per cent. on the value thereof for his Majesty's use, they might be at liberty to appropriate the estate of Maria L'Epine to their own use in equal moieties. His Majesty's assent having been obtained to this proposal, the two daughters appear to have paid over the 10 per cent. to his Majesty, and thereupon by Royal Warrant dated June 8, 1801, his Majesty granted to the two daughters, to be divided between them in equal moieties, the personal estate and effects of Maria L'Epine to which his Majesty in right of the Royal Prerogative had become entitled, including the £15,000 which was still in Court. The habendum was in these terms : "To have hold, take and enjoy the same unto the said Baroness Howe and the said Marchioness of Sligo, their executors, administrators and assigns in as full, ample and beneficial a manner as we ourselves are or could or might have been entitled to have, receive or enjoy the same, subject nevertheless to any claim or right of the next-of-kin of the said Maria L'Epine, if any should hereafter appear entitled in that capacity to the said personal estate and effects and as an indemnity to us, our heirs and successors against any such eventual claim, security has been given by or on behalf of the said Baroness Howe and Marchioness of Sligo." The indemnity here referred to consisted of two bonds in penal sums for the purpose of securing repayment of the estate to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, if any person or persons whomsoever should at any time or times thereafter by due course of law prove himself or themselves to be the next-of-kin of Maria L'Epine and for the purpose of indemnifying his Majesty, his heirs and successors, against all claims and demands which should or might at any time or times thereafter be made upon him or them for or in respect of the personal estate and effects of the said Maria L'Epine by any person or persons whomsoever, and also all loss, costs, damages and expenses which his Majesty, his heirs and successors, might at any time thereafter pay or sustain by reason of his Majesty's having given and granted the personal estate and effects to the Baroness Howe and the Marchioness of Sligo.

The two annuitants having died in 1818 and 1830 respectively, the £15,000 was duly paid out of Court to persons claiming under the two daughters of Lord and Lady Howe under orders dated July 1, 1820, and March 8, 1831, respectively.

On July 1, 1926, this petition of right was presented by persons alleging that it has recently been established that Maria L'Epine did in fact leave next-of-kin surviving her, and that they now represent such next-of-kin. They accordingly seek to recover from the Crown with interest the whole of the personal estate of Maria L'Epine, or alternatively the 10 per cent. of such estate that was paid over to the Crown by the two daughters of Lord and Lady Howe. I am not for the present concerned to inquire whether Maria L'Epine left any next-of-kin or whether the suppliants do or do not represent any such next-of-kin. For the parties have agreed to confine themselves, for the present, to seeking a determination of the following questions : (1) Whether the petition is maintainable on the assumption that no part of the funds in question ever came into the hands of or was dealt with by his present Majesty or his nominees or grantees or was carried to the Consolidated Fund. (2) Whether the petition is barred by any Statute of Limitations. (3) Whether in view of section 5 of the Petitions of Right Act, 1860, the suppliants can proceed, without serving the petition upon the successors in title of the Earl and Countess Howe and Sophia Baroness Howe and Catherine Marchioness of Sligo.

Inasmuch as it is obvious that if either of the first two of these questions is answered adversely to the suppliants the petition must be dismissed, the course suggested appeared to me to be a convenient one. The three questions were accordingly argued before me and I must now give my decision upon them. It will, however, I think, be convenient to consider, in the first place, the question of the Statutes of Limitation. In the Crown's demurrer to the petition the Statutes of Limitation specifically referred to are section 3 of the Intestates' Estates Act, 1884, section 30 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, and section 13 of the Law of Property Amendment Act, 1860. But at the Bar the only statute relied on by the Crown was 21 James I., Chapter 16. In order to see whether this statute affords an answer to the claim of the suppliants, it becomes necessary to ascertain what is the real nature of that claim. So far as regards that portion of Maria L'Epine's estate which was granted by George III. to the daughters of Lord and Lady Howe it is difficult to see on what ground the Crown can in any case be made liable to restore it to Maria L'Epine's next-of-kin unless the Crown was under some fiduciary obligation to the next-of-kin to obtain possession of it on their behalf, and it was not contended before me that any such obligation existed. The most that can be said against the Crown, as it seems to me, is that in the circumstances that portion of the estate must be deemed to have been received by his Majesty King George III. from the administrators of Maria L'Epine and paid over by him to the two daughters. I doubt very much whether this is the proper conclusion to be drawn from the facts ; but for the present purpose I will assume that his Majesty received not only the 10 per cent. which admittedly came into his hands, but the rest of Maria L'Epine's estate as well. On that assumption the claim of the suppliants is one to recover from the Crown moneys that in fact belonged to Maria L'Epine's next-of-kin, but was wrongfully paid over by her administrators to King George III. It is, in other words, a claim by a cestui que trust to recover from a third party money which his trustee has by mistake paid to that third party. Such a claim is one for money had and received. Now it was pointed out by Mr. Justice Warrington, as he then was, in In re Robinson ([1911] 1 Ch., 502), to which I must refer presently, that it may be a matter of some doubt whether, in strictness, the cestui que trust in such a case could maintain an action against the third party for money had and received, though he could at all events maintain a suit in equity for it, making the trustee a party. But in such a suit the cestui que trust would have no better right than the trustee would have in an action brought by himself, and if the claim of the trustee would be barred in an action at law by any Statute of Limitations, the claim of the cestui que trust, so far as it was one for money had and received, would be equally barred. What, then, is the Statute of Limitations applicable to an action for money had and received ? Inasmuch as such an action is an action upon the case, the statute applicable is that of 21 James I., Chapter 16, and the action is barred after six years from the time when the cause of action arose. It was, however, urged before me, on behalf of the suppliants, that, though an action to recover money paid under a mistake of fact may come within the category of actions on the case, nevertheless time does not begin to run under the statute until discovery of the mistake, and Brooksbank v. Smith (2 Y. and C. Ex., 58) was cited as an authority for this proposition. But that was not an action to recover money paid under a mistake. It was, as pointed out in Baker v. Courage and Co. ([1910] 1 K.B., 56), a case in which the plaintiff was seeking purely equitable relief. A trustee had by mistake paid over certain stock to the defendant, who was not entitled to it, and, upon discovering his mistake, the trustee filed a bill to have retransferred to him so much of the stock as was still retained by the defendant. The trustee was, therefore, claiming to follow specific trust property. To such a claim no Statute of Limitations was applicable, and Baron Alderson, when asked to apply the statute of James I. by analogy, declined to do so inasmuch as six years had not elapsed since the plaintiff had the opportunity of discovering the mistake. In Baker v. Courage and Co. (supra) there was a counterclaim by the defendant to be repaid money paid by him to the plaintiff under a mistake of fact. The plaintiff relied upon the statute of James I. and the defendant contended that time did not run under the statute until discovery of the mistake. In rejecting this contention Mr. Justice Hamilton, as he then was, distinguished Brooksbank v. Smith (supra) on the grounds mentioned above and added this : "Therefore it was a case to which the Statute of Limitations did not apply ; and the rule which was there laid down was one which in my opinion cannot be transferred to cases like the present, to which the statute does directly apply. In dealing with the latter class of cases, Courts of Equity were just as much bound by the statute as were Courts of common law." He further held that the cause of action was complete as soon as the money was paid. In this connexion I ought perhaps to refer to the statement made by Lord Parker in Lodge v. National Union Investment Company, Limited (23 The Times L.R., 187 ; [1907] 1 Ch., 300, at p. 305), that an action for money had and received is an equitable action. He did not, however, say, nor did he intend to say, that a plaintiff claiming money had and received was claiming equitable relief. This is quite clear from the fact that he used the word "action" and that he referred to Moses v. Macferlan (2 Burr., 1005) as an authority for his statement. In that case Lord Mansfield said : "If the defendant be under an obligation, from the ties of natural justice, to refund ; the law implies a debt, and gives this action, founded in the equity of the plaintiff's case, as it were upon a contract ('quasi ex contractu,' as the Roman Law expresses it)," and he referred to an action for money had and received to the plaintiff's use as a species of assumpsit. Later on he added : "This kind of equitable action, to recover back money, which ought not in justice to be kept, is very beneficial, and therefore much encouraged. It lies only for money which ex aequo et bono the defendant ought to refund." An action for money paid under mistake is therefore an action at common law, though it is one founded upon an equity. But though it may therefore properly be called an equitable action it is nevertheless an action to which the statute of James I. directly applies, and is not one to which the statute is only applicable by analogy. I am therefore of opinion that the suppliants' claim is barred by the statute so far as it is to be regarded as a claim at common law for money had and received. There are, however, cases in which a cestui que trust who finds that his money has been paid away by his trustee to a third party, who has applied it to his own use, can recover it in equity after any length of time if he has not lost his right by his own laches. These cases are three in number, as pointed out by Mr. Justice Warrington in In re Robinson (supra). He said : "I think cases of this kind where mistakes have been made by trustees in payment of trust funds fall under three heads. Where the Court is administering the funds and adjusting the rights of the parties between themselves in the ordinary course, if there are funds belonging to the person who has been overpaid, the Court may so adjust the rights as to rectify the overpayment." To that class belonged the case of Harris v. Harris (No. 2) (29 Beavan, 110), when properly understood, as was pointed out by Mr. Justice Warrington. The learned Judge then proceeded as follows : "Then, again, there are cases where trust money actually remaining in the hands of the person in whose hands it has been wrongly placed may be followed. In such a case there is no difficulty at all ; a person has received a trust fund, and it is still in his hands, and still impressed with a trust, and of course he holds it as trustee and is bound to transfer it." Brooksbank v. Smith (supra) was a case of that class. "The third class of cases is where the trust funds or the proceeds of the trust funds have been received by a person with knowledge that they are wrongly paid to him." Of this last class of case In re Eyre Williams ([1923] 2 Ch., 533) is an instance. In such cases the recipient is a constructive trustee and comes within the class of persons mentioned by Lord Bowen in Soar v. Ashwell ([1893] 2 Q.B., 390), who have received trust property and dealt with it in a manner inconsistent with trusts of which they were cognizant.

Now the present case does not, of course, come within the first of the three classes mentioned by Mr. Justice Warrington. Having regard to the assumption that I am required to make, I must take it that no part of the estate of Maria L'Epine is in the hands of his present Majesty or forms part of the Consolidated Fund. The case does not therefore fall within the second class. Does it fall within the third ? The suppliants contend that it does, inasmuch as his Majesty King George III. took steps to procure an indemnity from his grantees against the claims of any next-of-kin of Maria L'Epine. The suppliants ask me to infer from this that the Crown suspected that there were such next-of-kin in fact. But the Master in Chancery had certified in 1794 that there were no next-of-kin, and the Court had confirmed his report. It seems quite clear that the Crown must have thought that there were no next-of-kin in fact, and I cannot regard the taking of the indemnity as affording any indication that the Crown knew that the estate was being wrongly paid over, or that it was being dealt with in a manner inconsistent with trusts of which the Crown was cognizant. The taking of this indemnity was an ordinary measure of precaution, and one which I suspect would always be taken by the Crown when making an ex gratia grant out of funds claimed as bona vacantia. When a trustee distributes a trust fund he very often asks for and receives a release and indemnity. It cannot be inferred from his doing so that he knows or even suspects that he is paying the wrong persons. In my judgment the claim of the suppliants is barred by the statute of James I. This is sufficient to dispose of the petition, but as the other two points of defence were fully argued before me, and as this case will probably go farther, I think that I ought to express shortly the conclusions at which I have arrived upon them.

In support of his contention that upon the assumption referred to in the first question submitted to me the petition is not maintainable, the Attorney-General relied upon the case of Attorney-General v. Köhler (9 H.L.C., 654). In that case one Mitford had in 1813 obtained as nominee of the Crown, and for the use and benefit of his then Majesty, a grant of letters of administration to the estate of one Köhler, who had died intestate, and, as it was then thought, without next-of-kin. Mitford administered the estate, and in 1814 paid over the surplus of the estate to the Prince Regent on behalf of King George III. In the year 1820 a bill was filed against Mitford by persons claiming to be entitled as Köhler's next-of-kin for the purpose of receiving such surplus. In 1824 Mitford died and in 1827 one Maule obtained letters of administration de bonis non to Köhler's estate. Thereupon the suit was revived against Maule, who died in 1851. Both Mitford and Maule had been in succession Solicitors to the Treasury, and on the death of the latter one Reynolds was appointed to that office. By the statute 15 Victoria, Chapter 3, it had been enacted that all proceedings in law or equity against Maule as administrator as the nominee of the Crown pending at the time of his decease should not thereby abate, but should continue and take effect against the Solicitor for the time being of the Treasury. In the year 1859 the title of the next-of-kin was established. It was in these circumstances that in 1860 an order was made on Reynolds to pay into Court the amount paid over to the King's Proctor in respect of Köhler's surplus estate, together with a large sum for interest. From this order an appeal was brought before the House of Lords in the year 1861. On the hearing of the appeal it was contended that in any case Reynolds could not be made liable in respect of the money paid over by Mitford. But it was also argued on behalf of the appellants, and apparently for the first time, that Mitford was merely the nominee of the Crown, that if anyone was liable it was the Crown and not Mitford, but that her Majesty Queen Victoria was not bound to afford compensation for an erroneous payment made by Mitford to King George III. In answer to this latter contention the respondents' counsel objected that, inasmuch as this point had not been raised in the Court below, where the only point argued, apart from the proof of the title of the respondents, was whether interest was payable, it was not open to the appellants in the House of Lords. The question, therefore, whether Queen Victoria could be asked to make compensation for money which was paid over wrongfully to George III. and never came into her hands was not argued by them. They contented themselves by contending for the personal responsibility of Mitford as administrator, and for the devolution of that responsibility upon Reynolds. It is necessary to state the facts and the arguments thus fully in order to understand the speeches of the noble Lords who took part in the decision. Lord Cranworth said this: "If this case is to be dealt with on the ordinary principles of equity as administered between subject and subject, I have great difficulty in understanding how either the Crown or the appellant Reynolds can be held to be liable in respect of the demand of the respondents." He then stated the facts and proceeded as follows: "The personal estate of an intestate who leaves no next-of-kin belongs absolutely to the Sovereign for the time being as part of the droits of the Crown. Assuming, therefore, the facts to have been such as they were supposed to be in 1814, the money was properly paid over to the Prince Regent, as representing for that purpose King George III. Subsequent investigation has shown that the payment was made in ignorance of the true state of facts. It was a mistake to suppose that the General had left no next-of-kin. He left nephews and nieces who were his next-of-kin, and in that character were entitled to the money. If the true state of things had been ascertained in the lifetime of King George III., the obvious justice of the case would have required that he, or the Prince Regent acting for him, should refund the money which had been paid to him on a mistaken view of the facts. But the truth was not discovered in the lifetime of George III., or of either of his sons, George IV. or William IV. It was not finally established till the year 1859, i.e., nearly 40 years after the death of King George III.; nearly 30 years after the death of King George IV., and considerably more than 40 years after Mitford had parted with the money. Who in these circumstances ought to be held responsible to the next-of-kin for the money which thus improperly came into the hands of the Prince Regent acting for his father King George III.? It is very difficult to say on what ground her Majesty or her Majesty's Treasury can be considered as under any obligation to refund, or rather pay, the money. It never came to her Majesty's hands. The Crown is a corporation sole, and has perpetual continuance. Can a succeeding Sovereign, upon the principle that the King never dies, be held responsible for money paid over in error to and spent by a predecessor, which that predecessor might lawfully have disposed of for his own use, supposing it to have rightfully come to his hands? Does the successor for such a purpose represent his predecessor? These are questions difficult of solution. Let me put a case between subjects nearly analogous to the present, in which the Sovereign is concerned. Suppose a bishop, lord of a manor; and that on the death of the copyholder he claims a heriot, alleging such to be the custom of his manor, and suppose that the heir of the copyholder, relying on the assurance of the bishop that the heriot was due by the custom of the manor, accordingly pays to the bishop a sum of money by way of composition for the heriot; the bishop dies, and then it is discovered that no heriot was payable to the bishop in respect of the copyhold held of him, but that it was in fact payable to the lord of an adjoining manor, who thereupon recovered it against the copyhold heir. It could not be pretended that the copyholder would have any right against the bishop's successor. His right would be against the executor of the bishop, to whom the payment had been made, on an erroneous allegation by him, that there was a custom in his manor entitling him to it. On the same principle, reasoning by analogy from the case as it would have stood between subject and subject, the right of the present respondents would be a right against the executors of either King George III. or King George IV., it is immaterial to consider which, certainly not against Queen Victoria. Nor is the case altered by the arrangements made on the accession of her Majesty with reference to the civil list. On that occasion her Majesty, in consideration of a certain annual income secured to her by Parliament, gave up to the public, as King William IV. had previously done, inter alia all droits of the Crown accruing during her reign, which therefore, when received, are now received by the Treasury, not on the private account of her Majesty, but on account of the public. This arrangement, though it secures to the public droits of the Crown accruing after the accession of her Majesty, obviously has no bearing on the question who is liable in respect of droits which came to the hands of a preceding Sovereign. If an heir in tail, on succeeding to his lands, were to convey them for his life to a stranger, in consideration of an annuity secured to him for his life, it would be absurd to say that such a settlement could create in the heir in tail, or the person claiming from him, any liability to discharge the debts of the preceding tenant in tail. On no analogy taken from disputes among subjects, can either the present Queen or the Treasury be deemed liable to the respondents for the personal estate of the intestate received by King George III. It is not, however, necessary to decide whether in a direct proceeding against the Sovereign (by petition of right, for instance), these analogies would govern the decision to be pronounced. The party here made responsible is not the Crown but Mr. Reynolds, and the true question is, whether he, as personal representative of the intestate, on the nomination of the Crown, can be held liable." Lord Cranworth then considered whether Reynolds could be made responsible for what Mitford had done, and holding that the principles that would have prevailed in the case of ordinary administrators were applicable notwithstanding the fact that the grant of administration had been made to a nominee of the Crown for the use and benefit of his Majesty he decided that Reynolds could not be made liable for principal or interest, or rather, that he would not have been liable had not his liability for the principal been admitted in the Court below. Lord Wensleydale, so far as the present point is concerned, contented himself by saying that the remedy of the next-of-kin against the Crown was "a very doubtful one to say the least." Lord Chelmsford expressed himself more positively. He said: "There can be no doubt that Mitford, by taking out administration and possessing himself of the personal estate of the intestate, became personally responsible to those who were entitled to this estate, that is, to the next-of-kin of the intestate. And if, after Mitford had paid over the money to the Treasury for the use of his Majesty, any persons had appeared and established their claim as next-of-kin, he would have been liable to repay the money to them, because he would not have properly administered the estate. Upon his death this liability would have been continued against his representatives. But as the money had, strictly speaking, been paid to the use of George III., although George IV. had probably received it as Regent, he would not have been liable to refund it as King." "He" in this last sentence refers, as I understand it, to King George IV. Lord Chelmsford then continued: "If nothing more had been done, therefore, after the accession of King George IV., the only remedy which the claimants could have had would have been against the estate of Mitford," and a little later he says: "The difficulty of the case, however, is not so apparent during the reign of George IV. as after the accession of King William IV. and of her present Majesty. If the claim could be maintained only against the Sovereign, it would be most unreasonable that his successors should be required to pay what never came to their hands." In the end, however, he stated that he did not treat this case as being a proceeding against the Crown, but as a suit against successive administrators.

In these circumstances I cannot, unfortunately for myself, treat the case as a conclusive authority in favour of the contention of the Attorney-General, in the case before me, and I must form my own conclusions upon the point. The opinions of such high authorities as Lord Cranworth, Lord Wensleydale, and Lord Chelmsford must naturally be received with the greatest respect. I may, however, be pardoned if I venture to criticize their opinions, seeing that the point was never argued on the part of the respondents, and that the argument on the part of the appellants, so far as this point is concerned, does not appear to have been supported by the citation of any reported case or other authority. It must, I think, be taken as established law that the Crown is a corporation, whether it be a corporation sole as it is generally thought to be, or whether, as Professor Maitland supposed, it be a complex and highly organized corporation aggregate of which the King is the head. (See Vol. III. of his Collected Papers, page 259.) If Professor Maitland's view be the true one, then the estate of Maria L'Epine was received by a corporation aggregate, and the reasoning of Lord Cranworth based upon the analogy of certain corporations sole would not apply. The corporation aggregate that received the money would be the same corporation aggregate that is now asked to refund it, and the fact that such corporation is now under a different headship would not appear to be material. But assuming the Crown to be a corporation sole, why should not the same result follow? The estate was received in the time of King George III. by the corporation sole, and the same corporation sole is now asked to refund it. Lord Chelmsford thought that where there had been a change in the person of the sole corporator such a demand was "most unreasonable." It does, no doubt, seem somewhat unreasonable that in the year 1861, the Crown, in the person of Queen Victoria, should have been asked to refund money that was paid to King George IV. when he was Prince Regent. Anything that is unreasonable in such a stale demand could, I should have thought, be safely left to the Statute of Limitations to deal with. But Lord Chelmsford did not seem to be dealing merely with a stale demand, and, if he be right, then although money should have been wrongfully paid, in right of the Crown, to King William IV. in 1836, it would be "unreasonable" for the true owner to petition the Crown in the person of Queen Victoria for repayment in 1838. Surely if the matter is to be decided from the point of view of reasonableness it would be most unreasonable in such a case to refuse the true owner relief; for he would then be without any remedy at all (as to this see Ryves v. Duke of Wellington, 9 Beavan, 579). Lord Cranworth, indeed, seemed to think that in the case before him the next-of-kin would have had some right against the executors of George III. or George IV. But Ryves v. Duke of Wellington (supra) was not cited to him; and even if there could have been any such executors, they would have had nothing to do with moneys that had come to their testator in right of the Crown, for over such moneys the Sovereign had not been given any testamentary powers by the statute 40 George III., chapter 88. The truth is that Lord Cranworth's opinion throughout was based upon the analogy of other corporations sole, and if I may be permitted to say so, it was a false analogy. He supposed the case of a bishop lord of the manor receiving a sum of money from a tenant by way of composition for a heriot, that could not lawfully be claimed, and pointed out that it could not be pretended that the tenant could claim repayment of the money from the bishop's successor. But neither a heriot received by a bishop nor the money paid in composition for it would pass to the bishop's successor, so far as not disposed of in his lifetime. They would pass to his legal personal representatives (Rennall v. Bishop of Lincoln, 7 B. and Cr., 113, at p. 166). In this respect the Crown differs from most other corporations sole (see Grant on Corporations, page 629, and the cases there cited). It differs, too, in many other respects. In the case of other corporations sole the sole corporator for the time being has two capacities, his personal and his corporate capacity. If land be conveyed to him and his heirs, in the former capacity the fee simple belongs to him, and not his successor. It is otherwise in the case of the King. He has, from the point of view of property at any rate, but one capacity, or, to use the language of the Judges in the Duchy of Lancaster case (Plow., 212), "to this natural body is conjoined his body politic, which contains his royal estate and dignity, and the body politic includes the body natural, but the body natural is the lesser, and with this the body politic is consolidated. So that he has a body natural, adorned and invested with the estate and dignity royal, and he has not a body natural distinct and divided by itself from the office and dignity royal, but a body natural and a body politic together indivisible, and these two bodies are incorporated in one person, and make one body, and not divers, that is the body corporate in the body natural, et e contra the body natural in the body corporate." But these observations do not apply to any other corporation sole with which I am acquainted. They certainly do not apply to Lord Cranworth's bishop. The bishop by his will could have disposed of the heriot or the money. The Sovereign, in a like case, could not. Even his testamentary power over property coming to him otherwise than in right of his Crown had to be conferred on him by Act of Parliament, and, but for this statutory power, everything of which the Sovereign should die possessed would pass to his successor. If the analogy of Lord Cranworth's bishop is to prevail, then the King's successor corresponds, not to the successor of the bishop, but to the bishop's legal personal representatives. And, subject to the Statute of Limitations, they would certainly have been liable to refund out of the bishop's estate the moneys received by him, even if the moneys had been spent by the bishop in his lifetime.

For these reasons, and with the utmost respect, I am unable to bring myself to agree with the opinions expressed by Lord Cranworth and Lord Chelmsford. In my judgment the first question submitted to me for decision must be answered in favour of the suppliants.

The only question remaining to be disposed of is that arising under section 5 of the Petitions of Right Act, 1860. The section refers to petitions of right presented for the recovery of any real or personal property, or any right in or to the same, which shall have been granted away or disposed of by or on behalf of his Majesty or his predecessors, and directs that a copy of the petition shall be served as therein mentioned upon the person in the possession, occupation, or enjoyment of such property or right. The section prima facie would appear to relate to a claim to recover any special property wrongfully granted or disposed of by the Crown in favour of some third party. But in such a case why should the Crown be brought into the matter at all? If the Crown in making the grant or disposition could be treated as having committed some breach of trust, a claim might conceivably be preferred against it for the damages thereby caused to the suppliant. But the petition of right would not, in that case, be presented for recovery of the property, but for compensation, and the section would not apply, or, apart from any question of a breach of trust, the Crown might have effected a tortious conversion of the property; but in that case no petition of right would lie at all. I therefore find it somewhat difficult to understand what kind of claim against the Crown is contemplated by the section. There is presumably some sort of claim to which it would apply, though I have been unable to think of one. It does not, at any rate, apply to the present case. This is not a claim to recover any property granted away or disposed of by the Crown; it is a claim to render the Crown liable for money alleged to have been had and received by the Crown to the use of the suppliants. I have already referred to the difficulty of treating the Crown as having received any more than the 10 per cent. But assuming in the suppliants' favour that the Crown is to be treated as having received the balance, as having then paid it over to the daughters of Lord and Lady Howe, the suppliants are not attempting to recover the estate in specie, or to make the Crown liable for having wrongfully paid it over, but as having, by reason of this receipt alone, come under an equitable obligation—enforceable, if the Crown had been an ordinary person, by an action on the case at law—to pay an equivalent sum to the suppliants.

In my opinion, the section has no application to the case.

IN RE GIBBINGS.*

Probate—Practice—Settled land—Tenant for life—Special executors—Grant of probate, limited to settled land, to surviving executor of settlor as trustee of the settlement—Settled Land Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 18), ss. 7, 30 (1) (3)—Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 23), ss. 1 (1) (2) (3), 2 (1) (2), 3 (2) (4), 22 (1) (2), 55 (xxiv.)—Probate Rules (Non-Contentious Business), 116 and 118.

If land is settled upon a person for an interest not ceasing on his death, when that event occurs the trustee of the settlement is, by the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 22, entitled as special executor to a grant of probate of the will of the deceased.

This was a motion by Frederick John Gibbings, an Australian resident, by his attorneys for a grant of probate to him, as a special executor, limited to certain settled land. The settlor was his father, John Gibbings, who by his will appointed his wife, Amelia, and his son, Frederick John, executors, and devised real property to them on trust for his wife for life and, subject to this life interest, in trust for the children of the marriage in such shares as his wife should by her will appoint. The settlor died in December, 1890, and the wife by deed and in her will appointed the property to the children in equal shares. On April 20, 1926, the wife died, and her executor, Charles Edwin Gibbings, a brother of the present applicant, obtained a grant of probate except in respect of the settled land.

In March, 1927, Frederick John Gibbings appointed his brother, Charles Edwin, as co-trustee of the settlement under their father's will, and appointed attorneys to obtain for himself, as special executor, a grant of probate under his mother's will limited to the settled land. The application was refused by the Registrar on the ground that it did not come within the category of grants to special executors. On August 23, 1927, application was made to the Vacation Judge, Mr. Justice Clauson, who adjourned it to the Probate Division.

Mr. R. M. Middleton appeared for the applicant.

LORD MERRIVALE delivered the following considered judgment :—

Application is here made by the attorneys in this country of Frederick John Gibbings, who is resident in one of the States of the Australian Commonwealth, for a grant of probate to him, as a special executor, limited to certain settled land which under the will of his father, John Gibbings, was devised in fee to him and his mother, Amelia Gibbings, now deceased. The grant has not been made in the registry upon application in common form, for reasons arising upon consideration of certain statutory enactments which bear on the matter, and because, as is stated, this case does not appear to fall within the practice as to such grants so far as it has at present been defined.

The statutes in question are the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, and the Settled Land Act, 1925. The rules more immediately applicable are the rules for Non-Contentious Business in Probate, Nos. 116 and 118.

By the will of John Gibbings, deceased, he devised the realty of which he died seised to the use of his wife Amelia, now deceased, and his son Frederick John, now applying, their heirs, executors, and administrators, upon trust to suffer the wife to receive the income during her life subject to a defeasance, which did not operate, and, subject thereto, for the testator's children in such shares as their mother might by deed or will appoint. John Gibbings also appointed his wife and the applicant his executors, and they took probate, the widow in the first instance and the son under a reservation of his rights in the grant to the widow. The widow, by successive deeds and by her will, appointed the realty in equal shares among her children. The executor of the will of Amelia Gibbings, a brother of the applicant, applied in due course for probate of this will. He deposed under Rule 118 that the realty in question was vested in the deceased previously to her death, and as he applied for a grant "save and except settled land," no question arose under the provision in the rules that trustees of settled land "shall be cleared off before a general grant shall issue."

It was stated upon the motion before me that the applicant, in pursuance of the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 30 (3), had appointed his brother, the executor of the mother's will, a co-trustee with him of the settled land, that they had entered into contracts for the sale of parts of the land, and that the present application was made incidentally to the carrying out of these contracts. With this matter the Court has no direct concern on this present application. If questions arise on contracts for the sale of land, such questions can be dealt with elsewhere after argument. The governing sections of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, are sections 1 and 22. Section 1, so far as material, is in these terms :—

"(1) Real estate to which a deceased person was entitled for an interest not ceasing on his death shall on his death . . . devolve . . . on the personal representative of the deceased. . . .

"(2) The personal representatives for the time being of a deceased person are deemed in law his heirs and assigns within the meaning of all trusts and powers.

"(3) The personal representatives shall be the representative of the deceased in regard to his real estate to which he was entitled for an interest not ceasing on his death as well as in regard to his personal estate."

Section 22 is in these words :—

"(1) A testator may appoint, and in default of such express appointment shall be deemed to have appointed, as his special executors in regard to settled land, the persons, if any, who are at his death the trustees of the settlement thereof, and probate may be granted to such trustees specially limited to the settled land. In this subsection 'settled land' means land vested in the testator which was settled previously to his death and not by his will.

"(2) A testator may appoint other persons either with or without such trustees as aforesaid or any of them to be his general executors in regard to his other property and assets."

Sections 2 (1) and 3 (4) of the same Act are of interest and have been considered by those who are advising the persons concerned. Section 3 (4), which I will mention later, touches the origin and quantum of the interest of the applicant in the lands in question.

"Settled land" and "settlement," as the terms are used in the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, have, by virtue of section 55 (xxiv.) of that Act, the same meaning as in the Settled Land Act, 1925.

Reference to the sections will show, as might be expected, that the will of John Gibbings was a "settlement," and that the land in question is "settled land." Section 7 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, provides for the devolution of settled land on the death of the tenant for life. Section 30 (1) specifies various classes of persons who are trustees of a settlement for the purposes of the Act, and in conjunction with other sections imposes obligations and provides for the exercise of powers in modes which clearly are intended to simplify the business of dealing with settled land. I do not discuss them here because I have not to define the rights and powers which a special executor acquires in respect of settled land, or which the law will confer in the present case, if the grant which is sought is made. I do not, however, find in the Settled Land Act, 1925, any sections which bear directly upon the enactment in the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, whereby that statute provides for a limited grant of probate in respect of settled land to a special executor. What has to be done is to ascertain whether the applicant is included in the class of persons to whom such a grant is to be made. The difficulty which has arisen in the Registry springs from a view which has been taken of the effect of the Settled Land Act, 1925, section 30 (1), the section which specifies the classes of persons who are trustees of settlements under that Act. Heretofore grants to special executors have been confined to applicants falling within the classes so defined in section 30 (1), whose qualifications in that respect existed at the death of the tenant for life. Other persons interested, including persons who become qualified to satisfy the conditions of section 30 (1) after the death of the tenant for life, have had made to them the grant of administration with the will annexed, upon clearing off special executors.

Section 30 (1) of the Settled Land Act, 1925, does not, in my judgment, limit the operation of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, sections 1 and 22, so as to exclude the present applicant. It does not purport to do so, and section 30 (3) appears to me to point to his inclusion. There is no doubt an important inter-connexion between the two statutes, and a link between them exists of which section 22 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, is a conspicuous instance.

Now the operation of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, ought not, on the one hand, to be limited by implications from outside its contents, or, on the other, to be extended beyond its clear intention. As to the latter consideration, in applying the provisions of the Act on a previous occasion, I pointed out that, apart from statute, an executor is appointed only to dispose of "the substance of the testator" (vide In re Pickering deceased, unreported. Judgment given July 13, 1927. Vide below).

Section 1 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, which substituted the personal representative for the heir-at-law as the immediate successor of the deceased person in respect of real estate, applies only, so far as real estate is concerned, to real estate to which the deceased was "entitled for an interest not ceasing on his death." So when section 22 provides for the appointment of special executors in regard to settled land it prima facie deals with settled land as to which some representative of the deceased must be appointed to discharge functions theretofore exercised by the deceased. Accordingly if the realty here in question was realty to which Amelia Gibbings was entitled for an interest not ceasing on her death the applicant is clearly within the provision of this statute.

Section 3 (4) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, which provides for the case of "a joint tenancy when another tenant survives the deceased," lays down that in such a case, "the interest of a deceased person is an interest ceasing at his death," but, when regard is had to other parts of the section, as for example subsection 2, and to the general tenor of the Act, it seems to me that subsection 4 is not intended to apply to realty vested in this testator for an estate in fee upon trusts which continue operative after the testator's death, to which section 22 applies. This being so, the applicant is entitled under the combined effect of sections 1 and 22 as a special executor to a grant of probate limited to the realty in question, he being trustee of the settlement of realty to which the deceased was entitled for an interest not ceasing on her death.

The grant will issue as a grant pursuant to the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, section 22, limited to the settled land (described in the affidavit used at the hearing), to which the deceased was entitled for an interest not ceasing on her death. I should have been glad to make an order in unqualified terms, but the matter is not simple. I have necessarily not had the advantage of hearing arguments, and interests so great depend upon cautious exercise of the jurisdiction to grant probate and administration that no justifiable safeguard can properly be omitted.

In ordering the costs of the application to come out of the estate, the President said that it was a case of some singularity. The trustees were placed in a difficult position, and the applicant was properly advised in the step which had been taken.

IN RE PICKERING DECEASED.

The following judgment was delivered in this case by LORD MERRIVALE, P., on July 13, 1927 :—This is a motion for revocation of a grant of probate made to an executor and for a grant in lieu thereof of probate to a special executor on grounds founded upon various statutory considerations. The dispute began with rival claims for a house and farm in Lincolnshire. It has become a quarrel as to procedure and more immediately as to costs.

The property in question—I will call it the settled land—was devised in 1866 by the will of Thomas Hunt, senior, to trustees, John Sindall and Sleight Hill, charged with certain obligations not now material, and subject thereto upon trust for his son, Thomas Hunt, junior, for life and after the death of Thomas Hunt for any widow of his for her life, and subject to these successive life interests in trust absolutely for such person or persons as Thomas Hunt, junior, should by his will appoint. The trustees, Sindall and Hill, were executors of the will.

Thomas Hunt, junior, died in 1878 and by his will appointed the trustees under his father's will his executors and trustees, and to them he devised the settled land upon trusts of limited operation now immaterial, and subject thereto upon trust to sell and distribute the proceeds of sale among named beneficiaries.

After the death of Thomas Hunt, junior, his widow, Emily Hunt, the then tenant for life, remarried and became Emily Pickering. She died on December 29, 1926, and by her will made in 1911 she named as her executrix her daughter, Emily Jane Graville, the respondent on this motion. The testatrix had been at her death nearly fifty years in possession of the settled land. Messrs. Sindall and Hill, the executors and trustees under the will of Thomas Hunt, senior, and Thomas Hunt, junior, respectively, for the deceased Emily Pickering appear to have abstained from any active interference with the settled land during the successive tenancies for life ; they did not appoint or obtain the appointment of any new trustees. The survivor of them, by a duly executed will in 1890 and admitted to probate in 1891, appointed executors, one of whom still survives. He is the applicant in this present motion, John Godby.

Mrs. Emily Pickering by her will devised to her daughter, the now respondent, all her real estate. The respondent appears to have supposed herself to be beneficially interested in, if not entitled to, the settled land. The rightful claimants, on whose behalf the present motion is made, took prompt action to assert their interests. On January 1, 1927, the applicant Godby, as executor of the executors of Thomas Hunt, junior, and Thomas Hunt, senior, in purported exercise of statutory powers under the Settled Land Act, 1925, appointed new trustees of the two wills, and their solicitors, without stating grounds for their claim, called on the respondent to deliver up possession of the settled land. The respondent's solicitors replied asserting a beneficial interest in her, and demanding a statement of the grounds of the claim for possession. A cautious correspondence, in which neither claimant gave much information, proceeded from February to June, and in the meantime the respondent sought probate of the will of her mother, Emily Pickering. Her affidavit to lead probate deposed to the existence as part of the estate of that testatrix of settled land, meaning thereby the settled land in question, and stated that of this settled land there were no surviving trustees.

Thereupon, on March 7, probate of the will of Emily Pickering was granted to the respondent "with administration of all the estate, including settled land, which by law devolves to and rests in the personal representative of the said deceased." This is the grant revocation of which is claimed by the applicant.

Counsel for the respondent was ready to admit at the hearing that she was not entitled to administer the settled land and was ready to consent to a limitation of her grant of probate, and the issue of a limited probate to the applicant, upon terms as to costs, which had been offered to the respondent earlier in the controversy. Except upon a misunderstanding of the respondent's rights it is difficult to realize why she obtained the grant which she in fact obtained. Under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, section 1 (1) (3), the real estate of her mother, which would devolve upon her as personal representative, is real estate to which the testatrix was entitled for an interest not ceasing on her death. Section 22, which provides for default in appointment by a testator of trustees of settled land as his special executors, appears not to help the respondent's case.

The grant of probate to the respondent as executrix under her mother's will must be reformed by excluding the reference therein to settled land.

The applicant has the advantage of the Settled Land Act, 1925, section 30 (3), whereby in case of a settlement created by will the personal representative of the deceased becomes until other trustees are appointed trustee of the settlement, and in due course he has availed himself of the provisions of the statutes to appoint additional trustees to act with him. "The deceased," in the present case, however, was not Emily Pickering, but Thomas Hunt, senior, of whom the applicant is personal representative by virtue of the chain of representation in successive executors long recognized in probate law and practice and now dealt with in the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, section 7. Section 30 (3) seems to me to give the applicant no support in his present application. Under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, section 22 (1), trustees of the settlement are rendered capable of appointment as special executors in respect of settled land, and a grant of probate is available for that purpose, but executorship of settled land seems to me to presuppose the existence in the testator, for whom an executor is to be appointed, of an interest not ceasing with the death of the testator. Apart from statutory provisions an executor is a person appointed by will to dispose of "the substance of the testator" (Wentworth on the Office of an Executor, Supplement). The settled land was not at any material time part (in this sense) of the substance of the testatrix, Mrs. Emily Pickering. It was, however, and is, part of the substance of the testator, Thomas Hunt, senior, and of the testator Thomas Hunt, junior. On all ordinary principles of construction and administration the personal representative of those testators or one of them would seem to be the material matter now.

As at present advised I see no requirement of the statute or other legitimate or useful purpose which would be served by the appointment of the applicant as special executor of the will of Emily Pickering. If for some reason not at present clear this appointment is seriously desired, the matter may be mentioned later.

There are, however, various means under the statutes, and, I think, under the ordinary powers of Courts of Equity, whereby the trustees can secure necessary and proper powers additional to those which they already have.

Two questions remain in respect of which I took time for consideration—that of procedure in such cases and that of costs.

As to procedure, this case has satisfied me that it ought not to be possible by a common form application to obtain without the precaution of notice to interested parties a grant of special executorship for the purposes intended to be served by the manifold far-reaching provisions as to the administration of settled property which are now embodied in the Settled Land Act, 1925, aided by the powers contained in the Administration of Estates Act, 1925. Where an executor is appointed by the will of a testator to administer the substance of that testator and also as a special executor in respect of settled land, as to the disposal of which the testator had a right of control, a grant of probate in common form seems to me to go to its fullest extent, consistently with prudent regard for the rights of beneficiaries. Where the question is one of appointment of a special executor for one or some of the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925, it will be safer that such an appointment should be made after proper notice to parties immediately interested.

As to costs, the motion of the applicant to revoke the grant to the respondent of special executorship as to settled land was warranted by the facts. That, indeed, was not seriously contested at the hearing, but the applicant also demanded a revocation of the legitimate grant of probate to the respondent of the executorship of her mother's will. A tendency to proceed to extremities marked some of the actions of both the parties from an early period. On the whole, I prefer to leave them to reimburse themselves, if they lawfully can, from assets at their disposal.

I make no order as to costs.

Mr. J. A. Reid appeared for the applicant, and Mr. Noel Middleton for the respondent.

HONG-KONG AND SHANGHAI BANKING CORPORATION v. LO LEE SHI.*

Bankers—Bank-note—Accidental destruction—Partial reconstruction of fragments — Oral evidence—Number of note missing—Liability of bank on note—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 64.

The Board held that in the special circumstances of the case it was possible for the holder in due course of a bank-note, which by accident had been almost destroyed, to establish by means of the fragments, assisted by oral evidence, a claim against the bank for the amount due upon the note, although the number of the note was missing.

This was an appeal by the Hong-kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Hong-kong relating to the liability of the appellants to pay one of their bank-notes which had been accidentally mutilated and partly destroyed.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. J. Forster appeared for the appellants ; the respondent was not represented.

Lord Buckmaster, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said :—Their Lordships notice with approval that this case has been brought before them for consideration within 12 months of its first hearing before the Puisne Judge in Hong-kong. They wish that this example of expedition was widely known and imitated. The point that arises for decision is singularly free from authority, but fortunately the facts are beyond dispute. The appellants are the Hong-kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, who carry on the business of banking in Hong-kong. In the course of their business they issue bank-notes for various sums ; such notes are not legal currency but, owing to the high credit of the appellants, they are used as if they were. The bank is under liability to the Government of Hong-kong to deposit dollars as against all notes issued over a certain amount, and a tax is payable at the rate of 1 per cent. per annum on the value of notes in circulation. Apart from these conditions, which it may be assumed would apply to every bank in Hong-kong, the appellants have no special relationship with the Government at all. The notes they issue are in the ordinary form of a bank-note. The name of the bank is at the head, the amount of the note is written in figures in the right- and left hand corners. In the middle of the document the number of the note appears in two places on the same line, one on each side , below this there comes the promise to pay the bearer on demand at the office of the bank the amount of dollars, stated in words, for which the note is issued. Underneath this promise the value of the note appears again in large light letters, over which is written "Hong-kong" followed by a date, and then "by order of the Board of Directors" with the signature of the chief accountant and the chief manager.

Lo Lee Shi, who is the respondent in this appeal, was given by her husband two of such notes, each for $500. She placed them in the pocket of some garment and then, having forgotten their hiding-place, she washed, dried, and starched the garment and was proceeding to iron it when she found a wad of paper in the pocket. This upon extraction proved to be the remains of the two bank-notes which, together with the coat, had been subjected to all the above processes. Considerable effort was made, with the help of the bank, to restore these agglutinated fragments to their original shape and, as to one note, this met with complete success and the note was accordingly paid. The full restoration of the other was more difficult ; with the utmost skill the number could not be recovered. Apart from this, a very considerable portion of the note was replaced and its most critical characteristics were made plain—the name of the bank, the amount of the note, the definite promise to pay the "Bearer" on demand at the appellants' office, and the signatures by the chief accountant and the chief manager were all clearly and definitely evidenced. The bank, however, refused payment mainly upon the ground that the number was missing and Lo Lee Shi accordingly brought an action against them upon the note. The Judge on the trial of the action found in favour of the plaintiff. On appeal to the full Court the Judges were divided, the Chief Justice being in favour of the defence and the Trial Judge who formed the other member of the Court affirming his own judgment. The bank, anxious to know their true legal position with regard to a note whose number was defaced, brought this appeal, but the respondent, deterred no doubt by fear of cost, has not appeared. The case has, however, been fully and carefully placed before the Board, who see no reason to think that any relevant matter escaped their attention. The real point of controversy is this. In the circumstances above stated are the appellants liable on a note whose number has been accidentally defaced ? The case to which most consideration was given both in the earlier Courts and in argument on the appeal was the case of Suffell v. Bank of England (9 Q.B.D., 555), but their Lordships think that apart from certain dicta the actual decision is of little assistance. In that case certain Bank of England notes had been intentionally and fraudulently altered by changing a 5 in the numbers to a 3. After this alteration the notes having come into the hands of a perfectly innocent holder, he presented them for payment to the bank, which refused to honour them on the ground that the change in the number effected a material alteration in the document by virtue of which their liability was discharged. The action was brought upon the notes. The Court of Appeal decided in favour of the bank but the grounds of their decision were these : First, that according to old and indisputable law the alteration of a deed in a material respect avoided the document ; secondly, that this doctrine had become extended to ordinary written documents and was applicable to bills of exchange and promissory notes ; and thirdly, that upon a Bank of England note, which the bank was bound to issue against bullion and which by law was currency, the alteration of the number was a material alteration.

The authority for the first two of these propositions needs no further investigation ; for those interested in the subject the history of the principles will be found fully examined in the judgments of the learned Judges in the case referred to, but since the date of that decision the law has been summarised in section 64 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the terms of which are literally reproduced for Hong-kong in the Bills of Exchange Ordinance, 1885, section 64, in the following terms :—

"Alteration of Bill."

"64.—(1) Where a bill or acceptance is materially altered without the assent of all parties liable on the bill, the bill is avoided except as against a party who has himself made, authorized, or assented to the alteration, and subsequent indorsers. Provided that, where a bill has been materially altered, but the alteration is not apparent, and the bill is in the hands of a holder in due course, such holder may avail himself of the bill as if it had not been altered, and may enforce payment of it according to its original tenor.

"(2) In particular the following alterations are material—namely, any alteration of the date, the sum payable, the time of payment, the place of payment, and, where a bill has been accepted generally, the addition of a place of payment without the acceptor's assent."

Both the history of the law which this section enunciates and the terms of the section itself show that it relates only to alterations effected by the will of the person by whom or under whose directions they are made, and that it does not apply to a change due to pure accident.

The alteration contemplated is one to which all parties might assent. It is not reasonable to assume parties assenting to a part of the document being effaced by the operations of a mouse, by the hot end of a cigarette, or by any of the other means by which accidental disfigurement can be effected. Again, the provision which excepts from the category of persons against whom the bill is avoided, a party who has "himself made, authorized, or assented" to the alteration cannot reasonably apply to the ravages of a rat, a white ant, or any other animal pest. The fact that the change is accidental in itself negatives the possibility of assent.

The case of Davidson v. Cooper (13 L.J. Exch., 276) emphasizes the point, since there Lord Denman states that the party who may suffer if a document is avoided by alteration has no right to complain since there cannot be any alteration except through fraud or laches on his part, meaning a fraudulent alteration, effected by the party, or carelessness permitting it to be effected by another. It is not in that section that the solution of this difficulty is to be found, and yet it is upon the authority of the case which depended on this law that the learned Chief Justice bases his judgment, holding that the accidental obliteration of the number was an alteration within the meaning of the section and that the case quoted showed that such alteration was material. It is therefore necessary to determine this case apart from the ordinance, and in this connexion their Lordships do not think the question of negligence plays any part. The right of a party to sue on the note in the event of its being defaced by fire or attacked by a mouse cannot depend upon whether it had been placed in a fire-proof or a mouse-proof safe or left in an ordinary box. When once honest accident is accepted as the cause of damage, the only remaining question is whether the extent of the damage is such as to prevent the note from being sued upon, and it may be also whether the missing material parts can be supplied by oral evidence, though that question does not now arise. In the first instance, therefore, it is essential to investigate whether there is enough of the note remaining to establish its identity as a note of the bank, and to contain all the necessary elements that render it valid and effectual as a negotiable document. To some extent this must depend upon oral evidence as well as upon the pieces of the document. These pieces must be identified, their condition must be explained, and they must of course be shown to be parts of one and the same instrument. In this case every one of these conditions has been satisfied. It is, indeed, not denied that the pieces are pieces of one of the appellants' notes, nor is it, nor could it be, suggested that the missing particles could be used in building up another note. It is the absence of the number on which the appellants rely, and this is no part of the operative portion of a bill of exchange or promissory note, although its alteration was held to be material in the case of a Bank of England note, owing to its special features. (See per Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, at p. 563, and per Lord Justice Cotton at p. 575 of Suffell v. Bank of England, supra.) Alteration, within the meaning of the statute, is not what has taken place here—and apart from this, it is difficult to see what has destroyed the liability of the bank upon a document admitted to be one of their notes. Lord Justice Brett states (at p. 566 and p. 568) that the number even of a Bank of England note is no part of the contract, and its alteration does not affect the contract, and Lord Justice Cotton, at page 574, appears to take the same view, though the Master of the Rolls leaves the question open. In their Lordships' opinion the contract here has never been altered and is sufficiently evidenced by the mutilated document and the oral testimony. Their Lordships do not think that beyond their decision as to the meaning of the ordinance it is possible in this case to lay down any general principles of law; they desire their judgment to be limited to this point, that in the special circumstances of this case it is possible, by means of the fragments of the document assisted by oral evidence, to establish a claim against the bank for the $500 due upon the note and that accordingly this appeal should be dismissed, and they will humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

LEE v. S. AND J. BRECKMAN, LIMITED.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident—Arising out of and in the course of the employment—Assault—Special risk of the employment—Whether "arising out of."

When the appellant, a porter employed by the respondents, who were upholsterers, was engaged in carrying furniture from the respondents' premises to a railway company's van, an altercation arose between the appellant and the carter in charge of the van, and the latter assaulted the appellant with the result that the appellant's eye was so injured that it had to be removed. On an application for compensation the Judge found that the assault, which he assumed to have been unprovoked, though an accident arising in the course of the employment, did not arise out of it, as the appellant was not exposed by his employment to the risk of being assaulted and it was not his employment that brought that risk upon him. The Judge therefore made an award in favour of the respondents.

Held, that as the Judge had found that no special risk of being assaulted attached to the employment and that it was not the employment that brought the risk upon the appellant, and as these were questions of fact, the Judge's award must be affirmed.

This was an appeal by a workman from an award of his Honour Judge Cluer, sitting at Shoreditch County Court as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Acts. The appellant, Henry Lee, who was a porter employed by the respondents, Messrs. S. and J. Breckman, Limited, upholsterers, of Hoxton-street, N.1, claimed compensation for accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. The circumstances were unusual.

* Reported by H. Langford Lewis, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On September 19, 1927, he was engaged in carrying furniture to a van outside the respondents' premises. The van, which belonged to the London Midland and Scottish Railway, had been detailed to collect the furniture, and had been waiting for the load for a considerable time in charge of a carter named Debuse, who had frequently collected goods from the respondents and was well known to the appellant. The appellant, having put some furniture in the van, said to Debuse : "Are you going to give us a bit of a chance to-night ?" suggesting that he should help the respondents' men to finish their work early. Debuse replied : "Why, you're moaning again." The appellant said : "I'm not moaning ; I want to get done early. You're not like a union man." An altercation then arose, Debuse jumped down from the van, and, as the appellant was going back to the door, hit him three successive blows in the face. The third blow struck him in the eye, which was so injured that it had to be removed. Debuse was prosecuted and convicted of assault. The appellant claimed compensation. Judge Cluer found that the assault, which he assumed to have been unprovoked, though an accident arising in the course of the employment, did not arise out of it as the appellant was not exposed by his employment to the risk of being assaulted, and it was not his employment which brought that risk upon him. The Judge made an award in favour of the respondents. The appellant appealed under the Poor Persons Rules.

Mr. F. Soskice appeared for the appellant ; Mr. W. Shakespeare for the respondents.

The Master of the Rolls (Lord Hanworth), in giving judgment, stated the facts and said that counsel for the appellant had contended that the judgment given was not in accordance with the authorities on assault cases, but that if it were the authorities were not exhaustive, and that on principle the appellant was entitled to compensation. He had cited a number of authorities.

In Trim Joint District School Board of Management v. Kelly (30 The Times L.R., 452 ; [1914] A.C., 667) it was held that a schoolmaster, who had aroused the hostility of his pupils and who was so injured by them in consequence of a pre-arranged plan that he died, came within the Act. He had been appointed to rule over unruly pupils, and, therefore, there was a risk that he would be assaulted and injured. The decision of the House of Lords was not unanimous, but that was the effect of the case. Another case was that of Reid v. British and Irish Steam Packet Company (37 The Times L.R., 362 ; [1921] 2 K.B., 319), where a foreman of dock labourers, employed to superintend labour of a very rough class, was assaulted by one of the workmen whom he had reprimanded and was held entitled to compensation. In Parker v. Federal Steam Navigation Company (18 B.W.C.C., 469), a recent case, a stoker was attacked by an undisciplined African employed in the same ship, a man of savage nature, and it was held that there was evidence to support the decision of the County Court Judge that the accident arose out of the employment.

An assault, though unexpected, might arise out of the employment where the nature of the employment was such as to involve the possible risk of assault.

Mr. Soskice's second point was that the decided cases had not gone far enough, and that the appellant was entitled to recover though there was no active causation between the employment and the assault, and he supported his argument by a reference to Lord Haldane's judgment in Upton v. Great Central Railway Company (40 The Times L.R., 204 ; [1924] A.C., 302), where he said (at p. 308) :—

"The question is whether circumstances such as I have referred to may be found among the causal conditions of the accident. These may have amounted to no more than passive and inert surroundings, requisite only to provide circumstances which admitted of the accident being occasioned by his own movement. Active physical causation by the surroundings is not required in order to satisfy what is implied by the expression 'arising out of the employment.'"

In that case the words were used of a man who slipped on a platform while about to enter a train in the course of his employment. He (the Master of the Rolls) was somewhat sceptical as to the utility of arguing from judgments in cases decided on quite a different state of facts. And there was little doubt that there had been passages in the judgments of Lord Haldane which were not altogether easy to follow or to reconcile, as in Thom (or Simpson) v. Sinclair (33 The Times L.R., 247 ; [1917] A.C., 127). where he suggested a rule as to the proximate cause of an accident. And Lord Shaw there said that the expression "arising out of the employment" was not confined to the nature of the employment, but applied also to its conditions, its obligations, and its incidents. A better test was given by Lord Dunedin in Upton v. Great Central Railway Company (supra), where he said : "The course of employment connotes, to my mind, the idea that the workman or servant is doing something which is part of his service to his employer or master." There might be cases in which there was a special risk of such an accident as this attached to the work, and it was a question of fact in each case whether such a risk existed ; per Lord Justice Scrutton in Reid v. British and Irish Steam Packet Company (supra) and Lord Justice Atkin in Parker v. Federal Steam Navigation Company (supra).

It might have been the case that there was a special risk attaching to this particular employment, and that the workman in receiving the assault was doing something of service to his employers. But here the County Court Judge had clearly found that there was no special risk attaching to the employment, and that it was not the employment which brought the risk upon the appellant. He had negatived both the special risk and the rule laid down by Lord Dunedin. Although the Court of Appeal was not a tribunal to decide on the facts, he would say incidentally that he should have arrived at the same conclusion of fact himself. The appeal must be dismissed, but without costs, as it was a case under the Poor Persons Rules.

Lord Justice Atkin.—This is an unusual case of a workman sustaining serious injury by assault. Such cases give rise to interesting questions of law and fact. I am not quite satisfied that the law is altogether settled, but I think it is sufficiently settled by a number of cases in the Court of Appeal that in order that a person may recover he must show that his employment subjected him in a special degree to a risk of assault—a degree of liability to be assaulted such as would not be present if he were not in the employment. Those cases are Parker v. Federal Steam Navigation Company (18 B.W.C.C., 469), where a British stoker was assaulted by an African stoker, and Reid v. British and Irish Steam Packet Company (37 The Times L.R., 362 ; [1921] 2 K.B., 319).

In the latter case, to which I was a party, the Judge had found such a risk, and it seemed to me that the workman was entitled. I think there is also authority in the Court of Appeal for saying that the risk must be incidental to the employment. Mitchinson v. Day Brothers (29 The Times L.R., 267 ; [1913] 1 K.B., 603) was a case where a carter was assaulted by a drunken man and died of the injuries, and it was held that the carter's dependants were not entitled to compensation. The correctness of this decision has been doubted by Viscount Haldane, and Mr. Soskice has argued that Upton v. Great Central Railway Company (40 The Times L.R., 204 ; [1924] A.C., 302) has decided that active physical causation by the surroundings is not required. I do not find it necessary to decide the proposition put before us by Mr. Soskice, though there is a great deal to be said for the argument. For instance, it seems curious that a bank messenger carrying money, if assaulted and robbed, can recover, but an ordinary man assaulted in the mistaken belief that he is carrying money, cannot. But here, if the Judge had taken the view that the man owed a duty to his employers to suggest that the van-driver should hurry up, and was assaulted in consequence of making the suggestion, he might have been in a position to award compensation. Here it seems that the Judge has dealt with both branches of the law in this case and has found no such risk of being assaulted incidental to the upholstery business, and has also found that the assault did not arise out of the employment. Without deciding the point put before us by counsel for the appellant, it is sufficient to say that the Judge had ample evidence on which he could find that the assault was not connected with the employment. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE.—I agree. On pushing Mr. Soskice's argument to its logical conclusion, it comes to this, that the learned Judge, in any case where a workman incurs the opprobrium of another person and is assaulted while at work, is bound to hold that the injury is one to which the Act applies. That is putting the argument much too high. It is quite clear on the authorities that it was open to the Judge to find that the injury did not arise out of the employment. The Judge had ample evidence before him, and the evidence shows that he could come to that decision.

TATTERSALL v. SLADEN.*

Dentists — Register — Retention of name—Annual fee—Non-payment—Regulation providing for removal of name—Whether intra vires—Dentists Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 21), s. 7.

By s. 7 of the Dentists Act, 1921, the Dental Board may make regulations as to keeping a register of dentists, as to removal from the register and restoration thereto, and as to prescribing a fee for retaining thereon in any year the names of persons registered after July 27, 1921, but the Act contained no provision for removing from the register the name of a person failing to pay the fee for retention.

The Board made a regulation providing that an annual fee of £5 should be paid for retaining on the register the name of any person registered after the above date and that unless it was paid before December 31 the Registrar should remove the name from the register.

Held, that as non-retention on the register was a necessary consequence of non-payment of the fee for retention the regulation was within the powers conferred by the Act.

This action was, in form, an action for the dissolution of the partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant, practising as dentists, on the ground that the defendant's name had been removed from the Dentists' Register and that the plaintiff was entitled for that reason to give notice of dissolution. In fact, the action was a friendly test action brought by arrangement for the decision of the question whether the Registrar of the Dental Board of the United Kingdom was entitled to remove the defendant's name from the Dentists' Register on account of his failure to pay, for the retention of his name on the register for the year 1927, the annual fee of £5 prescribed by the regulations of the board. The action was heard on an agreed statement of facts. The facts were not of importance except that the defendant did not pay the retention fee for 1927 and that his name was removed from the Dentists' Register on January 18, 1927. The articles of partnership contained a clause whereby, in such an event, the other partner might determine the partnership by notice, and the plaintiff duly gave such notice.

There was a difference of opinion between the Law Officers in England and the Lord Advocate in Scotland as to the validity of the regulation in question, and the action was brought by arrangement with the Dental Board for a judicial decision of the matter.

There was no statutory regulation of the practice of dentistry before the Dentists Act, 1878. By that Act it was provided that no person should use the title of "dentist" or "dental practitioner" unless he had been registered under the Act. The register was to be kept by the Registrar appointed by the General Medical Council and was to contain the names of the persons duly qualified under the Act to practise dentistry. The Act provided for the payment of a fee not exceeding £5 for the registration of any person, but there was no provision for the payment of any fee for the retention of a name on the register. It was provided that all fees under the Act might be recovered as ordinary debts due to the General Medical Council.

Owing to a decision of the House of Lords in Bellerby v. Heyworth (26 The Times L.R., 403 ; [1910] A.C., 377) as to the meaning of the words "qualified to practise dentistry," the Act of 1878 became to a large extent inoperative to exclude from the practice of dentistry unregistered persons, and the Dentists Act, 1921, was passed.

Under that Act no person might practise dentistry unless he was on the register. A statutory corporation was created called the Dental Board of the United Kingdom, whose duty it was to keep the register, and the powers and duties of the General Medical Council were transferred to the board. By section 7, the board might make regulations, inter alia, (a) as to making and keeping the register ; (b) as to the removal of persons from the register and for restoration thereto ; and (c) as to prescribing a fee not exceeding £5 for retention on the register in any year of persons registered after July 27, 1921. Those regulations had to be approved by the General Medical Council and the Privy Council, and had to be laid before both Houses of Parliament. Regulations were duly made by the board and duly approved and laid before Parliament. It was provided that an annual fee of £5 for the retention of a name on the register of any person registered after July 27, 1921, should be paid before December 31 in each year, and that unless it was paid the Registrar should forthwith remove the name from the register; and the name of any person so removed might, in certain circumstances, be restored upon application being made. The Act of 1878 was still in force, except where specially repealed by the Act of 1921.

Mr. Maugham, K.C., and Mr. Eardley-Wilmot appeared for the plaintiff; Sir Thomas Hughes, K.C., Mr. J. V. Nesbitt, and Mr. J. R. Butterfield for the defendant.

Mr. MAUGHAM, after stating the circumstances in which the action was brought, said that the defendant, having been registered after July 27, 1921, was subject to the regulation. He said that as the board had, by the Act, power to prescribe a fee for retention, it was a necessary implication that if the fee was not paid the person was not entitled to remain on the register. The regulations, having been approved and laid before Parliament, had statutory effect even though the question of removal from the register was not provided for by the Act. He cited Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood (10 The Times L.R., 527; [1894] A.C., 347), where the House of Lords dealt with somewhat similar regulations. He submitted that statutory regulations when duly passed could not be criticized or disputed.

SIR THOMAS HUGHES, for the defendant, said that the matter was one of great importance, as removal from the register meant excluding a man from practising his profession. Under the Act of 1878 a man paid his fee to be registered, and no further fees were payable. There was no power of removal for non-payment of fees. The Acts had to be read together. There must be found something express in the Act of 1921 to justify removal. There was nothing to that effect in the Act itself. The payment of the fees was merely for the benefit of the Dental Board, and was only a fiscal question. The fees might be recovered as a debt under section 40 of the 1878 Act. That being so, the regulations in this respect were ultra vires. It was not a necessary implication that if the fees were not paid the person in default should be removed from the register. The observations of the House of Lords in Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood (supra) were really obiter dicta. Here the power of removal for non-payment of the retention fee was not within the ambit of the Act of 1921.

MR. JUSTICE ASTBURY, in giving judgment, said that the short point was whether the regulations were valid or not. He read the relevant sections of the Acts of 1878 and 1921. Under section 7 of the Act of 1921 the Dental Board had a general power of making and erasing entries in the register, and had power to prescribe a fee for retention of the name on the register for any year and to make regulations as to such fees. The defendant here was registered after the Act of 1921 was passed, and he was subject to section 7.

The regulations, after they were made by the Dental Board and before they came into force, had to undergo very strict scrutiny and consideration by the General Medical Council and the Privy Council, and had to be laid before the Houses of Parliament, which could disapprove of them. The regulations in question had been approved and duly passed. Under them the name of a person who had not paid his retention fee could be removed, and could be restored under certain provisions.

It was not denied that a retention fee could be charged and recovered, but it was suggested that, as removal was a penal or stringent restriction, a person's name could not be erased from the register for non-payment of the retention fee unless the Act contained a distinct provision to that effect. There was no such distinct provision in the Act of 1921. It seemed to him that if a man did not pay the fee to retain his name on the register there was no alternative but to take the name off. If that were so, the defence must fail.

In Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood (10 The Times L.R., 527; [1894] A.C., 347) no doubt, in a sense, the speeches were not necessary to the actual point on which the appeal was decided, but they were applicable to the question to be decided here. In many respects the case went beyond the present case. Here the board was the body to make the regulations, the subject of the regulations was expressly provided, and the regulations had to be scrutinized and approved by many bodies. He thought that the regulations here were intra vires. Non-retention on the register was a necessary consequence of non-payment of the fee for retention. The plaintiff must succeed in his action, and it must be declared that the defendant, by non-payment of his fee, was liable to be removed from the register.

RILEY BROS. (HALIFAX), LIMITED v. HALLIMOND.*

Adulteration — False warranty — "Rum and butter toffee" — Addition of coconut fat — Conviction affirmed.

The appellants, who manufactured an article called "Riley's Rum and Butter Toffee," supplied it to a confectioner with a warranty, and on analysis it was found to contain rum and butter, and coconut fat. On a summons against the appellants for giving false warranty there was evidence that toffee made partly with coconut fat had been sold for years as "rum and butter toffee." The justices convicted the appellants.

Held (Talbot, J., dissenting), that the description "butter toffee" implied that no fat, except butter, was used in the manufacture, and therefore the conviction must be affirmed.

This was a case stated by justices sitting at Bishop Auckland, Durham, who convicted the appellants and fined them 40s. on an information under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts for giving a false warranty in respect of "rum and butter toffee."

The respondent, an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, bought from a retail confectioner for analysis a tin of "Riley's Rum and

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Butter Toffee" and complied with the required formalities. After analysis of the toffee a summons was taken out against the confectioner for selling to the prejudice of the purchaser an article not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser. The manufacturers, the present appellants, then took responsibility, for they had supplied it with a warranty, and these proceedings were then instituted against them for giving a false warranty.

The analysis showed that the toffee in question contained both rum and butter, and had the flavour of both, but that it contained, in addition, a certain larger percentage of coconut fat, which was used to prevent the consistency of the toffee from being unduly sticky. The coconut fat was nutritious and harmless. There was evidence that the flavour of rum and butter could be produced by synthetic flavours, and in that case it would be properly called "rum and butter flavoured toffee," but not "rum and butter toffee." Toffee made with no fat but butter would be greasy both to touch and taste, and toffee made in part with coconut fat had been sold for years as "rum and butter toffee."

Mr. Lowenthal, K.C., and Mr. Hallett appeared for the appellants; Mr. G. Russell Vick for the respondent.

Mr. Justice Talbot said that the majority of the Court were in favour of supporting the conviction, but he was unable to arrive at that conclusion. He thought "rum and butter toffee" meant toffee with a substantial amount of rum and butter in it, and that the appellants should have been acquitted.

Mr. Justice Branson thought that the conviction was right. The case turned on the construction of the description given by the appellants. Toffee was something which could be made with various fats, and if toffee was described as "butter toffee" he thought butter was indicated as the fat used exclusively.

Mr. Justice Avory delivered judgment agreeing with Mr. Justice Branson.

IN RE LORD ARMAGHDALE—CRAIG v. LADY ARMAGHDALE.*

Will — Annuity — Super-tax — Annuity free of super-tax up to certain sum—Additional income of annuitant—Amount of super-tax payable by the trustees.

By his will a testator bequeathed to his wife an annuity of such a sum as, after allowing for income-tax at the highest rate for the time being and for super-tax, would yield her, free of all such tax, a cumulative net yearly sum of £3,500, and directed that there should be no apportionment of super-tax between the annuity and the rest of his wife's income, but that the whole of the super-tax payable by his wife up to but not exceeding super-tax on £3,500 a year, with the income-tax thereon added to it, should be attributed to the annuity and paid by his trustees.

Held, that the trustees were not liable to repay to the annuitant out of residue a sum arrived at on the footing that the annuity was to bear the highest rates of super-tax payable on the annuitant's total income, but were liable for no more than what would be payable on a super-taxable sum of £3,500 with the income-tax added thereto—namely, at the present rate of income-tax, £4,200. With the present exemption, from super-tax, of the first £2,000 of the income the trustees would thus have to pay the super-tax payable on a total income of £6,200.

By clause 7 of his will the testator left to his widow an annuity and gave his trustees certain directions as to the payment of super-tax. This summons, which was taken out by the trustees, asked: "Whether for the purpose of ascertaining the amount or rate of the super-tax payable by the trustees the said annuity ought to be treated as the last or highest part of the total income of the said Baroness Armaghdale or how otherwise the super-tax payable by the said trustees should be ascertained." Clause 7 of the will was in these terms: "I also bequeath to my said wife during her widowhood an annuity of such a sum as after allowing for income-tax at the highest rate for the time being, and also after allowing for super-tax or any other additional tax in the nature of income-tax, will yield her free of all such tax a cumulative net yearly sum of £3,500. And I direct that as regards super-tax no apportionment thereof shall be made between the said annuity and the rest of my wife's income, but that the whole of the super-tax payable by my wife up to but not exceeding super-tax on £3,500 a year with the income-tax thereon added thereto shall be attributed to the annuity hereby bequeathed and be paid by my trustees accordingly."

Mr. A. L. Ellis appeared for the trustees; Mr. Wilfrid Greene, K.C., and Mr. Evershed for Lady Armaghdale; and Mr. Fairfax Luxmoore, K.C., and Mr. Roxburgh for the residuary legatee.

Mr. Justice Russell.—The will is dated November 21, 1921, and it seems reasonably clear that the testator through his legal advisers was aware of a case decided by Mr. Justice Sargant in 1919—namely, the case of In re Bowring (34 The Times L.R., 575; [1918] W.N., 265). In that case the testator made a will in which there were the following clauses: "(1) I give to my wife, during her life, an annuity of £4,000, free of duty and of income-tax, super-tax, and any other tax or impost of that nature, to the intent that she shall receive the sum of £4,000 net per annum, commencing from the time of my death," and payable quarterly. Then clause 13 provided: "During the life of my wife . . . my trustees shall apply the income of the trust fund in the manner and order following:—(i) In payment of the annuity hereinbefore given to my wife and the income-tax and other taxes thereon. . . ." Sub-clauses (ii) to (iv) directed payment of other annual sums. Lady Bowring, the testator's widow, had a separate gross income of her own quite outside the will, of £1,637 a year, and a summons was taken out by the trustees, or by four of the five trustees, against Lady Bowring who was the other trustee and an annuitant for the determination of the question "whether the super-tax directed by the will to be paid on the annuity given to Lady Bowring ought to be calculated on the annuity with or without reference to any other income receivable by her during the period on which the super-tax was to be paid, or how otherwise the tax ought to be calculated." Mr. Justice Sargant, in his judgment, after pointing out that the difficulty arose owing to the different rates payable in respect of super-tax, super-tax being payable in respect of no particular sums but in respect of the whole income, and pointing out also the difficulty arising owing to the income being free of income-tax and super-tax, proceeded as follows: "It was quite obvious there were three ways at least, though no more than three had been suggested to him, in which the super-tax on the £4,000 that had to be paid by the trustees might be calculated. One might take the £4,000 as if it were the sole source of Lady Bowring's income. In that case £2,500"—that was the sum which then escaped the super-tax, it is now £2,000—"would escape super-tax altogether, on £500 there would be super-tax paid at a comparatively low rate, and on the next £1,000 super-tax would be paid at a higher rate. If that were done the result would be that the higher rates of tax would be thrown exclusively on the additional outside income, and the trustees who had to pay the £4,000 free of super-tax would only have to pay super-tax on the last £1,500 of the £4,000." Putting it shortly, that first alternative is treating the annuity as the bottom slice of the total income of the annuitant. Then the learned Judge continued: "Another method which appeared startling in the other direction was that the trustees should take the additional income as being Lady Bowring's sole income; that they therefore should consider themselves not bound to pay any super-tax on that; and, as regarded the £4,000, that they should consider that was exempted from super-tax only to the extent of the difference between the amount of additional income and £2,500, and that then they should say that the remaining £3,200 or £3,300 bore super-tax at the progressively increasing rates, the result of which would be that a large amount would have to be paid by them in respect of super-tax, and that in effect there would be no charge made against Lady Bowring at all in respect of super-tax on her outside income." That is what is sometimes conveniently called the top slice. Then the third and intermediate course "in favour of which he should give judgment was that the super-tax should be charged rateably as between the outside income on the one hand and the £4,000—increased, of course, by the fact that that was free of income-tax—on the other hand, so that the rateable proportion of each source of income would be free of tax up to £2,500, and that a rateable proportion of each of the successive increases of income beyond that amount would be also free of super-tax. Whichever of the three courses was adopted it seemed to him that Lady Bowring would be getting her £4,000 a year net. The only question was really the position which the income of £4,000 a year occupied in her budget as compared with the position of the outside income which she had from her own independent resources, and when he had spoken of outside income and the £4,000 a year he had not complicated the matter by speaking of the £100 annuity which she got as a trustee of the will because that, of course, must be dealt with on the same basis. He did not see any reason why the Court should in fact marshal either the annuity income or the independent income so as to say that that income came either first or last in the total income of Lady Bowring"—and he decided in favour of what has been called the aliquot proportions. That decision, as indicated, points out that there were three possible alternatives—namely, (1) for the trustees to pay out of residue what would be the amount of super-tax payable if the annuitant had no income from other sources, (2) for the trustees to repay out of residue to the annuitant a sum arrived at on the footing that the annuity was to bear the highest rates of super-tax payable on the annuitant's total income, and (3) that the super-tax payable on the annuitant's total income should be charged rateably as between the annuitant's outside income on the one hand, and the annuity on the other. Mr. Justice Sargant held that the third course was the proper one to adopt; and he re-affirmed that view in In re Doxat ([1920] W.N., 262).

* Reported by J. B. B. MacMahon, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By the special provisions of this will the alternative adopted in In re Bowring (supra) is excluded. There is to be no apportionment. What course then is to be adopted? Lady Armaghdale claims that the second method should be followed—that has been referred to as the top slice method—namely, that the trustees should repay to her out of residue a sum equivalent to the super-tax paid on so much of her total income as pays the highest rates, and amounts to the figure of £3,500. This claim is based on the wording of the gift, according to which it is said she has to have yielded to her free of all super-tax a net yearly sum of £3,500. In In re Bowring (supra) Mr. Justice Sargant pointed out, and I think rightly, that whatever alternative is adopted no super-tax is being paid in respect of the annuity by the annuitant; she is getting it net, that is, free from super-tax. It is, however, argued before me that unless the top slice theory is adopted, Lady Armaghdale will in fact be paying, after recoupment, a larger sum for super-tax in respect of her total income than she would have paid had no annuity been bequeathed to her by the will, and accordingly to the extent of such excess she is out of pocket and will not have the net additional sum of £3,500 per annum in her purse. That may be so; no figures are in evidence; but my task is to construe the testator's language, and if that be reasonably clear to decide accordingly.

What the testator has done is to say there is to be no apportionment, but another procedure is to be followed which he describes—namely, the trustees are to pay the whole of his wife's super-tax but with a limit, and the limit is super-tax on a sum of £3,500 a year with the income-tax thereon added thereto, which by the way is an amount different from the sum which after deduction of income-tax therefrom will produce £3,500. In other words the testator has fixed a limit to the amount which the trustees have to pay Lady Armaghdale in recoupment of what she pays for super-tax—namely, the trustees are not to pay her more than what would be payable on a supertaxable sum of £3,500 with the income-tax added thereto. At the present rate of income-tax the supertaxable sum will be £4,200. The trustees are to ascertain what would be the amount of super-tax payable on a supertaxable sum of £4,200, that is to say, with the existing £2,000 exemption, what would be the super-tax payable on a total income of £6,200. To that extent, but no further, is Lady Armaghdale to be recouped the super-tax payable by her.

The costs of all parties will be paid out of the residuary estate, and, if the residuary legatee does not object, as between solicitor and client.

Court of Arches. (Sir Lewis Dibdin, Dean of Arches.) } 1928. Jan. 24.

RECTOR AND WARDENS OF ST. NICHOLAS ACONS v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Ecclesiastical Law — Disused churchyard — Erection of electric transformer chamber—Whether a "building"—Refusal of sanction —Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict., c. 72), s. 3.

By s. 3 of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, "After the passing of this Act it shall not be lawful to erect any buildings upon any disused burial ground, except for the purpose of enlarging a church, chapel, meeting-house, or other places of worship."

By reason of this enactment the Court refused to sanction an agreement for the construction, by an electric lighting company, of a transformer chamber in a disused churchyard, holding that the proposed structure would be a building and therefore came within the prohibition.

In re St. Nicholas Cole Abbey ([1893] P., 58) disapproved.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Chancellor of the Diocese of London (Mr. F. H. L. Errington). The Chancellor had rejected a petition for the sanction of an agreement between the rector and churchwardens of St. Nicholas Acons, in the City of London, and the City of London Electric Lighting Company, Limited, for the construction by the company of a transformer chamber in the churchyard. The Chancellor held that the proposed construction came within the prohibition in section 3 of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884.

Mr. A. T. Lawrence, K.C., and Mr. G. G. Honeyman appeared for the appellants; the Hon. Sir Malcolm Macnaghten, K.C., and Mr. Sydney Turner were for the respondents.

Mr. LAWRENCE said that the appeal turned very little, if at all, upon the facts. The question was purely one of the interpretation of section 3 of the Act, and whether the structure proposed to be erected in the churchyard was in fact a "building." The churchyard was closed for burials in 1854. The company, which had a transformer chamber under Nicholas-lane, found it necessary to extend it. They already had certain rights in connexion with the churchyard (for which faculties had been granted), and were now asking for the additional use of so much of the churchyard as was necessary for enlarging the transformer chamber. They entered into a provisional agreement with the rector and churchwardens under which they gave an undertaking that the amenities of the churchyard should not be interfered with. The churchyard was not open to the public, but was an "open space" which was kept locked up.

The Chancellor, in the course of his judgment, found that a former faculty granted by the late Dr. Tristram in In re St. Nicholas Cole Abbey ([1893] P., 58) was ultra vires, and that in view of the provisions of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, he had no jurisdiction to grant the application. It was only in the case of city churches, said counsel, that a question like the present was liable to arise, and it was a matter of the greatest importance in connexion with electric lighting undertakings. He submitted that the proposed work would not constitute a "building" erected in the churchyard.

The DEAN.—My difficulty on Dr. Tristram's case is, first, that the matter was ex parte; and, secondly, that this Act was never mentioned.

Mr. LAWRENCE said that his instructions were that if this kind of space was not to be available in the City of London for such undertakings, the supply of electricity in the City could scarcely be maintained.

The DEAN.—That is an excellent argument for a private Act of Parliament.

Counsel next referred to Dr. Tristram's judgment in In re St. Nicholas Cole Abbey (supra).

The DEAN.—I am not going to regard a judgment given on an ex parte hearing as binding where the Act which we have to construe here was not in the Judge's mind.

SIR MALCOLM MACNAGHTEN said that the London County Council only appeared in this matter as the proper authority which had to carry out the statutory duty of preventing the violation of churchyards, and of generally enforcing observance of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884. He contended that what was proposed by the appellants was, in fact, to erect a building on a disused burial ground. No question of preserving an open space arose here such as figured in several of the cases referred to. He (Sir Malcolm Macnaghten) relied very much on the finding of Lord Cairns in Thompson v. Sunderland Gas Company (2 Ex.D., 429). He failed to appreciate the argument that the proposed chamber was not to be a building "upon" this churchyard.

The question raised here was quite distinct from the "open space" question. An example of the latter existed to this day in the preservation in the City of what, in fact, was the burial ground of the old Bridewell Prison. Some of the unfortunate inmates of that gaol died there, and were buried there. Under this Act the ground could not be built upon. Consequently it was now surrounded by a most unpleasant hoarding.

The DEAN remarked that counsel for the appellants had not raised the question as to there being any right to use consecrated ground for such a purpose. The construction of these chambers would involve the exhumation of human remains to a very considerable extent.

Mr. LAWRENCE.—Assuming that your Lordship finds in my favour that this is not a building upon a churchyard, then the question arises whether you ought to grant this faculty.

The DEAN.—Whether I can. The law protecting sacred ground has been unchallenged for many years.

Mr. LAWRENCE admitted that he had not considered the point.

The DEAN.—If this case goes farther you will have to consider it. You represent the rector and churchwardens—the people who naturally protect the churchyard.

In giving judgment, the DEAN OF ARCHES said that the faculty granted by Dr. Tristram in In re St.

* Reported by SIR W. J. SOULSBY, Barrister-at-Law.

Nicholas Cole Abbey ([1893] P., 58) was granted without reference to the Act, and must be regarded as wrongly decided. He did not propose to decide the further point to which he had alluded, but which, in fact, had not been actually raised. He confirmed the Chancellor's decision, and dismissed the appeal, with costs.

TERRY v. VARIETY THEATRES CONTROLLING COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Contract — Actor—Appearance—Leading actor of company—Provision for substitute in case of illness—Serious illness—Impossibility of appearing—Whether basis of contract gone.

The plaintiff, who was an actor, made with the defendants an agreement by which the plaintiff was to find a company, described as consisting of himself and a full company, and appear as a principal in a play, and in the event of the non-appearance of a principal the plaintiff was to provide a deputy to the satisfaction of the defendants. The plaintiff became too ill to appear at all, and this was announced some days before the play was to begin, but he provided a substitute. The defendants thereupon rescinded the contract, alleging that as the plaintiff could not appear the basis of the contract was gone. In an action for damages,

Held, that since the plaintiff's intended non-appearance was for the whole of the engagement, and since on the terms of the agreement his appearance was of the essence of the contract, the defendants were entitled to rescind, and the action failed.

This was an action in which the plaintiff, Mr. Frederick Terry, an actor, of 4, Primrose Hill-road, St. John's Wood, N.W., claimed from the defendants, the Variety Theatres Controlling Company, Limited, of Holborn Empire Offices, damages for alleged breach of an agreement in writing dated October 16, 1925.

By the agreement the plaintiff was to provide a theatrical company called "Fred Terry and Company" to appear in a costume play at the Hippodrome, Portsmouth, for six nights and one matinée, beginning on April 12, 1926. The company was to be an efficient No. 1 principal company, and in the event of the plaintiff's non-appearance he was to provide a deputy to the satisfaction of the defendants. Mr. Terry was to receive 65 per cent. of the gross door receipts up to £1,000, and 70 per cent. thereafter. The plaintiff said that he himself was seriously ill at the time, but that he had provided a satisfactory deputy. He pleaded that the defendants had refused to perform the agreement. He claimed £800, his estimated share of the gross door receipts, or, alternatively, £308 8s. 10d., being the expenses incurred, plus his estimated net profits of £300.

The defendants alleged that the damages claimed were too remote and were not in law recoverable. They further pleaded that, owing to the plaintiff's illness, the basis of the agreement had disappeared, and that it was frustrated.

Mr. D. N. Pritt, K.C., and Mr. Ashton Roskill appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. C. Doughty, K.C., and Mr. H. St. John Field for the defendants.

Mr. PRITT, in opening the case, said that the dispute was whether the defendants were entitled to refuse to allow a theatrical company to perform because Mr. Frederick Terry was too ill to appear. He referred to the conditions in the contract, and said that in view of Mr. Terry's illness Mr. Frank Royde was offered as a substitute. Mr. Royde had, in fact, previously played for the defendants in the Portsmouth Hippodrome as substitute for Mr. Terry.

Mr. Terry, in evidence, said that in the play in question, Sweet Nell of Old Drury, Miss Neilson had more to do than himself. The illness which prevented his appearing was congestion of the lungs, and it was not expected that he would recover. He had four doctors in attendance. Mr. Frank Royde had been a member of the company since 1919. He (the witness) had never heard any complaints about Mr. Royde's acting. The obligation to appear in the play was not the only definite obligation.

Replying to Mr. DOUGHTY, he said that he hoped that his name was a very great draw in the provinces. He suggested that the reason why the prices at Portsmouth were increased when his company was there was because the play was only given once nightly, whereas two performances a night were generally given.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT said that the only real questions in the case were :—(1) Whether the contract disappeared because Mr. Terry could not appear ; and (2) whether the substitute was to the reasonable satisfaction of the defendants.

Mr. Frank Royde gave evidence of his acting in the provinces as deputy for Mr. Terry, and said that neither from the management nor from the public had he heard any complaint.

Mr. John Hart, theatrical director, of 22, Buckingham-street, Strand, said that the usual practice adopted to meet the possibility of a well-known actor falling ill was to have an understudy to him. It was not usual to send for another actor of equal eminence.

After hearing more evidence of Mr. Royde's acting, MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT said that he would dispense with further evidence as to Mr. Royde's capabilities. He was satisfied that he was not to be objected to as an understudy.

Mr. Garrett, general manager to Mr. Terry, gave evidence of the expenses and accounts of the company. He said that there was now a rule that a company on tour must not be kept out of work for more than two weeks in a tour of 20 weeks.

Dr. Arthur Ricketts, M.D., C.M.G., stated that he, together with three other doctors, including Sir Thomas Horder, found Mr. Terry suffering from pneumonia, pleurisy, and dropsy in April, 1926. Mr. Terry was unable to move for several weeks.

Mr. DOUGHTY, for the defendants, submitted that the contract was for the appearance of one named actor, and one only, and that when he could not appear for a whole week the basis of the contract was gone. Dealing with the substitute offered, he submitted that the clause in the contract providing for a substitute was simply a non-applicable piece of print. On the question of satisfaction, he contended that it could not be laid down dogmatically that any particular actor was as good as another, and the management ought to be allowed a very wide discretion. It was no disparagement, however, to say that Mr. Royde was not to be compared with Mr. Terry. The defendants contracted to have Mr. Terry, and they were entitled to have him. If Mr. Terry had been ill before the company had gone on tour, the contracts would have been revised by all the theatres. It was immaterial whether he was ill six months before or only the night before. The only question on which reasonableness arose was whether Mr. Royde was a competent understudy.

Mr. V. C. Parnell, booking agent of the defendant company, in answer to Mr. PRITT, said that, if they really wanted Mr. Terry's personal appearance, it was possible for them to have had a clause to that effect inserted in the contract.

Mr. C. E. Marner, manager of the Portsmouth Hippodrome, estimated that the non-appearance of Mr. Terry, and the substitution of Mr. Royde, would make a reduction of about £200 in the week's receipts.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT, in his considered judgment, recapitulated the facts, and said that the material clause of the contract required the insertion in it of the size of the cast ; how many members were to be principals ; and the names of particular artists. The form had not been strictly used ; no numbers had been filled in, but the words "Fred Terry and full Company" had been inserted as the artists to be included. Mr. Terry was a principal to whom the clause as to the non-appearance of a principal was applicable. The clause was for the protection of the theatre proprietors and entitled them in the event of the non-appearance of a principal to insist on a satisfactory substitute, on the assumption that the contract remained in force. It did not operate to give the producer the right to substitute the entire company, or to make such an extensive substitution as would go to the root of the matter. That would entitle the theatre proprietors to rescind. It could, indeed, justly be said that the typing in of the words "Fred Terry and full Company" did show that it was within the contemplation of the parties that the non-appearance of Mr. Terry might not have terminated the contract. The non-appearance, however, might only have been for one night ; or, even if it was more serious, the employer might not have wished to rescind and might have exercised his rights under the clause. Here, however, the intended non-appearance of Mr. Terry was for the whole of the engagement, and was announced some days before the play was to begin.

Mr. Terry, so far as the defendants were concerned, was to drop out of the contract altogether. If, therefore, his inclusion in the cast was of the essence of the primary term of the contract, or if, in other words, the phrase "Fred Terry and Company" could not be satisfied by a company which did not include Mr. Terry, the defendants were within their rights in rescinding. That was the whole question. Upon that point he held in favour of the defendants. He had no right to say that "Fred Terry and Company" should be read as "Fred Terry's Company."

Judgment was accordingly given for the defendants, with costs. His Lordship said that in case the decision should be overruled he would have assessed the damages at £450.

HARKER v. BRITANNIC ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Industrial)—Child under six years of age—Assurance of payments on death exceeding £10—Offence—Time for institution of proceedings—Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 25), s. 62—Industrial Assurance Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 8), s. 4 (1)—Friendly Societies Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 11), s. 2 (1).

A child was born on November 12, 1921, and shortly after his birth the respondents, an industrial assurance company, issued three policies of assurance in respect of him ; each policy contained a table showing the amount payable in the event of the child's death at various dates before maturity, and on October 18, 1926, while he was still under six years of age, the total amount assured under the three policies was £15 10s. Each policy contained the proviso : "The provisions of the Act of Parliament enacting that no greater amount than a sum of £6 shall be paid on the death of a child under the age of five years or than the sum of £10 on the death of a child under the age of ten years shall apply to this policy." These limits had since been altered by statute so as to permit a maximum of £10 in the case of a child under six, and £15 in the case of a child under ten.

Held, (1) that to assure a child for more than the permitted amount was an offence, no less than to pay more than the permitted amount ; (2) that the proviso in the policies did not protect the respondents, as it had no legal effect, since the statute applied of its own force and not by agreement between the parties ; (3) that there was an assurance of the child with each acceptance of a premium, and that therefore the date of the last acceptance of a premium was the date from which the time for taking proceedings began to run.

This was a case stated by justices for the West Riding of Yorkshire, who had dismissed an information against the respondent company for an alleged offence under the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, as amended by the Friendly Societies Act, 1924. The information was preferred at Goole Petty Sessions on April 13, 1927, by Harold Parkinson Harker, the appellant, at the instance of George Stuart Robertson, K.C., Industrial Assurance Commissioner, against the Britannic Assurance Company, Limited, the respondents, under section 39 of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, charging that the respondent company on October 18, 1926, unlawfully did insure the sum of £15 10s., payable on the death of Frederick Cowling, being a child under the age of six years, which exceeded the sum of £10, contrary to section 4 of the said Act of 1923 as amended by section 2 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1924. The information was dismissed.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.

The following facts were proved : On October 18, 1926, the said Frederick Cowling, son of Adelaide Cowling, was under six years of age, having been born on November 12, 1921. On October 18, 1926, there were in existence three policies of assurance on the life of the said Frederick Cowling issued by the respondent company to his mother, the said Adelaide Cowling, the person assured under the policies.

The particulars of the policies were as follows :—

(a) Policy No. 18,743,638, dated December 5, 1921, assuring the life of the said Frederick Cowling. The sum payable on death subject to the terms of the policy was calculated under a table given in the policy according to the period for which the policy had been in existence at the date of death. Under this table the sum of £4 10s. was assured on the life of the said Frederick Cowling on October 18, 1926. The premium on the policy was 1d. per week.

(b) Policy No. 18,743,639, dated December 5, 1921, assuring the life of the said Frederick Cowling subject to the terms of the policy for a sum calculated under a similar table in the policy. This policy also assured by way of endowment a sum of £5 5s. on the maturity of the policy after 15 years. Under the table in this policy a sum of £2 was assured on the life of the said Frederick Cowling on October 18, 1926. The premium was 2d. a week.

(c) Policy No. 19,015,281, dated August 7, 1922. The conditions of this policy were similar to those of (b). The terms were for a payment of £23 12s. 6d. on maturity, and a sum calculated as mentioned above on death previous to maturity. Under this policy subject to its terms the sum of £9 was assured on the life of the said Frederick Cowling on October 18, 1926. The premium was 9d. a week.

The total sum according to the tables in the policies for which the said Frederick Cowling was assured on October 18, 1926, was £15 10s.

The respondent company was an industrial assurance company within the meaning of section 1 of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, and the above policies were issued in connexion with industrial assurance business carried on by the said company, as defined by subsection (2) of that section, in that the premiums were payable weekly and were collected at the house of the assured person by collectors employed by the respondent company.

Each of the above policies contained a proviso in the following terms, viz. : "The provisions of the Act of Parliament enacting that no greater amount than the sum of £6 shall be paid on the death of a child under the age of five years or than the sum of £10 on the death of a child under the age of ten years shall apply to this policy."

The above provision sets out the maximum sums allowed under section 62 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, to be insured or paid on the death of a child under ten years of age in respect of insurances entered into at the dates of the above policies. These maximum sums had been altered by section 2 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1924, which, so far as it was material to this case, read as follows :—

"(1) Section 62 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (which relates to assurances on children), both as originally enacted and as applied to trade unions and industrial assurance companies, shall have effect as if for that section the following section were substituted :

"'A society or branch, whether registered or unregistered, shall not insure or pay on the death of a child under the ages hereinafter specified any sum of money which exceeds or which, when added to any amount payable on the death of that child by any other society or branch or by any trade union or industrial assurance company exceeds, the amounts hereinafter specified.' (These were: Under 3, £6 ; under 6, £10 ; under 10, £15.)

"(3) Subsection (1) of section 4 of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, shall be repealed from the words 'except that' to the end of the subsection."

Section 4, subsection (1), of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, as amended by the Friendly Societies Act, 1924, reads as follows :—

"(1) The provisions of sections 62 and 64 to 67 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, relating to payments on the death of children shall extend to industrial assurance companies as if those provisions were herein re-enacted, and in terms made applicable to industrial assurance companies."

Section 39 of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, provides :—

"(2) Any industrial assurance company which contravenes or fails to comply with any of the provisions of this Act, or any directions given by the Commissioner thereunder shall be guilty of an offence under this Act. . . .

"(5) Notwithstanding any limitation on the time for the taking of proceedings contained in any Act, summary proceedings for offences under this Act, or for offences under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, where the society by or in respect of which, or the person by or in respect of whom, the offence is alleged to have been committed is a collecting society or an officer of such a society may be commenced at any time within one year of the first discovery thereof by the Commissioner, but not in any case after more than three years from the commission of the offence."

Section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, provided that in all cases where no time is specially limited an information shall be laid within six calendar months from the time when the matter of it arose.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent company that the information should be dismissed for the following reasons : (a) That an assurance on the life of a child under the age of ten for more than the maximum sum mentioned above was not an offence by an industrial assurance company, because subsection (1) of section 4 of the 1923 Act extended to industrial assurance companies such part only of section 62 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, as related to payments on the death of a child and not such part as related to insuring. (b) That, although an insurance of a child under ten years of age for more than the above maximum might be prohibited by law, it was not made an offence by an industrial assurance company. It was argued that in the case of a society registered under the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, clause (f) of section 84 of that Act made it an offence if "a society . . . pays money on the death of a child under ten years of age otherwise than is provided by this Act," the act of insuring not being made an offence in that clause.

(c) That under the above policies the respondent company did not insure the life of the said child for a sum greater than was allowed by law, because it was a proviso of the insurance that the provisions of the statute relating to such maximum sums should apply, and if the child had died on October 18, 1926, the maximum amount payable under the terms of the three policies would have been £6.

(d) That if it was an offence for an industrial assurance company to insure a child under ten years of age for a greater sum than the maximum stated above, there could not be a conviction under the information in this case by reason of section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, because the offence alleged to have been committed on October 18, 1926, had in fact been committed on the dates of the issue of the policies as it was on those dates that the respondent company did insure the life of the child.

(e) That, alternatively, insuring more than the maximum sum was not an offence, because such insuring was forbidden by the section and, therefore, it was impossible in law so to insure, and a policy purporting to insure was a mere nullity.

It was contended for the appellant in reply to the above points, taken in their order :—

(a) That the expression "relating to payments on the death of children" as used in section 4 of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, was descriptive of the section it referred to ; that these were the words used in the heading in the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, to describe section 62 and other sections following ; that subsection (1) of section 4 of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, in its second sentence, in stating how far section 62 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, was to be varied in its application to industrial assurance companies, made no mention of any variation of the expression "insure or pay" ; and that by the express terms of section 2 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1924, the provision which was there substituted for section 62 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, and which reproduced the expression "insure or pay" was extended to industrial assurance companies.

(b) That insuring a child under ten years of age for more than the maximum amount was not only prohibited but was also an offence. Section 39, subsection (2), of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, said that if an industrial assurance company should contravene any of the provisions of that Act it should commit an offence, and by insuring the child the respondent company according to the facts contravened the provisions of the Act. A similar transaction by a friendly society would be an offence under clause (b) of section 84 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, which made it an offence for a registered society to do anything forbidden by that Act.

(c) That the provisions in the policies to the effect that on death the amount payable would not be greater than the maximum allowed by law afforded no answer to the charge against the respondents.

(d) That the matter of this case arose on October 18, 1926, as on that date the respondent company was insuring on the death of the child an amount which was greater than by law allowed.

(e) That the respondents' contention in paragraph (e) of their contentions was obviously ill-founded in law.

The justices were of opinion that the contentions (c) and (d) on behalf of the respondent company were correct in law, and dismissed the information.

Mr. H. M. Giveen appeared for the appellant ; Mr. A. S. Comyns Carr, K.C., and Mr. G. R. Blanco White for the respondent company.

The Lord Chief Justice, in giving judgment, said : This is a case stated by justices for the West Riding of Yorkshire.

The question arises out of an information preferred by Harold Parkinson Harker, the appellant, at the instance of George Stuart Robertson, an Industrial Assurance Commissioner, against the respondents, the Britannic Assurance Company, Limited, under section 39 of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, charging that the respondents, on October 18, 1926, unlawfully insured the sum of £15 10s. payable on the death of one Frederick Cowling, a child under the age of six years, which sum exceeded the sum of £10, contrary to section 4 of the Act of 1923, as amended by section 2 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1924.

That information was heard and determined by the justices on April 13, 1927, and they dismissed the information.

The question for the Court is whether, in so dismissing the information, the justices came to a correct determination in point of law.

It is not necessary, I think, to recapitulate the facts which are fully and clearly set out in the case stated. It was established by the evidence that on October 18, 1926, the infant, Frederick Cowling, the son of Adelaide Cowling, was under six years of age ; he had, in fact, been born on November 12, 1921, and the effect of the granting of the series of insurance policies upon the life of that infant, which policies are described, with particulars and dates, in the case stated, was that the total sum, according to the tables in the policies, for which the infant was assured on October 18, 1926, was £15 10s. In those circumstances, it was contended on behalf of the present appellant that an offence had been committed. It was contended, on the other hand, by the respondents, the assurance company, that the prohibition in the statutes, although it prohibited payment, did not prohibit insurance ; and, secondly, that the company could not be said to have insured for more than was lawfully permitted, because nobody could insure effectively for more than was lawfully permitted ; and, finally, that in any event the proceedings were out of time.

Contention (e) of the contentions of the assurance company was in these remarkable terms : That, "alternatively, insuring more than the maximum sum was not an offence, because such insuring was forbidden by the section, and therefore it was impossible in law so to insure, and the policy purporting to insure was a mere nullity." The question is whether, in these circumstances, the information ought to have been dismissed.

It was provided by section 62 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, that a society or branch should not insure or pay on the death of a child under five years of age any sum which, added to any amount payable on the death of that child by any other society or branch, exceeded £6, or on the death of a child under ten years of age, any sum which, added to any amount payable on the death of that child by any other society or branch, exceeded £10.

By section 4 (1) of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, the provisions of the said section 62 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, inter alia, were extended to industrial assurance companies as if those provisions were therein re-enacted and in terms made applicable to industrial assurance companies. It was contended on behalf of the respondents that by reason of the words "relating to payments on the death of children" the provisions of the section were extended to industrial assurance companies only in so far as they related to payments, and not in so far as they related to the insurance of children in excess of the prescribed limit. But the statutory heading of sections 62 to 67 of the Act of 1896 is "payments on death of children," and, in my opinion, the words "relating to payments on the death of children" in section 4 (1) of the Act of 1923 were merely descriptive of the sections therein referred to, and did not limit those sections in their application to industrial assurance companies. This view is confirmed by the amending section of the Friendly Societies Act, 1924

(section 2). This section, while it alters the amounts for which children may lawfully be insured, again uses the words "shall not insure or pay on the death of a child," and, in express terms, refers to section 62 of the Act of 1896 as applied to industrial assurance companies.

Section 39 (2) of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, provides that any industrial assurance company which contravenes or fails to comply with any of the provisions of the Act shall be guilty of an offence under the Act. It follows that if an industrial assurance company insures a child for a sum which exceeds the sum mentioned in section 2 (1) of the Friendly Societies Act, 1924, that is to say, in the case of a child under six years of age, £10, the company is guilty of an offence under the Act of 1923.

But it was argued that the respondent company did not insure the child for a sum in excess of the limit, inasmuch as each of the policies contained a proviso in the following terms: "The provisions of the Act of Parliament enacting that no greater amount than the sum of £6 shall be paid on the death of a child under the age of five years or than the sum of £10 on the death of a child under the age of ten years shall apply to this policy." And it was said that, though the sum for which the child was insured according to the tables in the policies was £15 10s., he was really insured only for £6 in the case of death under the age of five years, or £10 in the case of death between the ages of five and ten years. This proviso, I think, has no legal effect at all. All insurances are necessarily subject to the statutory provisions relating thereto, and the effect of the argument is that, because a company cannot lawfully insure a child for a sum beyond the statutory limit, it commits no offence if it grants such an insurance unlawfully. It is an entertaining argument. It seems to involve the proposition that a person cannot effectively commit an offence which is forbidden by law because the law steps in to prevent his act from being completed, or, at any rate, from remaining undisturbed. Unfortunately, the law cannot always prevent the commission of offences. Sometimes it has to punish the offender. In my opinion, if a company purports to insure a child for a sum beyond the limit, it commits an offence under the statute, and none the less because it may also be perpetrating a gross fraud upon the assured.

With regard to the contention that the prosecution was out of time, it is sufficient to say that, in my view, the offence of insuring a child for a sum in excess of the lawful amount is committed on every occasion when a premium is paid and received in respect of such an insurance.

For these reasons I think that the appeal should be allowed, and the case be remitted to the justices with a direction to convict.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—To establish the offence charged in this case it was necessary to prove: (1) That an industrial assurance company in insuring a sum exceeding the sum of £10 payable on the death of a child under six years of age is contravening the provisions of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923. (2) That the respondents had, in the circumstances, insured a sum exceeding £10 payable on the death of a child under six years of age. (3) That they had so insured on the date alleged in the information, namely, October 18, 1926.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended: (1) That section 4 of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, extends to industrial assurance companies so much only of the provisions of section 62 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, as relates to payments on the death of children, as distinguished from insurance. (2) That, in the circumstances, the respondents had not insured a sum exceeding £10 payable on the death of a child under six years of age. (3) That they had insured not on October 18, 1926, but on the dates of the policies of insurance in 1921 and 1922, and that the provisions of section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, applied as a bar to the proceedings.

As to the first point, in my opinion section 2 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1924, substituting, as it does, the amended section therein enacted for section 62 of the Act of 1896, both in its application to friendly societies and to industrial assurance companies, removes the difficulty which is suggested to arise from the fact that section 4 of the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, in terms, only extends to industrial assurance companies the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, relating to payments on the death of children. In other words, the amended and substituted section is to be read as incorporated in section 4 of the Act of 1923, and any breach of the amended section is a contravention of the Act of 1923.

In view of this conclusion, it is not necessary to consider the contention of the appellant that the words "relating to payments" in section 4 of the Act of 1923 are merely descriptive of the group of sections under that heading in the Act of 1896. I am not prepared, as at present advised, to adopt this construction of the section.

On the second point, on further consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the respondents, having insured the life of the child in question by the terms of the three policies in the sums of £4 10s., £2, and £9 respectively in the event of its death under six years of age, they had insured a sum exceeding £10 on the death of the said child under six years of age, notwithstanding the proviso in each policy that no greater amount than £6 should be paid on the death of the child under five years of age or £10 under ten years. Assuming in the respondents' favour that they only insured the amount which they agreed to pay according to the proviso, they would be liable on the three policies in the event of the child dying under six years of age to pay the several sums of £4 10s., £2, and £6, making a total of £12 10s., the limit of £6 applying to each policy separately; but it is at the least open to doubt whether the application by the proviso of the provisions of a statute which were no longer in force in 1926 would have any effect on the liability of the respondents accruing in 1926, and in that view they would have been liable, as the appellant contended, to pay the sum of £15 10s. on the death of the child.

On the third point, the respondents' contention that they insured only on the dates of the policies cannot, I think, be supported. So long as the assured is not in default in the payment of premiums and the policies are in force, the respondents are continuing to insure, and were doing so on October 18, 1926, and the insurance being for a sum exceeding £10 was in breach of the provisions of the section as amended in 1924, and in contravention of the Act of 1923.

For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed, and the case remitted to the justices to convict.

MR. JUSTICE BRANSON.—I agree. I am satisfied for the reasons given by my Lord that it is an offence for an industrial assurance company to insure for a sum in excess of the statutory limit allowed for payment and also that the words "insure or pay" cover keeping insured, and therefore that the prosecution is not out of time.

The only point upon which I desire to add anything is the question whether the respondents have insured for an amount in excess of the statutory limit. Clearly they have, unless the proviso in each policy operates contractually (a) in the case of the third policy to cut down the amount specified in the policy itself, and (b) in the case of each policy to cut down the amount specified therein because of amounts insured by the other policies. Each policy contains a contract by the respondents to pay according to the schedule and the appropriate table; then comes a proviso which makes the Schedule and the appropriate table part of the contract. Then follows the other proviso to which I have already referred. All that it says is that the statutory provisions in question shall apply to the policy. Such a term in a contract can have no legal effect, for the statute operates of its own force and applies to the policy apart from any such term. The respondents seek to discard the natural meaning of the language used and to contend that the proviso should be construed as meaning that notwithstanding that a certain sum is specified in the table to be payable it shall not be paid if in the event which happens payment of that amount would be an infraction of the Act. The only ground for this contention of the respondents is that to confine the meaning of the proviso to the plain meaning of the language used would be to render it useless and inoperative. But the contract must be construed, if there is any ambiguity, contra proferentem, and I decline to depart from the plain meaning of the language used in order to enable the company to say that, though they have taken premiums under the third policy which according to the table incorporated therein entitled the assured to £9 on the death of the child between four and five, they are only liable to pay £6. The argument is a fortiori when it is sought to use the proviso in each policy to limit the amount, apparently payable under it apart from the proviso, by reference to amounts payable under other policies. I agree, therefore, that this contention of the respondents must also fail, and that the appeal must be allowed.

MESSAGER v. BRITISH BROADCASTING COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Copyright — Broadcasting — Opera — Music — Performance in public—"Broadcasting" by wireless telephony—Grant by composer of right to perform—Assignment or licence—Whether grant determinable on death—Copyright Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V., c. 46), s. 1.

By an agreement dated March 23, 1905, the plaintiff granted to G. E. "the sole and exclusive right of representing or performing" in certain areas a play, of the music of which the plaintiff was the composer. G. E. died in 1915, and in 1920 his executors assigned to a limited company the benefits of copyright and other rights previously held by G. E. In October, 1926, the limited company agreed to permit the defendants to "broadcast" by wireless telephony a performance of the opera. The defendants "broadcast" the opera from their studio, to which the public was not admitted.

In an action for breach of copyright the Judge held, (1) that the defendants gave a public performance of the opera within section 1 of the Copyright Act, 1911, and (2) that, as the agreement of March 23, 1905, was not an assignment by the plaintiff to G. E. of all his performing rights, but was a licence confined to ordinary performances at a theatre, and of such a personal character as to be determinable on the death of G. E., the defendants had acquired no lawful licence to perform the opera in public and were, therefore, liable in damages to the plaintiff.

On an appeal by the defendants on the second point,

Held, that the agreement of March 23, 1905, was not limited to performances at a theatre and was not a mere licence but was an assignment to G. E. of rights which either he or his executors could assign, and the defendants were protected, and therefore the action failed.

Decision of McCardie, J. (43 The Times L.R., 818), reversed.

This was the defendants' appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice McCardie (43 The Times L.R., 818) in an action brought by the plaintiff, M. André Messager, the musical composer, of 103, Rue Jouffroy, Paris, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants, the British Broadcasting Company, Limited, from infringing his copyright in the music of the opera, The Little Michus, of which he was the composer, and damages for alleged infringement of his copyright.

The opera, The Little Michus, was produced at Daly's Theatre, London, in 1905, under a contract dated March 23, 1905, between André Messager, Albert Vanloo, and Georges Duval, all of Paris (the licensors), of the one part, and George Edwardes, of Daly's Theatre, London (the licensee), of the other part, whereby the latter was granted the sole and exclusive right of representing or performing the opera in the United Kingdom, America, and the British Empire.

The defendants pleaded that Mr. Edwardes's rights in the opera became vested after his death in 1915 in George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, under an agreement between his executors and the company in May, 1920, and that in October, 1926, George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, licensed the defendants to perform the opera. In November, 1926, the defendants broadcast the opera from their studio in Savoy-hill, to which the public was not admitted.

Mr. Justice McCardie held that the defendants in doing so gave a public performance of the opera within section 1 of the Copyright Act, 1911, and that, as the agreement of March 23, 1905, was not an assignment by the plaintiff to Mr. Edwardes of all his performing rights, but was a licence confined to ordinary performances at a theatre, and of such a personal character as to be determinable on the death of Mr. Edwardes, the defendants had acquired no lawful licence to perform the opera in public and were, therefore, liable in damages to the plaintiff for breach of copyright. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff for £150 damages, with costs.

* Reported by T. W. Morgan and E. J. M. Chaplin, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The defendants appealed.

Sir Duncan Kerly, K.C., and Mr. Trevor Watson appeared for the appellants ; the Hon. S. O. Henn Collins, Mr. A. J. Duhamel, and Mr. K. E. Shelley for the respondent.

Sir Duncan Kerly, in opening the appeal, said that M. André Messager claimed to be the owner of the performing rights in England of The Little Michus. Several questions had been discussed in the Court below, one being whether the performance at the Savoy-hill studio of the British Broadcasting Company was a public performance ; another, whether, by such performance, there was not also a performance in France so as to constitute an infringement of the French copyright. The Court would not be troubled with the question whether this was a public performance or not, as they accepted the Judge's finding that it was. The present appeal turned mainly on the question of the licence, which was the most material question in the case. The Judge had put a construction on that document which was a surprise to everybody.

The other question which was to be discussed was the effect of sections 1, 2, and 24 of the Copyright Act, 1911. The facts might be stated very shortly. In 1905 an English version of the opera was successfully produced at Daly's Theatre. In the same year Mr. Edwardes granted provincial rights to Sir George Dance. The Copyright Act, 1911, came into force on July 1, 1912. In October, 1915, Mr. Edwardes died. In 1920 the lease of the theatre, together with all copyrights, passed to George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, who had ever since assumed that they were in possession of all rights. There had been no further performance in London until the performance in the Savoy-hill studio, but there had been various performances in the provinces and in respect of these performances the plaintiff had received royalties. In October, 1926, the British Broadcasting Company obtained a licence from George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, to broadcast the play in question, for which they paid £60. The performance took place on November 10, 1926, and the original company, so far as they could be gathered together, was present.

Mr. Justice McCardie had held that the agreement of 1905 was not an assignment but merely a personal licence of a strictly limited nature, limited to theatrical representation of the ordinary kind at a theatre, and no other place, and that the agreement had been put an end to by the death of Mr. George Edwardes in 1915. He (counsel) submitted that the expression "licensee" must cover assigns, and that by the agreement of 1905, the plaintiff had granted the whole of the performing rights then known in this play to George Edwardes, in whom the rights then became vested.

The question must be considered in the light of (1) the position under the Copyright Act, 1911, and (2) with regard to the reported cases. The Copyright Act, 1911, for the first time dealt with performing rights separately and extended copyright to mechanical performances.

Counsel referred to sections 1 (2), 5, 19 (7) and 24 of the Copyright Act, 1911, and submitted that on the proper construction of the licence in this case George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, had the sole performing rights in the opera at the material date, and that the plaintiff had no performing copyright in the opera and had no interest in any performing rights under the Act.

Counsel then proceeded to deal with the reported cases and said that it had been held that where a person had granted the performing rights to anyone before the Act of 1911 came into operation the cinematograph rights also passed to the owner of the performing rights. See Barstow v. Terry ([1924] 2 Ch., 316). Counsel also referred to Falcon v. Famous Players Film Company, Limited (42 The Times L.R., 666 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 474) ; Stevens v. Benning (1 K. and J., 168) ; Reade v. Bentley (3 K. and J., 271) ; Hole v. Bradbury (12 Ch.D., 886) ; Griffith v. Tower Publishing Company, Limited, and Moncrieff (13 The Times L.R., 9 ; [1897] 1 Ch., 21) ; Taylor v. Neville (47 L.J., Q.B., 254) ; British Actors Film Company, Limited, v. Glover (34 The Times L.R., 162 ; [1918] 1 K.B., 299).

The Hon. S. O. Henn Collins, for the respondent, contended that if, under the terms of the agreement of March 23, 1905, Mr. George Edwardes acquired the performing rights of The Little Michus, they were confined to the right of performance of the opera at theatres, which the agreement contemplated —theatrical performances, and no others. Mr. George Edwardes had never exercised nor claimed any rights at all except theatrical rights. M. Messager was only interested in the music and not in the rest of the opera. An agreement like the one in question in this case ought not to be construed more widely than the necessities of the case required. Mr. George Edwardes had no rights in the opera which he could transmit to others.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in giving judgment, said that the decision in the case depended on the construction of the relevant document, and, although the case had aroused some interest, the decision would be of very little use except in cases where the document was similar. The question was whether, on the construction of the document and in the events which had happened, the defendants were entitled to say that they were performing with the permission of persons who had powers to assign. In the Court below, the defendants had had the courage to contend that to broadcast a play was not a public performance of it. Mr. Justice McCardie held that it was a public performance. But in the Court of Appeal the defendants had wisely abandoned that contention, and, therefore, it was not necessary to deal with that branch of the judgment of Mr. Justice McCardie.

The appeal would be decided on the construction of the document. It was impossible in such a case as this to lay down any satisfactory rules which would distinguish between a licence to do an act and an assignment of the right to do an act. Broadly speaking, a licence did not confer a right ; it merely prevented something from being treated as unlawful which but for the licence would be unlawful. It was necessary to consider each contract by itself. The document, which was dated March 23, 1905, recited that André Messager was the composer, and Albert Vanloo and Georges Duval were the authors, of the comic opera entitled The Little Michus, and that they, as licensors, had delivered the play to Mr. George Edwardes, called the licensee, with the full score of the music thereof, with a view to its being performed by the licensee at Daly's Theatre and elsewhere. The licensors granted to the licensee the sole and exclusive right of representing or performing the play in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, America, and the British Colonies and Dominions. Under clause 3 of the agreement the play was to be adapted for the English stage at the expense of the licensee. The agreement also provided that the licensee should not interpolate music not composed by M. Messager without his consent, but M. Messager agreed to compose such additional numbers required for the English stage as Mr. George Edwardes might reasonably require. Another clause provided that, if the play was not produced in London by Mr. Edwardes within three months from the date of the agreement, all rights of representation should revert to, and become again the absolute property of, the licensors.

That clause was very strongly in favour of the document being an assignment of rights and not a mere licence. Looking at the document as a whole, it appeared to him (his Lordship) that it was impossible to say that it was only a licence. It was a grant of a right to Mr. George Edwardes. It was more than a licence; it was an assignment. Mr. Justice McCardie had said that the document was personal to Mr. George Edwardes, but he (Lord Justice Scrutton) could not accept that view. Mr. George Edwardes could not assign the task of adaptation, but when he had carried out the adaptation and produced the opera in London he had power to assign. Having regard to the terms of the document itself, it appeared to him that it was an assignment of rights to Mr. George Edwardes which Mr. Edwardes could himself assign, and consequently his executors had power to grant the permission under which the appellants gave their performance, and the defendants were protected. It had been contended that the contract limited the right to represent or perform the opera in theatres only. That was too narrow a view of the contract. It was enough to say that there was a performance by the appellants in a region in which the contract permitted performance. The judgment for the plaintiff must be set aside, and judgment must be entered for the defendants, with costs.

Lord Justice Atkin and Mr. Justice Eve concurred.

FARR v. GINNINGS.*

Landlord and Tenant — Lease — Assignment—Consent of lessor—Refusal—Lessee's breach of covenant to repair—Whether a justification.

Where a lease contains a covenant by the lessee to repair and a provision that the lessor's consent to an assignment by the lessee is not to be unreasonably withheld, the mere fact that the lessee is committing a continuing breach of the covenant to repair does not necessarily entitle the lessor to refuse his consent to an assignment, at all events where the amount of disrepair is not very serious.

* Reported by G. P. Langworthy, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff, Mr. Walter Frederick Farr, by this summons asked for a declaration that, on the true construction of a lease granted to him of No. 44, Crouch End-hill, Hornsey, Middlesex, and in the events which had happened, the refusal of the defendant, Mrs. Sarah Ann Ginnings, to grant him a licence to assign such lease to Mr. Ernest Peronne was unreasonable; and that notwithstanding such refusal the plaintiff was entitled to assign without any licence.

The summons raised the question whether, if a tenant has committed a breach of his covenant to keep the premises in repair, he has, nevertheless, on submitting to his landlord a responsible person to whom to assign the premises, a right to the consent of the landlord to the assignment on the ground that the refusal of the consent because of the want of repair would be unreasonable.

The lease to the plaintiff was for a term of 21 years from September 29, 1917, at the rent of £60 per annum. The lease contained the usual covenant to repair, and the plaintiff, as lessee, further covenanted not to assign the premises without the consent in writing of the defendant, the lessor, "such consent not to be unreasonably withheld."

In January, 1926, on applying for the quarter's rent, the solicitors for the defendant called upon the plaintiff to carry out the terms of the repairing covenant. The plaintiff did not do the repairs, and by a letter dated October 18, 1927, he was again requested to repair the premises.

On October 20, 1927, the solicitors for the plaintiff wrote to the defendant saying that the plaintiff proposed to sell his interest in the lease to Mr. E. Peronne, and asking for her consent to the assignment. The defendant's solicitors in reply stated they had twice complained of the want of repair of the premises, and regretted that, as the repairs had not been carried out, the defendant could not consent to the assignment. They suggested, however, that the plaintiff should negotiate for a surrender. The repairs necessary were estimated to cost £100.

Mr. L. W. Byrne appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. A. de W. Mulligan for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Clauson, in giving judgment in favour of the plaintiff, said that the amount of disrepair was not very serious, and nothing was done about it between January, 1926, and the letter of October 18, 1927. The plaintiff on November 8, 1927, informed the defendant that the proposed purchaser, Mr. Peronne, intended to spend a considerable amount in putting the property in repair. The defendant made no objection to the references given with regard to the responsibility of Mr. Peronne as assignee. There had here been no pressure on the plaintiff to do the repairs, as nearly two years elapsed before the second application was made for the repairs to be done. It was quite different from the case of Goldstein v. Sanders ([1915] 1 Ch., 549), where the state of things as to repairs was "little short of being outrageous."

The effect of the assignment would be that the defendant would not only retain her right to damages for breach of covenant against the plaintiff, but would also have a right against the proposed assignee to compel him to put the premises in repair, under pain of forfeiture. The position of the defendant, therefore, would be made better by the assignment. It was perhaps significant that the lessor suggested a surrender of the lease. The declaration asked for would be granted.

FOREMAN AND ELLAMS, LIMITED v. FEDERAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Carriage of Goods by Sea—Damage—Carrier's liability—Exception—Default of servants "in the management of the ship"—Management of refrigerating machinery—Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924 (Australian Statute)—Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 22), Schedule, Art. IV. (2) (a).

The exception in Art. IV. (2) (a) of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, which protects the carrier from liability for damage resulting from an act, neglect, or default of his servants "in the management of the ship," does not cover a default in the management of refrigerating machinery.

This was an action in which the plaintiffs, Foreman and Ellams, Limited, claimed from the defendants, the Federal Steam Navigation Company, Limited, damages for breach of contract and/or duty in respect of the carriage of goods by sea.

Mr. A. T. Miller, K.C., and Mr. David Davies appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. G. St. C. Pilcher for the defendants.

On November 24, 1925, a quantity of frozen beef was shipped on the defendants' steamer Rimutaka at Gladstone, in Queensland, Australia, for carriage to Liverpool. The plaintiffs stated that they were owners of the beef as indorsees of the bills of lading under which it was shipped, and that when the beef was delivered at Liverpool they found that it was in a "mouldy, perished, broken, dirty, and discoloured" condition, and they claimed damages.

The bills of lading were subject to the Australian Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924, the material provisions of which were identical with those of the corresponding British Act. The plaintiffs alleged that in breach of Article III., Rule 1, of the Schedule to that Act the defendants had not exercised due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy and fit to carry the particular cargo. They also alleged that there had been unreasonable deviation and delay in the course of the voyage, which had taken more than twice the usual time, and that therefore the defendants could not rely on the exceptions provided by the bills of lading.

By their defence the defendants pleaded that if the beef was delivered damaged, which they denied, the damage was due to inherent vice in that the beef was of poor quality when shipped. With regard to deviation, the ship, after loading the plaintiffs' cargo, went to a number of other Australian ports to pick up other cargo, but the defendants denied that that constituted a deviation. With regard to delay, they said that the vessel was detained in Australia owing to the strike of seamen and firemen, and that after the vessel started on the voyage the firemen practised "ca' canny," with the result that steam could not be properly maintained in the boilers. They relied on Article IV., Rule 2, (a) or (q), of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924.

Mr. Miller, in opening, said that the plaintiffs were meat importers at Liverpool. When the meat in question arrived it was found to be in a bad state, and he could show that many other parcels of meat brought on that voyage from Australia for other shippers at other ports were also delivered in bad condition. The bills of lading admitted receipt in apparent good order and condition, and there was also the official certificate of inspection before shipment. That being so, he submitted that the onus was upon the defendants to show how the damage was caused and to prove that they were free from liability.

The bills of lading contained a very wide deviation clause:—

". . . with liberty either before or after proceeding towards the port of discharge to proceed to and stay at and/or return to any ports or places whatsoever (although in a contrary direction to or out of the route to or beyond the said port of discharge) once or oftener in any order . . . for any purpose whatsoever. . . . All the said liabilities, exceptions, and conditions shall apply (any warranty, implied term, custom, or rule of law to the contrary notwithstanding), although the vessel may have deviated from the contract voyage. . . ."

Another clause in the bills of lading provided that:—

"The carriers shall not be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under this bill of lading nor for any loss or damage thereto, whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any other cause whatsoever. . . ."

Those clauses, said Mr. Miller, were so wide that they would practically leave the ship free from liability of every kind; but that would be illegal under Rule 8 of Article III. of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, and the clauses, therefore, must be regarded as of no effect.

The onus being on the defendants, Mr. Jowitt opened on their behalf. He said that after the termination of the strike in Australia the position of the defendants was very difficult. The men were in a sullen temper, many of them had been in prison, and the officers could not make them work as well as they might have worked. He submitted that the failure of the stokers to keep up steam was a neglect in the management of the ship within Article IV., Rule 2 (a), of the Schedule to the Act, and by the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Gosse Millard case (44 The Times L.R., 143) the defendants must be held not liable. In fact, the result of the decision in that case was, he submitted, that a shipowner who had properly stowed the goods could hardly be accountable for anything that happened to them afterwards. A large part of the meat cargo carried on this voyage was delivered in good condition, and he would call evidence to show that, in spite of all difficulties, the engineers succeeded in keeping the temperature of the refrigerators so low that, if the beef in this case had been sound when it started, it would have been sound when it arrived. The alleged deviation simply consisted in the fact that the vessel came home round the south of Australia instead of coming, as originally intended, by the northern route, because the master was afraid of the effect on the cargo of the great heat then prevailing on the northern route. If there had been a deviation the plaintiffs had not suffered any damage from it.

Evidence was then called on behalf of the defendants. The chief engineer said that the Australian coal which they had to buy was bad, and as the steamer had been detained so long owing to the strike her bottom was very dirty, and the speed was, therefore, very low. He had, however, enough steam to keep the refrigerators working properly.

* Reported by W. B. Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Other evidence showed that the temperature at which the meat in question was carried was higher than usual, but that it was sufficiently low to be safe. The normal temperature for carrying frozen meat was from 16deg. to 20deg. F. Mould was due to pollen, which was on the meat at the time of shipment. White mould by itself did not damage the meat from a pecuniary point of view ; one merely wiped it off. Thirty per cent. of the plaintiffs' meat was damaged.

At the close of the defendants' case Mr. MILLER called evidence to show that other consignments of meat carried on that voyage were delivered in bad condition. Temperature should be kept at from 15deg. to 18deg. F. in the holds carrying refrigerated meat ; anything higher than 18deg. was dangerous for the meat. The cause of the damage to the plaintiffs' meat was that, after the meat was put into the hold, the temperature was not lowered quickly enough or far enough. The temperature at which meat would freeze was not known ; the freezing point of fat was different from that of lean, and the freezing point of any piece of meat would depend on the proportions of fat and lean.

At the conclusion of the evidence, MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said that he would like Mr. Miller to address him first, but that he would like to know in outline what were the points on which Mr. Jowitt relied.

Mr. JOWITT then said that his points were : the damage was due to the condition of the meat when shipped ; the damage in fact was only slight and the defendants had done very well in getting the meat home in so good a state, considering all the difficulties and the delay caused by the strike ; the temperatures of the holds were such that the damage could not have been suffered on board ; if in fact the temperatures were insufficiently low that was due to the "ca' canny" action of the men or to an error in judgment by the engineers in not using the extra refrigerating engine, a default in the management of the ship for which, under the Act, the defendants were not responsible ; there was no deviation and there was no unseaworthiness.

Mr. MILLER contended that although there might not have been enough steam to keep the second refrigerator engine running while the vessel was at sea, the second engine might at least have been used while the vessel was in port. If it had been so used the temperature of the hold might have been got down so low that it would never have risen again sufficiently to give trouble.

As to deviation, the Act only allowed a reasonable deviation, and this was not reasonable. Management of the refrigerating machinery was not management of the ship within the meaning of Article IV., Rule 2 (a), of the Schedule, and the defendants were, therefore, not protected by the exception. Further, the real fault was the failure to use the second refrigerating engine, and "management" was a word which referred to something active and did not cover an omission to do something.

Mr. JOWITT replied. As to deviation, the deviation clause in the contract could not be ignored. Even if there were a deviation, which he did not admit, and it was unreasonable, which he did not admit, the parties were free under the Act to make their own contract with regard to the deviation, and here they had done so.

The meat must have been bad on shipment. The men had been on strike and were still working badly, and they probably left the meat lying exposed to the tropical sun before they put it on board. The damage was only slight. If in fact the temperatures were insufficiently low, that was due to the "ca' canny" action of the men or to an error in judgment by the engineers in not using the extra refrigerating engine, a default in the management of the ship for which, under the Act, the defendants were not responsible.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT delivered the following considered judgment.—In this case the plaintiffs claim as bill of lading holders under a bill of lading for refrigerated cargo dated Gladstone, which is a port in North Queensland, November 24, 1925, in respect of 697 hind quarters of ox beef which were shipped by the steamship Rimutaka in good order and condition and are described as "hard frozen" to be delivered at Liverpool. The bill of lading, which contained the elaborate series of clauses in small print which were previously common, contained also what is called the clause paramount in these terms : "This Bill of Lading is to be read and construed as if every clause therein contained which is rendered illegal or null and void by the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924, had never been inserted therein or had been cancelled and eliminated therefrom prior to the execution thereof, and is issued subject to all the terms and provisions of and to all the exemptions from liability contained in such Act." That clause paramount renders it unnecessary to consider in this action any of the small print clauses except perhaps the deviation clause. The goods were marked "I.C.E.," which is the third quality produced by the Gladstone Works. On delivery at Liverpool they were found to be damaged to the extent of about 3 per cent. of the invoice value. The damage was small in amount and the proportion of damage was not large in itself, but it was made clear in the course of the action that this is only one claim, and there are other claims of a similar character in respect of refrigerated goods shipped by different shippers and some at other loading ports and of different brands. These claims amount in all to a very substantial sum.

The Rimutaka was owned by the New Zealand Shipping Company, but on the voyage in question was operated by the Federal Steam Navigation Company, Limited, who are the actual defendants and who were putting this vessel as a cargo liner on their line, which is known as the Federal Line. According to the cargo plan there are four insulated holds, of which Nos. 1, 2, and 3 are refrigerated by what is called the battery system, which means that dry cooled air is driven in at the bottom of the hold and sucked out at the top, and in that way it removes part of the heat in the holds and reduces the temperature. The fourth hold, which is abaft the engine space, is refrigerated by a different system, the brine system, but no question in connexion with that hold arises in this action. I have noticed, though I was not referred to it at the trial, from the plan that there is a small ship's chamber which appears to be insulated, but no evidence has been given and no point has been taken as to that chamber, which is obviously very small, relatively to the refrigerated holds.

The plaintiffs' cargo was stowed at the bottom of Nos. 1 and 3 lower holds. The Rimutaka was generally employed on the New Zealand service, loading in New Zealand ports and going to Europe by means of the Panama Canal. The voyage on which she was engaged at the time in question was, therefore, somewhat unusual so far as she was concerned. It was also unusual in other and important respects. The original intention was that she should leave Sydney on August 22, 1925, and she was then booked to proceed to various North Queensland ports and to return to Sydney after completing loading and start from Sydney to European ports of discharge by September 29, 1925. She left Sydney in fact on August 19, 1925, having taken there 557 tons of bunkers and, I think, some cargo, and she reached Brisbane on August 21, but there she was held up by a strike, and was actually detained until November 1. She then went to Newcastle, New South Wales, where she took 1,385 tons of bunker coal, and then sailed for Gladstone, where she arrived on November 15. She there took in a considerable quantity of refrigerated cargo, including the parcel in respect of which this action is brought, from the Gladstone Works, who are a well-known freezing company at that port. On November 26 she went back to Brisbane, apparently to procure coal. She, apparently, only took 188 tons and that was of poor quality. She left Brisbane on December 5, went to Port Alma, and loaded a refrigerated cargo there, being in that port from December 7 to 11. She then proceeded to Cairns, which is the most northerly port of loading, to lift further refrigerated and other cargo, and remained there from December 14 to December 23. At that time it was intended that she should proceed on her voyage by the northerly route, which is by the Torres Straits and Batavia. She went from Cairns to Townsville, which was going back on her course, but, as I see from the papers in this case, proceeding so was rendered necessary by questions relating to her draught. She was at Townsville from December 24, 1925, to January 7, 1926; there she loaded a considerable quantity of cargo and also took 705 tons of bunkers. At Townsville an important decision was taken on the advice of the master. His view was that it was necessary to change the vessel's route from the northerly route and, instead of that, to go south, that is to say round the south coast of Australia, which means down the Australian Bight, and then proceed to Colombo and so on to the Mediterranean through the Suez Canal. The reason for that decision was that there was very great heat at the loading ports and it was found that great difficulty was experienced in keeping the temperatures down in the refrigerated holds. These North Queensland ports are in the tropics, and the season was midsummer. The shipping season for frozen meat generally ends somewhere about September, though indeed, as appears from a list put in on behalf of the defendants, it is not by any means unexampled to load frozen refrigerated cargoes in those North Queensland ports in December or January. From Townsville the vessel went south to Sydney, where she arrived on January 13 and took in 1,304 tons of coal. She then proceeded south of the Australian coast, called at Albany, Western Australia, on January 24, and took 200 tons of coal. She then went to Colombo, where she again coaled, and then Port Said, where she took in further coal and discharged some cargo, and then discharged at Trieste, Genoa, London, Antwerp, and finally at Liverpool, where she arrived on April 12, 1926. The voyage included many ports of loading and discharge, but it is not suggested that in the main it was not such a voyage as would reasonably be expected in the case of a cargo liner engaged in this trade. Such a vessel would normally go to a considerable range of loading ports in order to fill up and a considerable range of discharging ports in order to discharge her various parcels of cargo. There could be no idea in the case of such a vessel of proceeding from the port at which she loaded for a shipper a particular parcel to the discharging port for that particular parcel, and a shipper who demanded any such course would have to pay a freight which would be entirely prohibitive, and indeed, in ordinary shipping business, there is no idea of any such requirement. The plaintiffs, therefore, do not complain in general of the course which the voyage took, nor do they complain that the original intention to proceed north about was changed to a voyage round the south of Australia. They have, however, put forward a plea of deviation and, as I understand it, all that remained at the end of the case of that plea consisted of two matters. I disregard the fact that the voyage was very long, because that depended on other circumstances and, I think, constitutes on the facts of this case no deviation. They rely, I suppose, under that plea on two circumstances, one, that the vessel proceeded to Brisbane after the plaintiffs' cargo was loaded. That, however, was not pleaded, and the pleadings have not been amended, the defendants saying that they had prepared no evidence on that point. The other complaint which, as I understand, remains under this head is that the vessel went to Cairns before she went to Townsville to load and did so at a time when she was intended to proceed by the northerly route. The captain was not called, being away on another voyage, but his letters were read in evidence, and I find in these letters, and particularly in the telegram of November 25, 1925, the explanation of that course, and that is that if she had loaded the substantial part of the cargo which she was booked to load at Townsville it would not have enabled her to proceed to Cairns and to load. I find, therefore, that there was no unreasonable deviation under the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, which deals with deviation by Article IV., paragraph 4. In fact, as it turned out, proceeding from Cairns to Townsville was on the line of her route when it was decided that she should go south. That decision, however, was only made at Townsville, but the fact of that decision would in any case, I think, prevent any damage from being recovered in respect of that course being taken, even if I thought it was an unreasonable deviation. The words of the Act about deviation are far from clear and many questions will no doubt some day have to be decided upon them. In particular the expression "reasonable deviation" may give rise to considerable difficulties. I think it is clear that a deviation would not be reasonable merely because it was convenient to the shipowner. Its reasonableness must depend upon what would be contemplated reasonably by both parties having regard to the well-known exigencies of the route, known, or assumed to be known, to both parties, and I think in this case that shippers on a cargo liner of this type must be deemed to have known the circumstances of mercantile geography, such as the position as to the amount of water available at Cairns and the probable draught of a vessel of this type, and it is on that ground that I do not think the deviation here, the only deviation which I think is before me, can be regarded as unreasonable. In addition to that, account would have to be taken, I think, of the various terms in the deviation clause. The deviation clause here is very wide and I think too wide to receive complete effect in every part, because every deviation clause must be construed with reference to the contemplated adventure. But I think that the language which gives "liberty to proceed to and stay at, and/or return to any ports or places whatsoever (although in a contrary direction to, or out of the route to or beyond the said port of discharge) once or oftener, in any order, backwards or forwards, for the purpose of dry docking (even with cargo on board) or loading or discharging cargo, coal or passengers, or for any purpose whatsoever" ought to receive a reasonable construction in view of the ordinary methods of voyaging adopted by a cargo liner on an adventure of this character, and quite apart from what I have said as to the reasonableness of calling at Townsville, I think calling at Townsville would also have been justified as reasonable having regard to the terms of the deviation clause which I have read. I hold, therefore, that there was no unreasonable deviation and it is, therefore, unnecessary for me to consider what, under the provisions of the Act, would be the effect if there was a deviation which, in the words of the Act, constituted "an infringement or breach of these rules or of the contract of carriage." As I have said, the voyage here was very protracted; in the case of this particular parcel it lasted for four and a half months from the time of loading. But that was due to a series of difficulties and to the low speeds at which the vessel was proceeding, and, as I have said, such delay in my judgment did not constitute an unreasonable deviation. In any case, the evidence is that, with proper temperatures in the hold, the length of time during which the voyage continued would cause no damage to the cargo. It is not suggested by either side that the ship was unseaworthy in any respect, the plea which the defendants had put on the record having been definitely abandoned.

What then was the cause of the damage to this cargo? In the end there are two theories put forward. The plaintiffs say that the temperatures in the hold were too high and were not uniform enough for the safe carriage of this cargo. The defendants say that the damage was due to the character of the meat when it was shipped, namely, that it was of low grade, and they rely on inherent vice under Article IV., 2 (m) of the Act. The damage on arrival was mould, and by that is meant white mould. The meat was perished and discoloured, the lean portions being dark brown and spongy and the fat pale and rancid. I have heard a good deal of evidence on this point but I find that the evidence relied upon by the plaintiffs is right. I accept in particular the evidence of Mr. Roland Clarke who surveyed the cargo on arrival and, as I find, made the survey in a reasonable and fair way and on a fair and customary sample. The mark "I.C.E." is a well-known brand of refrigerated meat. It is the third or lowest quality of the shippers. It is, however, a generally good class and to a large extent it consists of good quality meat which has become bruised and therefore has had to be scraped or partly cut off. It may be that some part of it is rather lean. The bill of lading says that the meat was shipped in apparent good order and condition or hard frozen. It is true that it was loaded in very hot weather and in that way perhaps there was some surface thawing. That, however, would not be extraordinary under such circumstances and is a matter which I think should be dealt with in the holds. The Freezing Certificates which accompanied the shipment referred to it as certifying that it was shipped "in good condition, properly dressed, cooled, and frozen . . . and the period between the time the meat was received into the freezing chambers and shipped per the Rimutaka did not exceed 90 days," and that the meat was despatched direct from the works to the ship. There is also a Government Certificate, but I disregard that because it seems to me rather to refer to the condition of the meat at the time when its preparation was completed than to its actual condition on shipment. I say no more about that. It appears on evidence put before me that such damage as was experienced as regards this parcel was not peculiar to this parcel but that similar damage was found in goods loaded by different shippers at different ports in different holds and of different qualities. On the whole I accept the evidence that the damage was due to the meat being carried at excessive temperatures and with excessive variations of temperature and I find that there is no ground for attack on the quality of the meat as responsible for the damage and no relation between the quality or condition of the meat on shipment and the damage ascertained on discharge. But excessive and irregular temperatures would, in the absence of unseaworthiness, which is not alleged, or some maritime casualty, which is not suggested, prima facie indicate some negligence or default in the care of the cargo on the ship, because the primary duty in carrying refrigerated cargoes is to maintain proper temperatures. In fact it is scarcely disputed that the temperatures on this voyage shown by the refrigerating logs were higher than customary, that is to say, up to Suez where they first became normal. The Captain wrote various letters from time to time which I think throw light on the feelings of those on board on this matter. The chief engineer who gave evidence gave some opinions somewhat at variance with these contemporaneous documents, but I think great weight must be given to the letters which were written at the time. No doubt the Captain writing about the temperatures in the holds would do so on the intimation of the chief engineer and after consultation with him. He wrote: "The temperatures in all holds came down to about normal after leaving Port Said, the sea and air being then colder." Before that they had not been normal, but a source of great anxiety to the Captain and engineer, at least whenever the sea temperatures were high, as appears from the Captain's letters. Thus at Cairns on December 17, 1925, the Captain wrote: "The refrigerating engine is only holding its own with the temperatures from 18deg. to 22deg. F." At Townsville the Captain gives the temperatures and adds: "The machine is just holding its own." That no doubt was in high temperatures, but the ship undertook to carry the cargo under the conditions which actually prevailed. At Townsville again the Captain writes and presses to be allowed to go by the southerly route. He writes again from Sydney that "due to the very high temperature of sea water and air" they could not bring the temperatures below an average of 20deg. F. "thereby running a great risk of the cargo going bad." Then he adds: "Refrigerator. This machine has done well. To time of ship sailing from Townsville it had been running for nearly five months," and then he says that but for the strike they would have loaded three months earlier "and no doubt the refrigerator would have been able to contend with the work required." He further referred to the coal which, as I explain below, does not appear to me to be material. At Albany on January 24, 1926, in cooler water he says: "The temperatures of the frozen meat holds are in a safe condition, being at an average of 16deg. to 17deg. F." They rose again, however, to an average of 18deg. with certain temperatures of 20deg. or 22deg. in some holds when the ship was in the Indian Ocean. At Colombo it is reported that the refrigerator is working well and holding its own at an average temperature in the hold of 18deg. F. A careful chart of the temperatures during the voyage up to Suez, as shown in the refrigerating logs, has been prepared by the plaintiffs. It gives as the margin of safety 18deg. F. and takes a lower limit of 16deg. F., and shows that the lower thermometers in the holds were sometimes above these temperatures and the upper thermometers were constantly considerably above that range of safety. It is agreed that this is the proper range. The chief engineer in the correspondence said that the thermometer readings at 22deg. or 23deg. F. caused him anxiety, and he also said in evidence that 15deg. F. was the proper carrying temperature and that he aimed at that or at 16deg., and that the actual temperatures were generally higher than normal and higher than what he would desire. It is, however, clear on the evidence that a piece of meat will be safe, if hard frozen to start with, if kept at 27deg. F. for lean meat and 22deg. F. for fat. This may appear to be at variance with what I find to be the recognized requirement, that the safe temperature should be about 15deg. or 16deg. F., with a danger limit of 18deg. F. Mr. Swainston says that this margin of safety is provided in case of a breakdown. That is to some extent true, but I think it is not the whole truth. I think the true explanation is that the temperatures shown on the thermometers cannot be relied on to show the temperatures throughout the hold or affecting large portions of meat in the hold, perhaps not even the correct temperatures at the bottom of the hold. In each hold there are twelve thermometers suspended, six at the top and six at the bottom. These thermometers are all eight feet from the outer side of the ship, or rather, I should say, of the insulation, and they are about one and a half feet from the bottom of the holds, or bottom of the insulation, and one and a half feet from the top, and they are fifteen feet or so apart. Between the thermometers and the side of the ship, and between the thermometers and the bottom of the ship, there is a risk of greater heating because those parts are nearer the water which may be at high temperatures. There is also a risk of hot pockets affecting pieces of cargo and of varying air currents, and, further than that, as you go higher in the hold the temperatures will become higher. For instance, the temperature shown by a thermometer one and a half feet above the bottom of the hold may be lower than the temperature even two feet above that. It is, I think, because of these reasons that 16deg. F. or thereabouts is generally taken as the safe limit, because that ensures that no piece of cargo can be dangerously higher. The main cause of damage was, as I find, that adequate steps were not at once taken, whenever the holds were closed down after loading, to reduce the temperatures and taken in proper time. The vessel had two refrigerating machines which were used alternatively or simultaneously. But, in the actual facts of the case, only one was ever used on the voyage. It worked at full capacity and it worked efficiently. That would, no doubt, have sufficed for the ordinary course of the voyage if the course, as I understand, recommended by Mr. Swainston as a wise precautionary measure had been taken, namely, to put on the second machine for a short period until the temperatures came down each time after loading and after the hatch covers were put on. Mr. Williams, the plaintiffs' principal expert, also said that the second machine should have been put on along with the first at that time, and Mr. Daniels also agreed. The reason given is that during loading, and especially in hot temperatures such as existed during this voyage on loading, the temperatures in the hold must rise ; indeed, the men will not work unless the temperature is brought up to, say, 20deg., and at the top of the hold it may rise to 30deg. or more. Furthermore, in hot weather meat, even if hard frozen in the proper sense of the term, may have superficial thawing and moisture, due to temporary exposure to the atmosphere. If there is such moisture on the meat, pollen, which is always present in the atmosphere, will settle upon it and white mould will develop unless the surface moisture is frozen before the pollen can germinate, which would be in about 24 or 48 hours. Rapid freezing of this surface moisture will stop germination and prevent mould, and once the temperatures are reduced quickly after closing the hold a single machine will cope sufficiently with the situation, and, as I find, would have coped sufficiently with the situation on this ship. Mr. Williams thinks that in that way the two machines would sufficiently cool the air and freeze the surface moisture in 24 hours. Even if it took longer, as Mr. Swainston seems to think (though his estimate of nine days refers to more complete cooling), and steam was not available in sufficient quantities both for driving the ship and working both refrigerating machines, the ship could have been kept in port, as indeed Mr. Swainston seems to think, until the temperatures were sufficiently down. She was not going at express speed, and a few days longer on such a voyage would not have made much difference. In any case, the ship's duty was to preserve the cargo. I hold that the chief engineer was guilty of an error of judgment in not taking these precautions, that is to say, in not putting on the second machine, as these precautions, I think, would have prevented the damage which the cargo suffered. The chief engineer impressed me as a capable and zealous officer and he was a most fair and candid witness, though some of his opinions I do not accept. His error of judgment was, I think considering all the circumstances, venial, especially considering the difficulties in which he had been placed by the strike, the heat due to the postponement of the voyage, and possibly troubles with the firemen and with the bunker coal. He had been accustomed to the New Zealand trade and found himself in conditions which were somewhat novel to him. All the same, I find that his error of judgment constituted a failure to exercise due care in the custody of the cargo. Much was said about the firemen who may have been rather slack by reason of discontent at having been worsted in the strike, though I feel that enthusiasm in firemen in the stokehold of the Rimutaka under the tropical conditions prevailing was very much to expect. I am sure that the engineers did their best to keep them up to their work. As to the coal, the chief engineer said that he did not find fault with some of the coal, but the Brisbane coal, which was bad, only consisted of 188 tons. Much of the other coal was excessive in ash, and none of it was as good as English or Welsh or even New Zealand coal. The ship's speed was poor, at times very poor. The chief engineer put the ship's speed with Australian coal at ten and a half knots, no doubt on the high side, not making allowances for head winds or difficulties of that type. The vessel's bottom at this time was very foul, and allowance has to be made for head winds and currents as well as for the usual cleaning of the furnaces in each watch, which obviously reduces the speed while it goes on. It was said that that source of delay was more than usual on this voyage owing to the high percentage of ash in the coal, but the chief engineer always had steam enough, though he was economising his steam, to work one refrigerating machine to its full capacity and to put on the other if he did not stop in port until he got the temperatures down, as it only reduced the speed from one-half to one knot. His lowest speeds on the Australian coast after leaving Brisbane averaged for the day over 6.63 knots with three exceptions of 6, 6.49, and 6.27 knots. Apart from that the average daily speeds up to Sydney were between 7.12 and 9.21 knots. There are at most only about five days when, allowing even one knot loss of average speed for the second refrigerating machine, the ship, with the two refrigerating machines working, would not have done the six knots which the chief mate said he "pretty well" wanted in going down the Barrier Reef. It might have been necessary to wait a few hours to get the temperatures down by the second machine at Gladstone, Brisbane, or Port Alma, though I am not satisfied as to that, but not at any later port. However that may be, if it was necessary to wait, then I think it was a proper and necessary step to take for the preservation of the cargo. In truth, the chief engineer, as he candidly said, never thought of putting on the second refrigerating machine except when they contemplated going by the Torres Straits. Apart from that he said he did not put on another refrigerating machine because he did not think it necessary, but he could have done so if he had considered it necessary. I am not disposed to blame him, but I hold that he committed an error of judgment and that that error, in my opinion, caused the damage to the cargo. For that, in my judgment, the defendants are liable unless they succeed in their defence in law, and for that defence they rely on the exception contained in Article IV., Subsection 2 (a), of the Sea Carriage of Goods Act.

It thus falls to be decided for the first time under the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924 (I treat the Australian Act as identical with the British Act), what is the extent of the shipowner's obligation where refrigerated cargo during its carriage on shipboard is damaged by the negligent management of the refrigerating machinery by the shipowner's servants. Article III., 2, is in these terms, "Subject to the provisions of Article IV., the carrier shall properly and carefully load, handle, stow, carry, keep, care for, and discharge the goods carried." Article III., 8, provides that, "Any clause, covenant or agreement in a contract of carriage relieving the carrier or the ship from liability for loss or damage to or in connexion with goods arising from negligence, fault or failure in the duties and obligations provided in this Article or lessening such liability otherwise than as provided in these Rules, shall be null and void and of no effect." It is clear that the obligation to carry, keep, and care for the goods between stowage and discharge is to be performed not by the carrier personally but by his servants, especially those on board the ship during the voyage. A refrigerated cargo depends for its preservation on being carried in insulated holds, kept at the proper temperatures by the due and proper management of the refrigerating machinery. The putting into further insulated holds appertains to the loading and stowage. Until discharge practically the whole duty as regards the proper caring for the cargo as such is summed up in the due management of the refrigerating machinery so as to maintain correct temperatures. Article III., 2, is, however, subject to Article IV., which is in the nature of an exception clause. The only relevant "exception," to adopt the expression of Article IV., 2 (q) is Article IV., 2 (a), which is in the following terms, "Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from act, neglect, or default of the master, mariner, pilot, or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship." It is apparent that if "management of the ship" here includes management of the refrigerating machinery resulting in improper temperatures in the hold to the detriment of the cargo, there is in effect nothing left of the obligation properly to care for such a cargo under Article III., 2. On that view in effect the exception is a general negligence exception, but in the absence of very clear words where words of positive obligation are subject to words of exception, the presumption is that the exception is narrower than the obligation. Refrigerated cargoes are of sufficient importance to call for special reference in Article III., 1 (c), but indeed the contention that management of refrigerating machinery is included in the phrase "navigation and management of the cargo," is only part of a general contention that the phrase is a general exception of any negligence in the care of the cargo where such care depends on the "management" of any appliance or part of the ship provided for or adapted to the care of the cargo, such as pipelines and pumping appliances, in the case of liquid cargoes, ventilating appliances, and any special appliances or parts of the ship, such as ventilators, ventilating fans and pumps, the due handling of which is necessary for the proper care of the cargo. In many cases of particular cargoes the effect of the suggested construction of the exception is entirely, and in other case, largely, to neutralize the positive obligation properly to care for the cargo. No doubt the obligation is "subject to" the exception, but it is necessary to construe the words of the obligation and of the exception together so as to decide if the words of the latter are explicit enough to justify the effect which is contended for. These questions are not limited to caring for the goods during carriage, but also arise in reference to loading and discharging, which operations may be performed by means either of shore cranes or of the ship's derricks and winches. To say that "navigation and management of the ship" includes management of any part of the structure of the ship, even if only used for cargo purposes, would mean that the shipowner would be relieved of liability for damage to cargo caused by the negligent handling of the ship's derricks and winches, and relieved of any obligation by his servants to care for the same, whereas if identically the same operation was carried out in loading or discharging with the same negligence by shore cranes he would be liable —a somewhat anomalous distinction.

Apart from authority, which I shall consider later, I do not think the scope of Article IV., 2 (a), is as wide as the defendants contend, or is so wide as to cover negligence in the due performance of the obligation to care for the refrigerated cargo by keeping down the temperatures in the hold by means of the refrigerating machinery. A negligence or exception clause in a statute, as in a contract, ought, I think, to be strictly construed. The words of Article IV., 2 (a), appear to be connected with matters directly affecting the ship as a ship, and not with matters, affecting exclusively, or even primarily, the cargo, even though such latter matters involve the user of parts of the ship. The word "navigation" is clearly only applicable to the ship as such, and I think the more general word "management" should be read as ejusdem generis and the word "ship" should receive the same connotation with each of the substantives on which it is dependent, the word "management" covering many acts directly affecting the ship which could not well be covered by navigation. The words of the exception are not "in the navigation or in the management of the ship or of any part of the ship necessary for the proper and due care of the cargo," nor are the words, to put it differently, "in the management of the cargo by the use of the ship's parts or appliances." I see no difficulty in the broad demarcation of the distinction I have just indicated, though there may be border line cases. The distinction is (to adopt the words of Lord Justice Stirling in Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Co., 19 The Times

L.R., 668 ; [1903] 2 K.B., 666, at p. 682) between negligent acts which have to do with the general management of the vessel and negligent acts which have to do with the management of a portion of the vessel appropriated to the cargo. A modern steamship is not only a complicated steel structure of frames, girders, and plates, but contains complicated machinery such as propelling engines and boilers (which have supplanted masts, sails, and rigging), steam steering gear, ballast tanks and pumps and elaborate piping. Negligence in handling these directly affects the ship in its essential functions of floating, being water-tight, being steered and navigated safely and correctly. If a ship is stranded or sunk, if the sea connexions are improperly opened, and so on, there is a fault in navigation and management which directly affects the ship, but there is also, in so far as the cargo is thereby damaged by such negligence, a breach of the obligation to care for the cargo, and it is to such negligence in my opinion that the exception of Article IV., 2 (a) applies. On the other hand many modern steamships like the Rimutaka have holds which are insulated and which can be cooled by elaborate refrigerating machinery and apparatus. All this constitutes parts of the ship and of its equipment, but these are solely provided for the care of the special cargo. The ship can, as a seagoing vessel, be safely and efficiently navigated and managed even though the refrigerating equipment is in disorder and the cargo perishing. This equipment is not in use at all on voyages where no refrigerated cargo is being carried. The same is true of the elaborate system of tanks, pipes, and pumps necessary for the carriage of fuel oil. I take these illustrations as sufficient to indicate the distinction between navigation and management of the ship on the one hand and management of the cargo on the other. There are also some parts of the ship which for this purpose may be regarded as ancipitis usus, for instance, the hatches may in one aspect be regarded as part of the outer skin of the vessel, as when decks are actually or potentially swept by seas, so that the proper battening down of the hatches with tarpaulins and cleats is as much a part of the management of the ship as the closing of port holes. Under other circumstances as in dock or in calm waters the hatches belong to the management of the cargo, either because they have to be removed for ventilation or kept tight to keep wet from perishable cargo. Similarly ship's derricks and winches may be used for ship's purposes so as to appertain to the management of the ship.

The construction I have ventured to propound must depend on the precise words of this Statute, reading all parts together, but it is, I think, generally in accord with the cases decided on the words "navigation and management of the ship" contained in the American Act of Congress, 1893, generally known as the Harter Act, which in the Courts of the United States has been construed as a statute, and in the Courts of this country as having contractual force when embodied in the bill of lading. The distinction explained above has in such cases (with perhaps one exception) been drawn. The Harter Act contains two clauses prohibiting in contracts of affreightment the insertion of clauses relieving the shipowner from liability for proper care in regard to the cargo or lessening his liability to exercise due diligence to provide a seaworthy ship. In the third clause it gives a conditional statutory exception of (inter alia) "faults or errors in the navigation or in the management of the vessel."

Of the English authorities I may refer to two decisions of Divisional Courts in Admiralty. In The Glenochil ([1896] P., 10) goods were damaged by water geting into the hold through a broken pipe when the ballast tank was being pumped up to trim the vessel. That was held to be management of the vessel, though not navigation. Mr. Justice Barnes said : "There will be found a strong and marked contrast in the provisions which deal with the care of the cargo and those which deal with the management of the ship herself." In The Rodney (16 The Times L.R., 183 ; [1900] P., 112), the boatswain in order to rid the forecastle of water during heavy weather, in clearing a pipe poked a hole by which seawater got into the hold, and it was held to be an act of management of the ship. Mr. Justice Barnes said : "The words 'faults or errors in the management of the vessel' include improper handling of the ship, as a ship, which affects the safety of the cargo." In neither of these cases had the act done any direct or indirect reference to the cargo ; in each case the continuity of the ship's defences against the inlet of seawater was interfered with. Certain American decisions do exemplify cases where parts of the ship have been used solely or primarily for the care of the cargo and where these acts have not been held to constitute acts in the management of the vessel but acts in the care and custody of the cargo. In the case of Andean Trading Company v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company (263 Fed. Rep., 559), the Circuit Court of Appeals (Federal) New York held that damage to cargo due to hatches being improperly left open for ventilation was not an act primarily "connected with the navigation or management of the vessel and not with the cargo." They adopted this mode of expressing the differentiation from the Supreme Court decision in the case of Knott v. Botany Mills (179 U.S., 69), where cargo stowed in the fore part of a hold was damaged by drainage from cargo stowed aft of it, the ship being put slightly down by the head so as in no way to affect her seaworthiness. That was held to be neglect in the care of the cargo and not in the navigation or management of the vessel. In the case of The Jean Bart (197 Fed. Rep., 1002), a failure to make during the voyage proper use of ventilating apparatus so that cargo was damaged was held not to be an act in the management of the ship, but a failure in proper care of the cargo. In the case of The Germanic (196 U.S., 589), the Supreme Court again adopted the limitation of the exception of faults in management of the ship to "faults primarily connected with the navigation or management of the vessel and not with the cargo." The application of the principle to the facts in that case was somewhat striking.

There are two earlier authorities dealing with the care of refrigerated cargoes, one in this country, the case of Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company, per Mr. Justice Kennedy (19 The Times L.R., 67 ; [1903] 1 K.B., 114) and in the Court of Appeal (19 The Times L.R., 668 ; [1903] 2 K.B., 666), the other in America, the case of The Samland (7 Fed. Rep., 2nd Series, 155). In Rowson's case (supra) Mr. Justice Kennedy held that want of due diligence in the user of the refrigerating apparatus was "negligence in the management of the ship of which that machinery is a part" (at p. 117). He seems to arrive at that conclusion by considering that the original fitness of the refrigerating machinery is necessary to constitute the ship seaworthy, in the artificial sense of being fit to carry the special cargo. In the Court of Appeal the gist of the argument on behalf of the owners of the goods may be found in the following passage from the report in [1903]

2 K.B., at p. 671 : "Attending to refrigerating machinery cannot be said to be included in the management of the ship merely because it happens to be bolted to the ship and is operated by the ship's engines. It may be that on a particular voyage the machinery may not be required to be used at all. It is essentially an arrangement for the care and custody of the cargo, and the shipowner can only escape liability for his negligent default as regards such care and custody by clear, definite, and express language : mere words of general exemption are insufficient to protect him. Here the successful carriage of these goods depended upon the refrigerating machinery being kept in good working order." The Court of Appeal, while affirming the decision of Mr. Justice Kennedy in the result, did so on the limited ground that the refrigerating apparatus and machinery was not merely used for purposes of the cargo but also for cooling the ship's provisions. The most careful judgment is that of Lord Justice Stirling who quotes with approval the expressions of the Court to be found in the judgment in The Glenochil (supra) and The Rodney (supra). The learned Lord Justice draws a distinction between a negligent act which had nothing to do with the general management of the vessel but simply with the management of a portion of the vessel which was exclusively appropriated to the care of the cargo. Lord Justice Vaughan Williams at page 675 says : "What . . . is the meaning of the words 'in the management of said vessel'? I say they mean in the management of the said vessel qua vessel." He adds, on the hypothesis that the refrigerating apparatus was solely for the cargo, "I should, I think, not have been able to persuade myself to come to the conclusion that mismanagement of that special apparatus was a mismanagement of the vessel." No such distinction arises in the Rimutaka. It is true that the plan shows a ship's chamber apparently insulated, but it is shown as empty and no point was taken or evidence given that it was refrigerated on the voyage or at all. The ground of distinction is, I venture to think, somewhat artificial and would enable shipowners, by adding an insulated cool chamber for the ship's provisions and keeping them refrigerated, essentially to change the ambit of their obligation to care for refrigerated cargo, and thus escape liability. The ship's chamber must be almost negligible in size compared with the refrigerated cargo holds. I respectfully think that the matter should be dealt with on a broader ground. The limitation in question has not been approved in the United States, see the case of The Samland (supra), where it was held that failure properly to control the refrigerating appliances was not a fault in the management of the vessel. The Judge said of Rowson's case (supra) : "This case, however, has not been followed by Judge Dietrich in The Jean Bart (supra), and the Circuit Court of Appeals in this (New York) Circuit in Andean Trading Company v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company (supra)." It is clearly established that section 3 of the Harter Act is limited in its application to faults "primarily connected with the management of the vessel and not with the cargo." I may add that even if the provision of refrigerated food for the crew is equalled with the provision of fuel for the propulsion of the ship, so that the refrigeration of the ship's chamber forms part of the management of the ship, and the same refrigerating machinery is used for the crew's food and for the cargo, these facts ought not to affect the conclusion that, quoad the refrigeration of the cargo holds, it is the management of the cargo and not of the ship which is involved. But the point does not arise in this case.

There remain to be considered two decisions of the English Court of Appeal under the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act of 1924. In R. F. Brown and Co., Limited v. T. and J. Harrison (43 The Times L.R., 633) goods had been stolen during discharge by stevedore men. It was contended for the shipowners that they were exempted from liability for the theft by Article IV. 2 (a) of the Act as being a default in the management of the ship. Lord Justice Bankes quotes and relies on the various English and American decisions under the Harter Act and applies their principles to the words of the statute in the case before him. Lord Justice Atkin, however, while agreeing with Lord Justice Bankes, adds this caution. He refers to the fact "that at the present day a part of the proper equipment of cargo-carrying ships is very largely concerned with appliances for the safe carrying of the cargo, appliances that have nothing to do with the navigation of the ship but have everything to do with the safety of the cargo, and among other things one would mention in particular the refrigerating machinery." He adds in conclusion : "For my part, at the present moment, I have a difficulty in seeing, if there was a defect in the management of those appliances in the ship which are an essential part of the ship, that that would not be a defect in the management of the ship." It is, I think, clear that the learned Lord Justice is not committing himself to any final expression of opinion. The point was not before him and I do not know what authorities were cited. I need not say how carefully I have considered even the tentative opinions or questioning of the Lord Justice, but I do not conceive I can be bound by it.

The other case is Gosse Millard, Limited v. Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited (44 The Times L.R., 143). In that case the Court of Appeal by a majority reversed the decision of the trial Judge who had held that damage to perishable cargo in the ship's hold by rain water, while the ship was in dock, through the hatches or tarpaulins not being properly attended to for the protection of the cargo, fell within Article III., 2, and did not fall within the exception of Article IV., 2 (a). There was some difference of opinion in the Court of Appeal. Lord Justice Greer agreed with the Judge in the view he had taken of the facts, whereas Lord Justice Sargant differed on the facts, but both seem to assume that management of the hatches is not necessarily management of the vessel. Lord Justice Scrutton, however, who agreed with Lord Justice Sargant that the appeal should be allowed, did so on the express ground that any user of any part of the ship, even if solely directed to the benefit of the cargo, came within the exception of Article IV., 2 (a). He says in terms : "Negligent management of the propelling machinery, which is hardly 'navigation,' and negligent management of the refrigerating or ventilating or pumping machinery, seem all equally to be management of the ship." The Lord Justice would clearly decide this case in a contrary sense to what I am now deciding. As his opinion was not necessary for the decision of the case, and as the other Lord Justices did not express the same opinion, I cannot treat it as binding upon me. I need not say with what anxiety and diffidence I have expressed a view different from that of the learned Lord Justice, but as the question is of vital importance for shippers and receivers of refrigerated cargo and for shipowners, and now arises for the first time under the Act, I have felt it my duty to form and express my own opinion.

In my opinion the exception does not protect the shipowner in this case and in the result the plaintiffs will recover the amount of their damages.

WING AND OTHERS v. BURN AND OTHERS.*

Action (Cause of) — Association — Action by representative plaintiffs — Affiliation — Cancellation — Claim for damages—No deprivation of any right of property—Statement of claim struck out.

The defendants, Mr. A. J. Burn, Mr. C. de La Quintana, and Mr. Percy Longhurst, who were sued on behalf of themselves and all other members of the National Amateur Wrestling Association, asked by this motion that the statement of claim delivered in the action on December 9, 1927, by the plaintiffs, Mr. A. M. Wing, Mr. J. C. Wright, and Mr. W. E. Dowling, suing on behalf of themselves and all other members of the Lancashire County Amateur Wrestling Association, should be ordered to be struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action, and that the action might be dismissed, with costs.

The plaintiffs and the defendants were the vice-presidents, honorary treasurers, and honorary secretaries of their respective associations. The Lancashire Association was affiliated to the National Association on November 8, 1923, subject to the payment of the annual subscription of three guineas. On April 22, 1927, the National Amateur Wrestling Association passed a resolution cancelling the affiliation of the Lancashire Association on the ground that they had refused to recognize the authority of the National Association.

In the statement of claim the plaintiffs denied that they had refused to recognize the authority of the National Association. They said that they arranged championship competitions in Lancashire for July and August, 1927, the bantam-weight, feather-weight, and light-weight championships and the welter-weight championship; that the organizing body in each case undertook to pay the fee to the Lancashire Association of 12 guineas, a total sum of £50 8s.; that the National Association proclaimed those meetings as unregistered meetings, and gave notice that the affiliation of the Lancashire Association had been cancelled. By reason thereof the championship competitions so arranged could not be held.

The plaintiffs claimed an injunction restraining the defendants from cancelling the affiliation and a declaration that such purported cancellation was illegal, ultra vires and contrary to natural justice, and the sum of £50 8s. by way of damages, and general damages.

Mr. Meyrick J. L. Beebee appeared for the defendants and Mr. J. W. F. Beaumont for the plaintiffs.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON, in giving judgment, said that the plaintiffs had previously claimed an injunction before him, and on that occasion he had decided that the matters in respect of which an injunction was claimed were of such a character that, having regard to the law as stated by Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, in Rigby v. Connol (14 Ch.D., 482), the Court would not grant an injunction as the plaintiffs were not seeking to enforce any right of property or something for which they had paid any value. The plaintiffs had now put in a statement of claim, and claimed £50 8s. by way of damages. Having regard to the decision in Markt and Co. v. Knight Steamship Company, Limited ([1910] 2 K.B., 1021), he was bound to hold that no claim for damages in such a case as this could be made by representative plaintiffs such as were suing here, and that that was applicable also to the claim for general damages.

The plaintiffs, as representatives of the association, had not proved that they were deprived by any action of the defendants of any right of property. As the pleadings stood, therefore, there was no cause of action, and the statement of claim must be struck out, but he was not prepared to stay the action altogether. The costs of the defendants' application must be taxed and paid by the plaintiffs.

Court of Appeal. (Scrutton and Atkin, L.JJ., and Eve, J.) 1928. Jan. 23.

COLESHILL v. MANCHESTER CORPORATION.*

Negligence—Bare licensee—Obvious danger in road—Road not a public highway—Injury to licensee—No liability on owners of road.

Practice—Trial—Cause partly heard—Death of Judge—Continuance of trial by another Judge—Reading notes of evidence already given—Witnesses not recalled—Request of parties—Precedent not to be followed.

The defendants, a local authority, were engaged in making, in connexion with a building estate of theirs, a road which was a cul-de-sac and was not a public highway and was still unlighted at night. People were in the habit of using the road to gain access through a hole in the fence to the defendants' land for the purpose of making a short cut to a golf links, and the defendants had done nothing to stop them. The plaintiff went along the road in daylight to reach the short cut to the golf links, and he failed to notice that there was across the road an open trench which had been made for the purpose of laying an electric main. In returning after dark the plaintiff was injured by falling into the trench, which was unlighted and unfenced. In an action for damages,

Held, that the plaintiff's position could not be put higher than that of a bare licensee, and, as he entered the road on the first occasion in daylight and the trench was obvious and the road was obviously unfinished, there was no evidence of the defendants' having exposed the plaintiff to a danger which was not obvious or not reasonably to be expected, and the action failed.

Per Scrutton, L.J. : Where on a trial with a jury, after some of the witnesses have been called, the Judge dies, another Judge ought not, even at the request of the parties, to continue the trial after reading the shorthand notes of the evidence already given, but the witnesses ought to be recalled.

This was an appeal by the defendants, the Manchester Corporation, from a verdict and judgment in favour of the plaintiff for £300 damages for personal injuries in an action tried by Mr. Justice Acton and a special jury at Manchester Assizes. The facts are stated in the judgments.

Mr. Merriman, K.C., and Mr. N. J. Laski appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Singleton, K.C., and Mr. Harold Rhodes for the respondent.

The following considered judgments were delivered.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This case, on comparatively simple facts not much in dispute, raises questions on which the authorities are by no means clear. The claim of the plaintiff is for personal injuries caused by falling into a trench on a road which was being made by the defendants, the Manchester Corporation, in connexion with the development of a building estate of theirs. The road in question, which was agreed at the trial not to be a public highway, was a cul-de-sac about 260 yards long, at one end running into a public highway, the Errwood-road, at the other end terminating in a quickset hedge. On the north side the corporation were building houses, none of which were occupied at the time of the accident, though they were sufficiently completed for the tenants to move in a week after. The road itself was 50 feet wide, 24 feet being roadway, the remaining 26 feet being made up of two grass pathways, which had been kerbed. On the day of the accident there was a trench cut across the roadway to lay an electric main to an electric standard for lighting. No lights were yet installed in the roadway, and the trench itself was at night unlighted and unfenced. The whole road, indeed, was unlighted at night, the lighting not having been installed at the time of the accident. The condition of the pathways a fortnight after the accident was described by the plaintiff's surveyor thus : "The footpath on the side on which the houses were built was more or less impassable. There had been an excavation for some sort of main—I think an electric main. . . . The footpath on the other side—you could walk along it in parts . . . but a good deal of it was very rough. There were heaps of soil and so forth." The surveyor said that it was obviously not a completed road ; the father of the plaintiff also said that it was obviously not a finished road. Mr. Willoughby, one of the earliest tenants, who knew the road before September 5, 1926, said that he had never before that date seen vehicles on the road. But parts of the road and footpaths, especially at its entrance to Errwood-road, were level before the accident, though the surface of the road was not finished.

The land on the south of the road was owned by the Manchester Corporation, though not yet built on. It was divided from the road by a two-barred fence. South of this land again was a golf links which had public footpaths across it, and was apparently a favourite walk of the neighbours, especially on Sundays. At some point of the fence one of its top bars had been broken, so that by stepping over the broken bar you could get into the field, and people walking through this gap towards the golf links had made a sort of rough footpath. A good many people had taken this short cut, particularly on Sundays, and the corporation, if they knew of it, had done nothing to stop them, though when the houses on the south side of the road were built the short cut would of course be stopped.

The plaintiff was engaged to a young lady who lived in the neighbourhood and he had walked with her on the golf links, reaching them by a public footpath further down Errwood-road. He had never been on the unfinished road in question before, but on this Sunday, seeing some people coming up the grassy short cut, he and the lady walked down the road about 5 o'clock, a quarter of an hour after sunset. He said, "The road looked quite well to walk on. . . . I did not notice the road going. I walked on the right-hand side of the road, the footpath. . . . I came upon a hole in the footpath, and went through a gap in the fence." He said that he did not see the excavation across the road or any earth thrown up from it. In fact, on the given dimensions, over two cubic yards of earth must have been thrown up from the excavation somewhere. He stayed about a quarter of an hour on the golf links and came back through the gap in the fence, entering the road after 9 o'clock, when it was growing dark. He then fell into the trench and sustained the injuries for which he sued.

The case was heard under melancholy circumstances, for Mr. Justice Fraser, who began the case on a Thursday, hearing three of the plaintiff's witnesses, was taken ill during the night and died on the Friday. Mr. Justice Acton was sent down from London on the Sunday, and having read Thursday's shorthand notes, at the urgent request of the parties continued the case with the same jury on the Monday, the Thursday's witnesses not being recalled. I can understand that in the unprecedented and painful circumstances it is unnecessary to take any objection to what happened, but I think it is a precedent which should not be followed in future. I doubt whether a Judge has any jurisdiction to continue the hearing of a case in which witnesses have been called in Court in the course of the trial before the jury and another Judge, it not being a case of evidence on commission or before an examiner.

In the result Mr. Justice Acton, who had not been referred to any authorities except Oldham v. Sheffield Corporation (43 The Times L.R., 222) and Murley Brothers v. Grove (46 J.P., 360), rejected the submission of the defendants' counsel that there was no case to go to the jury, and framed certain questions, the defendants' counsel not assisting. These questions were apparently based on the Sheffield Corporation case (supra) and on the lines that the corporation had represented to reasonable passers-by, by the appearance of the road and by not stopping them, that this was a highway on which they might safely walk, and were not addressed in any way to the position of the plaintiff as a trespasser, bare licensee, or invitee, in the sense in which these terms have been used in recent cases. The plaintiff's original contention that the road was a highway was abandoned early in the trial.

The questions and answers were as follows : "(1) Would any reasonable member of the public reasonably have supposed that he had either the invitation or the permission of the defendants to use the part of the roadway between Errwood-road and the golf links ?—A. Yes. (2) Did the plaintiff so suppose ?—A. Yes. (3) Did the plaintiff, when he entered the said part of the roadway, either (a) mean to leave the highway or (b) know that he was leaving the highway ?—A. No. (4) Was the excavation left in a dangerous condition at the time when the plaintiff fell in ?—A. Yes. (5) Was there contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff ?—A. No. The somewhat unusual form of these questions is explained by the fact referred to above that apparently only two cases had been cited to Mr. Justice Acton—Oldham v. Sheffield Corporation (supra) and Murley Brothers v. Grove (supra). In Oldham's case (supra) the plaintiff, driving a motor-car along a lighted highway at night, saw in front of him an apparently continuous line of lights, suggesting a continuous highway. In fact there was on the line an unbridged ravine, approached by a private road in course of construction, barred at the end approaching the ravine by an unlighted hoarding. On the other side of the ravine there was a lighted highway, and the Sheffield Corporation were intending to join the two highways by a bridge and the dedication of the private road when constructed. Mr. Justice Salter, who tried the case, was faced with the decision in Murley Brothers v. Grove (supra), where a driver at night drove into an unlighted trench on an undedicated road connecting two highways and the owner of the land was held under no liability to the licensee. He distinguished it on the ground that in Murley Brothers v. Grove (supra) the plaintiff, making a short cut from one highway to another, knew that he had left the highway, whereas in Oldham's case (supra) the plaintiff was misled by the line of lights and failure to warn into thinking he was still on the highway. This seems to explain the form of the first three questions. The first question is rather unfortunate, as there is no "roadway between Errwood-road and the golf course." To reach the golf course you get through a gap in a broken fence over a bar, and proceed through rough grass trodden down by passers-by until you reach an admitted public footpath. From the plaintiff's point of view he went along the unfinished road for two reasons : (1) he was going to the golf course, which he had always previously reached by another route, and saw people coming up through the grass, so he assumed that he could get through ; (2) the beginning of the cul-de-sac road looked finished. From these two facts he seems to have inferred that he might go, and he seems not to have been dissuaded from going by the facts that, as he walked along, the road was obviously unfinished, containing improperly filled-up trenches and holes, and that he had to get through and over a broken gap in the fence to get on the way to the links. On the other hand, the case against the defendants is put on the ground that, as they had not in the past stopped people from going along the road and through the fence, they must be taken to have licensed all such people in the future, and so came under an obligation, after they had failed to stop the first trespasser, not to set a trap for the subsequent licensees.

The plaintiff went along the road for the first time in broad daylight, and, assuming that he had then tumbled into the trench, it is impossible to think that he could have succeeded in an action. The danger was an obvious one to anyone who used his eyes. It was not placed there to injure him, but in the ordinary use of a road which was being made and lighted. It was there before ever he used the road. A similar position would arise if, in getting over the lower bar of the fence, he had stumbled. It would, I think, have been impossible to say that in daylight that bar in the path was a trap ; it was, if you walked straight in, a danger, but an obvious one. I take the same view of an accident at the fence when the plaintiff returned half an hour later ; he knew that there was such a bar, and he could not complain if he came to grief in getting over it in the dark. There remains the question whether he can complain of the trench across the road, which he did not in fact see when he walked along the road, though it was there, and into which he fell when he returned in the dark.

It is clear that the plaintiff's position cannot be put higher than that of a bare licensee. Lord Sumner in Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Procter (39 The Times L.R., 275 ; [1923] A.C., 253, at p. 272) distinguished invitee and licensee thus : "In the case of the former, invitor and invitee have a common interest, while, in the latter, licensor and licensee have none." There was clearly no common interest between the plaintiff and the defendants here. If the plaintiff is to be treated as a licensee and not a trespasser, because, though he did not know it, other people had not been stopped from doing the same thing, his position as a licensee is thus defined by Lord Sumner in the same case at page 274 : "A licensee takes premises, which he is merely permitted to enter, just as he finds them. The one exception to this is that, as it is put shortly, the occupier must not lay a trap for him or expose him to a danger not obvious nor to be expected there under the circumstances. If the danger is obvious, the licensee must look out for himself ; if it is one to be expected, he must expect it and take his own precautions. If he will walk blindfold, he walks at his peril, even though he is blindfolded by the action of the elements. As usual in cases of duties of care, the reasonable man is the standard on both sides. The licensor must act with reasonable diligence to prevent his premises from misleading or entrapping a licensee, who on his side uses reasonable judgment and conduct under circumstances that can be reasonably foreseen. The licensee is to take reasonable care of himself and cannot call a thing a trap, the existence of which a reasonable man would have expected or suspected, so as to guard himself from falling into it." This is only repeating what had been said by Lord Justice Farwell in Latham v. R. Johnson and Nephew (Limited) (29 The Times L.R., 124 ; [1913] 1 K.B., 398). When this licensee entered these premises in daylight there was an open trench across the road with thrown-up earth heaped around it. The owner of the land must not expose the licensee to a danger not obvious or not to be expected there under the circumstances. In my opinion it is impossible on the evidence to say that this trench in daylight was not obvious or that the road was not obviously in daylight an unfinished road, with buildings and road in course of construction and development, and I use "obvious" in the sense in which Lord Wrenbury uses it in Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (39 The Times L.R., 54 ; [1923] A.C., 74).

Approaching the case from this point of view, the question at the end of the plaintiff's case appears to be : Is there any evidence on which a jury could reasonably find that the defendants had exposed the plaintiff to a danger not obvious or not reasonably to be expected in the circumstances ? And having regard to the fact that the plaintiff entered the road in daylight, and that on the evidence of his own witnesses it was obviously an unfinished and unlighted road, I cannot see any evidence on which a jury could find a concealed danger. There appears to me to be nothing in the nature of a representation of a safe highway, such as the continuous line of lights in Oldham's case (supra), nothing in the nature of an obstacle which was known by the defendants to be dangerous, but which the plaintiff would reasonably think not dangerous, such as the horse with a tendency to bite mankind, in Lowery v. Walker (27 The Times L.R., 83 ; [1911] A.C., 10).

This is enough to dispose of the case, but I desire to add that I am disposed to think that failure to interfere with people walking about in the daytime does not constitute a licence to walk about at night. I also think the question of the obligation of a person who does not stop people from walking on his land to disclose natural objects of which he knows, and of which the walkers may not know, may require further consideration. I doubt whether the owner of a mountain, with rock faces, when he knows that the rock holds are unstable, is bound to warn every one whom he sees about to climb that the rocks are not safe ; or whether the owner of East Coast cliffs, which have an unpleasant habit of sliding down on to the beach, is bound to warn every one of the risk of the cliff falling.

For these reasons, I think Mr. Justice Acton, at the end of the plaintiff's case, should have withdrawn the case from the jury on the ground that the danger to which the plaintiff was exposed was, on his own evidence, obvious to a reasonable man, and one reasonably to be expected in the circumstances ; and that, the plaintiff being at the best a bare licensee (and I doubt if he was that by right), the defendants owed no duty to him in respect of such a danger.

The appeal, in my opinion, should be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendants, with costs here and below.

Lord Justice Atkin.—In this case, the facts of which I need not recapitulate, the jury by their answers appear to have found that the plaintiff was permitted by the defendants to enter the roadway in question ; that he was misled by the defendants into assuming that the roadway was an ordinary highway and that he fell without negligence into a trench dug by the defendants in such highway. Upon these findings the Judge has entered judgment for the plaintiff, as I think he was entitled to do. The question before us is whether there is any evidence to support the jury's findings. I think there was evidence to support the finding that the plaintiff was impliedly permitted to enter the roadway ; in other words, that he was a licensee ; and in the course of the argument we so intimated to counsel. The substantial question is whether there was evidence to support any finding that the defendants misled the plaintiff into believing that the roadway in question was a highway. Apart from such a finding I think it clear that the plaintiff could not recover. This part of the Shawbrook-road was at the time of the accident in the course of being made up into an ordinary road with carriage-way and side pavements for the purpose of affording access to houses which had been built or were to be built on either side of it. Its exact condition I will consider presently ; but it had not been completed, still less dedicated to the public ; none of the houses abutting on it had been occupied, and it was, in fact, still the private property of the defendants. The plaintiff therefore met with his accident while traversing, as a licensee, the property of the defendants ; and it is clear that, with certain qualifications, he has to pass over the property as it is and takes the risk of such dangers as he finds on it.

It is no doubt unfortunate that the law relating to the obligation of owners of property towards those who come upon it compels distinctions to be drawn which are subtle and apt to be confused. On the other hand, they correspond to real differences in the nature of the user of property, and in the reasonable claims to protection of those who are permitted such use. As to the rights of bare licensees I find three recent authorities which appear to afford safe guidance. In Latham v. Richard Johnson and Nephew, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 124 ; [1913] 1 K.B., 398, at p. 411), Lord Justice Hamilton says : "The rule as to licensees, too, is that they must take the premises as they find them apart from concealed sources of danger ; where dangers are obvious they run the risk of them. In darkness, where they cannot see whether there is danger or not, if they will walk they walk at their peril : Gautret v. Egerton (L.R., 2 C.P., 371) ; Lewis v. Ronald (26 The Times L.R., 30) ; and see generally Indermaur v. Dames (L.R., 2 C.P., 311) ; Collis v. Selden (L.R., 3 C.P., 495) ; Holmes v. North Eastern Railway Co. (L.R., 4 Ex., 254 ; L.R., 6 Ex., 123) ; Batchelor v. Fortescue (11 Q.B.D., 474). Where 'the owners allowed all persons who chose to do so, for recreation or for business, to go upon the waste without complaint. . . . One who thus uses the waste has no right to complain of an excavation he finds there. He must take the permission with its concomitant conditions, and, it may be, perils' : per Mr. Justice Williams in Hounsell v. Smyth (7 C.B.N.S., 731, at p. 743), and see Wilkinson v. Fairrie (1 H. and C., 633) ; Binks v. South Yorkshire Railway and River Dun Company (32 L.J., Q.B., 26), and Hardcastle v. South Yorkshire Railway Company (28 L.J., Ex., 139). 'The licensee or visitor must take care of himself, in using the premises as he finds them ; . . . he is not entitled to be protected from the existing risks of the premises in their ordinary state, by the care of the owner' : per Chief Baron Pigot in Sullivan v. Waters (14 Ir. C.L.R., 460, at p. 469). Again, Scotch law is the same. 'When a person uses by permission private property where a pond or other dangerous excavation exists, he must take the benefit of the use subject to the risk which attends it' : per Lord Shand in Prentice v. Assets Company, Limited (17 R., 484, at p. 489) ; and Ross v. Keith (16 R., 86)."

In Hayward v. Drury Lane Theatre, Limited, and Moss' Empires, Limited (33 The Times L.R., 557 ; [1917] 2 K.B., 899, at p. 913), Lord Justice Scrutton says: "A bare or mere licensee, one who has no common interest with the owner of the premises but is there by the owner's permission, takes the premises as he finds them, with all their dangers and traps, a trap being a danger which a person who does not know the premises could not avoid by reasonable care and skill. The owner is under no liability as to existing traps unless he intentionally set them for the licensee, but must not create new traps without taking precautions to protect licensees against them : see the judgment of Mr. Justice Willes in Gautret v. Egerton (supra)," and later on at page 914 he says : "The difference between the bare licensee and the invitee or licensee with an interest is that as to existing traps the owner incurs liability to the latter and not to the former." In Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Procter (39 The Times L.R., 275 ; [1923] A.C., 253, at p. 274), Lord Sumner uses the words which have been read by my Lord and which I need not repeat.

Taking these passages as guides, one has to consider whether there is any evidence that the defendants in this case omitted to act with reasonable diligence to prevent their premises from misleading or entrapping the plaintiff. It is true that the word "entrapping" is not unambiguous, and that there are dicta which appear to extend the obligation of the owner beyond what I should consider the ordinary meaning of an obligation to avoid entrapping. For instance, I find that Lord Halsbury in Lowery v. Walker (27 The Times L.R., 83; [1911] A.C., 10, at p. 14), says: "If he has acquiesced in their doing so" (i.e., crossing his ground), "he is bound to take the ordinary precautions to prevent persons going into a dangerous place where he knows they are going, and going by his acquiescence without notice or warning or any form of security to prevent the injury happening which did happen." I think this statement must be read in relation to the actual decision, which was that the owner of a field could not with impunity place in the field an animal which he knew to be dangerous or likely to injure those whom he permitted to use the field; in other words, could not create a special danger directed to his licensees or set a trap for them. In ordinary circumstances I cannot reconcile the statement with the undoubted law that a licensee must take dangerous premises as he finds them.

Preferring, therefore, the statements of the law which I have above set out, and asking myself the question just propounded, I have come to the conclusion that there is no evidence of an omission by the defendants to act with reasonable diligence not to mislead or entrap the plaintiff. It is clear from the evidence that the ground in question presented the ordinary appearance of a building estate under construction, including the uncompleted road to serve the houses. On the north side the margin of the road between the actual roadway and the curtilage of the houses was impassable by reason of building materials, heaps of earth, and longitudinal trenches; on the south side the margin could be used for walking, as it was by the plaintiff and his friend, in passing to the golf links. But there were obstructions in it, and a hole possibly made for a lamp-post, which they had to avoid by walking on the kerb. The actual roadway was not completed; it had not had its final surface put on, though the actual surface was smooth towards the edges, but rougher in the centre. It was kerbed for part of its length, and it had a large trench right across it 2 feet wide and 18 inches deep. The houses at the far end were still being built. I cannot find any evidence that the defendants by their conduct led the plaintiff to believe that it was anything other than what it was, an uncompleted road, part of an uncompleted building scheme. The trench across was in daylight an obvious danger, and cogent proof of incompletion. It is true that the plaintiff did not notice it as he passed up in daylight, and may well have omitted to notice it without negligence. But it was there to be seen, an obvious advertisement of the road's condition, and the defendants can hardly be blamed because the plaintiff, even without negligence, omitted to see what was plain to be seen. If the defendants could not be held to blame if the plaintiff had fallen into the pit when he passed up the road in daylight, as I think is the case, I do not see how they can be blamed because he fell into the pit on returning in the dusk. They held out no more extensive invitation, and made no further representation in dusk than in light. The premises were on the evidence obviously premises where building and construction were in the process of being carried on, and it was over such premises in such condition that the plaintiff was permitted passage. What were the defendants to do? Were they to light the whole of the road or to fence or light the trench across the road? If so, why not the trenches alongside the road, or the hole which the plaintiff found on the south side? I think that there was no evidence upon which the jury could have found that the defendants by their conduct led the plaintiff to believe that he would be travelling over an unobstructed roadway, still less that it was part of a highway. In these circumstances the defendants have been guilty of no wrong, and the verdict and judgment must be set aside and judgment entered for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE EVE.—On the evening of Sunday, September 26, 1926, the plaintiff fell into an excavation upon land belonging to and occupied by the defendants at Levenshulme, in the county of Lancaster, and sustained a compound fracture of his left leg. He alleged that the accident was due to negligence or breach of duty on the part of the defendants, and by this action claims to recover damages from them. The defendants admit the plaintiff's injuries, but they deny that they were guilty of any negligence or breach of duty.

The material facts are that on the evening in question the plaintiff, accompanied by a young lady, started for a stroll in the direction of the golf links situate in the vicinity of the defendants' land, and having proceeded along a highway known as Errwood-road to a point where there was a road—theretofore unknown to the plaintiff, but which appeared to him to lead towards the golf links—turned off the highway on to this road and proceeded along it in the direction of the golf links. Walking a short distance along the southern and right-hand side of this road, the pair passed on to the links through a gap in the fence dividing the road from the links, and after a short interval of time returned through the same gap on to the road, and in the increasing darkness hurried back along the middle of the road in the direction of Errwood-road on their way home. About midway between the spot where they passed from the links on to the road and Errwood-road a trench had been dug across the whole breadth of the road—some 24 feet long and 2 feet deep—and the injury to the plaintiff was caused by his falling into this trench.

The road was, and is, the property of the defendants, and the trench had been dug for lighting purposes connected with the development of their adjoining land as a residential estate. The road is not a highway, it ends in a cul-de-sac, and is described in the evidence of the surveyor called by the plaintiff as "a road in process of construction on an estate in process of construction—an uncompleted road—something going to be a road when the top surface is on—obviously not an adopted road, obviously not a highway, an unadopted road, by which I mean the road surface and footpaths were not completed." Building operations were in progress along the north side, and the footpath on that side was more or less impassable in consequence of such operations. The footpath on the southern side was not so encumbered, part of it had been levelled, part was rough, and as the plaintiff and his companion passed along on their outward journey on that side they came upon an excavation in the footpath, to avoid which they had to step aside on to the kerbstones and so pass it in safety. The kerbstones were laid on both sides for some distance up the road.

The allegations of negligence on the part of the defendants on which the plaintiff bases his claim are, neglect to place a barrier across or to fence off the entrance to the road, to light or affix lamps or danger signals to such entrance, or to have a watchman in attendance to prevent the public from passing along the road. By reason of these omissions and by letting to tenants some of the houses already built on the estate, he maintains that the defendants invited the public to use and pass along the road when the same was in fact dangerous and constituted a trap by reason of the transverse excavation. There had been no actual letting of any of the houses at that time, and, in my opinion, there was no evidence to support the allegation that the public were invited to make use of the road. It is true they were not warned to keep off it, nor was there any physical barrier to keep them from entering upon it, but its appearance and condition and the work in progress along the northern frontage must have brought home to the mind of any person of ordinary intelligence and possessing reasonable powers of observation its true characteristics as a road in course of construction and serviceable in the main for the purposes of the estate development. That the public did in fact use it and without any protest on the part of the defendants was proved, more particularly on Saturdays and Sundays, when, for the purposes of recreation, they passed by this route to and from the open country lying beyond the houses in course of building, but in so doing they were no more than licensees of the defendants, and it is upon the basis of this relationship that the liability of the defendants as owners and occupiers of the road to the plaintiff has to be ascertained. The extent of that liability is, I think, determined by the extracts which have been read from the judgments in Latham v. Richard Johnson and Nephew, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 124 ; [1913] 1 K.B., 398) and Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (39 The Times L.R., 54 ; [1923] A.C., 74). The grant of the licence creates no right ; it merely affords an answer to a charge of trespass ; it is a mere permission, and those who take it must take it with all chances of meeting with accidents ; but the licensor, although not bound to make the premises safe for the use of the licensee, is bound to warn him of any concealed danger which he knows to be existing on the premises at the date of the licence, or subsequently created. A concealed danger is one which is not known to the licensee or not obvious to the licensee using reasonable care. I think the law on this point is accurately summed up in the passage I am about to read from the 6th Edition of Sir John Salmond's book on Torts. At page 439 he says : "Even if the licensee does not actually know of the danger, he has no cause of action if the danger was so visible, obvious, or usual on that class of premises that a licensee using due care for his own safety would have discovered it for himself before coming to any harm. Against such dangers the occupier is not bound to warn his licensee. The licensee can recover only if he can prove that the occupier led him into a trap by permitting him to enter on premises which, using due care on his own part, he reasonably supposed to be safe." Can it properly be said that the existence of this trench was a concealed danger to anyone using reasonable care and in the nature of a trap ? The plaintiff, possibly with a mind otherwise preoccupied, says that he did not notice it when they passed up the road, nor did he notice that the road was in process of construction, or see any building material about. His companion noticed earth in the middle of the road. Accepting these statements as true, it is still impossible to regard this danger as a concealed one, or otherwise than as an obvious one to anyone passing along the road or using reasonable care.

There was, in my opinion, no failure on the part of the defendants in any duty owing by them to the plaintiff, who voluntarily elected to take the risk of returning in the growing darkness along a road the character and condition of which he had had full opportunity of observing some hour or more before in the daylight, and in which, be it remembered, he certainly knew there lurked the one source of danger which he and his companion had avoided on their way up.

I do not think there was any case to leave to the jury, and the appeal ought, in my opinion, to be allowed.

Mr. LASKI.—Your Lordships allow the appeal, and order judgment to be entered for the defendants, with costs here and below ?

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON.—Yes.

PLOWS v. PLOWS.*

Divorce — Wife's petition—Husband's adultery — Conduct conducing — Wife's refusal of marital intercourse—Grant of decree nisi.

In this defended suit, which had been adjourned from York Assizes, Mrs. Madeline May Plows, née Sawdon, of Muston-road, Filey, Yorkshire, sought the dissolution of her marriage with Mr. Harold William Plows, a clerk, of Harehills, Leeds, on the ground of his adultery with Doris May Hargrave. By his answer the respondent admitted the charge of adultery, but said that his wife had deserted him and had been guilty of conduct conducing to his adultery by refusing to consummate the marriage. By her reply the petitioner joined issue with the respondent on the cross-charges, and said that she left him owing to his violent conduct to her on one occasion.

Mr. John Neal appeared for the petitioner. The respondent appeared in person.

LORD MERRIVALE, in giving judgment, said that it was a very unhappy case. The parties were married at Linthorpe parish church, Middlesbrough, on October 1, 1925, the husband then being 25 years of age and the wife 22. Having no means of their own for a livelihood or for providing a home—and the husband being under a very serious disability, which he (his Lordship) hoped that he had got over, as he said that he had—after a secret marriage they went to live at the home of the husband's parents. The wife decided that their troubles should not be increased by the birth of children until they could support them, and refused sexual intercourse with her husband. Then there arose a deplorable state of things which came to an end six months after the marriage when, on Good Friday of 1926, the wife resolved to go back to her home. Her husband resisted this intention and in his resistance inflicted bruises upon her. He wrote her letters imploring her to return, and on both sides letters were written showing that it had been a marriage of affection. Presently the husband insisted on a resumption of cohabitation, or demanded that he should know something about his future position. His wife said that she would not live with him. He wrote suggesting that she should divorce him if he gave her the necessary evidence. The wife was advised of the peril of collusive proceedings and made no reply to the suggestion.

Eighteen months after the separation he became on affectionate terms with another young woman and ceased to have affection for his wife. On being told that the girl with whom he had associated was pregnant, he married her bigamously. He was brought to trial and bound over. He now said that his wife conduced to his adultery. That was in a sense true. He complained that there was no possibility of performing marital obligations at that time, and that their health broke down under the strain. Did his wife's refusal conduce to his adultery and bigamous marriage with another woman, and ought he (his Lordship) on that account to refuse her a decree? The husband, whatever his faults might have been—and he said that he made good after his early error which put his wife's parents against him—was passionately fond of his wife at that time. She stedfastly refused his demands that they should live together as man and wife. Therefore he (his Lordship) held that there had been conduct conducing by the wife.

But the mutual affection was dead. The husband said that he would like to get a decree of nullity, but there was no indication of sufficient grounds for supporting such a petition. Yet there were such circumstances in the case, and each of the parties was put in such an intolerable position, that he (his Lordship) did not take the view that the conduct conducing was of such an inexcusable degree that it should be visited with the penalty of refusing the decree.

His LORDSHIP granted a decree nisi, but made no order as to costs.

HAROLD DRABBLE, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER v. HYCOLITE MANUFACTURING COMPANY AND OTHERS.*

Copyright — Advertisement — Preparation by advertising agent—Intention of parties—Ownership of copyright.

Where an advertisement agent prepares an advertisement on instructions and information given to him by the advertiser, the Court will, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, draw the inference that it was the intention of both parties that the copyright in the advertisement should belong to the advertiser.

This was an action by Harold Drabble, Limited, advertising agents, of Norfolk-street, Strand, and Mr. Harold Drabble, their managing director, against Mr. George Edward Heyl (trading as the Hycolite Manufacturing Company) and the Morning Post, Limited, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from infringing the plaintiffs' copyright in an advertisement (prepared by the plaintiffs to advertise the goods of the Hycolite Manufacturing Company) by inserting such advertisement in the Morning Post without the plaintiffs' consent.

* Reported by E. K. CORRIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action raised the question whether the copyright in an advertisement belonged to the agent who prepared it, or to the person on whose behalf it was prepared.

The Hycolite Manufacturing Company instructed the plaintiff company, as advertising agents, to prepare an advertisement of their invention, Hycolite Liquid Wallpaper, and supplied information for the advertisement. The advertisement was prepared by the plaintiff, Mr. Harold Drabble, from information he procured, and the plaintiff company was paid for the materials used. In such a case the agent was paid a commission by the newspaper in which the advertisement appeared. The Hycolite Company subsequently, without the consent of the plaintiffs, caused the advertisement to be inserted in the Morning Post of April 30, 1927.

Mr. Gavin Simonds, K.C., and Mr. Macgillivray appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Gover, K.C., and Mr. Swords for the defendants, the Hycolite Manufacturing Company; and Mr. Vaisey, K.C., Mr. Skone James, and Mr. J. Leonard Stone for the Morning Post, Limited.

Mr. GAVIN SIMONDS said that though the question of a single advertisement might not be an important matter there was an important principle involved, affecting the rights of advertising agents. If the copyright of the advertisement was not in the agent who prepared it, the advertiser for whom it was prepared might, after the agent had received a commission for one insertion, go to other agents, who would obtain commission for other insertions by means of the original agent's work. The agent's remuneration was by commission from the newspaper. He submitted that the advertisement was a literary work within the Copyright Acts and that the plaintiff, Mr. Harold Drabble, was the author.

Mr. Drabble, in evidence, said that he had carried on the business of an advertising agent since 1915 and had formed the plaintiff company to carry on such business. He prepared the advertisement in question. The Hycolite Company instructed him to prepare it, and he obtained the matter for doing so. He prepared it as the result of his previous experience of many years. The only material that he had was an advertisement which had appeared in 1926 in the Daily Mail and a picture of the tin in which the stuff was supplied. From this he worked up the advertisement now in question. The advertisement appeared in the Morning Post of January 26, 1927. On his own account he prepared a revised version of the advertisement which appeared in the Morning Post of February 12, 1927.

The witness, cross-examined by Mr. GOVER, said that he did not remember a case in which a claim had been made similar to that made in this case. There were editorial notes about "Liquid Wallpaper" in the Morning Post of January 22 and January 29, 1927. The Hycolite Company sent him a booklet descriptive of the material, with testimonials, on January 20. It was forwarded to the Morning Post by his secretary without his seeing it.

He had written to the Hycolite Company on June 21, 1926, offering to improve their advertisement (which had appeared in the Daily Mail) in the hope of getting a new client. The advertisement which he prepared on July 5, 1926, was his original composition. Most of the details were in the advertisement in the Daily Mail. He composed the advertisement which appeared in the Morning Post on January 22, 1927. He did not know that an advertisement of Hycolite Liquid Wallpaper had appeared in the Daily Mail of November 18, 1926, and he had never seen it. He did not take the details of his advertisement from the booklet.

He did not claim any copyright in the block of the picture in the advertisement, nor did his company. He instructed Mr. Thompson, the artist, to prepare the block, but did not indicate to him the kind of pot and brush which were shown, nor did he send him any materials for his design. He paid Mr. Thompson for the design. Before preparing the further edition of the advertisement which appeared on February 12, 1927, he asked the Hycolite Company for further materials, but he received none. He took a small portion of the advertisement from an editorial in the Morning Post of February 5, 1927, but did not get the consent of the Morning Post to his doing so. Part of the advertisement was substantially the same as the editorial, though it was not the fact that nearly every word in the advertisement was taken, or colourably imitated, from documents which had already appeared. He could not suggest any damage which he had suffered at the hands of the Hycolite Company by the publication of the advertisement without his consent except the loss of his commission. He did not claim the right to reproduce the advertisement.

Cross-examined by Mr. VAISEY, he said that the "lay-out" of the advertisement was not the work of the compositors of the Morning Post. They carried out his instructions. He had no copy of those instructions. A document was produced to the witness, and he said that he felt certain that it was not the instructions which he gave. He had several telephone conversations in March and April, 1927, with Mr. Woodward, the assistant advertisement manager of the Morning Post. He told Mr. Woodward that he had received no payment from the Hycolite Company and had finished with them. He did not say that he had no further interest in the advertisement. Mr. Woodward mentioned a cheque which he had received from Mr. Heyl, but did not say that it was for a re-insertion of the advertisement. Mr. Woodward only asked whether he would be safe in taking a post-dated cheque, and he (the witness) had no idea that Mr. Woodward was referring to the advertisement.

Re-examined, the witness said that he never knew of a case where an advertising agent's claims had been disputed. The letterpress of what was called the second edition was compiled before he gave instructions to Mr. Thompson for the drawing. He wrote to him on January 18, 1927. A pot and a brush provided an obvious suggestion for the picture of a liquid material and were commonly used in advertisements. The value of an advertisement depended on the draping of the facts, and he had given his skill and labour to achieving that.

In reply to MR. JUSTICE ASTBURY, he said that he had seen the editorials in the Morning Post and knew that the information in them must have come from the Hycolite Company. The proof of the advertisement of January 22, 1927, was sent to the Hycolite Company beforehand and was not altered by them.

Mr. P. R. Thompson said that he received a letter from Mr. Drabble on January 18, 1927, asking him to prepare a drawing for the advertisement, and this he did. He had no particular instructions as to form. The paint tin and brush in the drawing were imaginative, and so was the oval surrounding of the name. He had already made a rough drawing in 1926, but heard nothing more till January, 1927. The drawing that he then made was a finished copy in ink of the original. He was paid a guinea, and 3s. 6d. for the rough draft.

Mr. GOVER submitted that the plaintiffs had no copyright in the advertisement; that they had no right to reproduce it; that they had not suffered, and in no circumstances could suffer, any damage; and that the Court could infer from the circumstances that there was an unconditional consent to the free use of the advertisement by the Hycolite Company. To obtain copyright, it must be shown that the plaintiff was the author of an original literary work. The authorities had gone so far that he would not submit that this was not a literary work, but it was not original. Substantially every bit of it had been taken from the other advertisements of which the defendant company had the copyright, or from the editorials, of which the Morning Post had the copyright. One could not have copyright in the infringement of another man's copyright. It was clear from the evidence of Mr. Drabble that this work did not originate with him, but was substantially copied from other works.

The evidence of Mr. Henry Percy Woodward, who was, till December, 1927, assistant advertisement manager of the Morning Post, was interposed. He could not say whether Mr. Drabble or the Hycolite Company first gave him instructions for the insertion of the advertisement, but he believed that it was Mr. Drabble. The subsequent insertions in February and March, 1927, were ordered by Mr. Drabble. After March 12 he canvassed Mr. Drabble in the ordinary way, and was told that he was no longer placing advertisements for the Hycolite Company. The witness then applied to the company, who ordered the insertion of April 30. He spoke to Mr. Drabble, who did not say that he objected to the insertion of the advertisement.

Cross-examined by Mr. SIMONDS, he said that his communication with Mr. Drabble was a matter of courtesy. He did not think of asking specially for his consent.

Re-examined, he said that he told Mr. Drabble that Mr. Heyl proposed to insert his advertisement, but he did not discuss whether it was the same advertisement.

Mr. GOVER, continuing his speech for the defendants, the Hycolite Company, reserved, in case the action went further, the position under section 5 of the Copyright Act, 1911. He said that the plaintiffs had no right to reproduce the advertisement containing the company's materials even if they had technically, by their arrangement of the materials, a copyright under the Act. No damage had been suffered or could be suffered by the plaintiffs, except the loss of their commission. It would be a case of injuria sine damno. He cited Birn Brothers, Limited v. Keene and Co., Limited ([1918] 2 Ch., 281) as to the measure of possible damages, and Borthwick v. Evening Post (4 The Times L.R., 234; 37 Ch.D., 449, at p. 463). Even if the plaintiffs had some copyright there was, in the circumstances, a consent by them to the reproduction.

Mr. SKONE JAMES, for the Morning Post, Limited, cited, as regards the question of originality, Macmillan and Co., Limited v. Cooper (40 The Times L.R., 186). He contended that there was an implied term in an arrangement between an advertiser and an agent that, even though there was copyright in the advertisement in the agent, the advertiser had a perpetual licence to use it.

Mr. MACGILLIVRAY, for the plaintiffs, replied. The advertisements of February 12 and March 12, which were the same as the advertisement of April 30, which was complained of, contained a good deal of matter which was in the advertisement of January 22. That last advertisement was composed before any of the editorials were published. It was, therefore, original literary work, and there must be copyright in it. There could be consent to reproduction, but that could not be by way of a perpetual licence. Counsel would have copyright in his opinion, and the client would have no right to publish it. The question of professional confidence would arise, as it would in the case of a draft drawn by a solicitor.

The Copyright Act, 1911, applied to equitable as well as to legal assignments and rights. (See Performing Right Society, Limited v. London Theatre of Varieties, Limited, 40 The Times L.R., 52 ; [1924] A.C., 1.) Eaton v. Lake (4 The Times L.R., 230 ; 20 Q.B.D., 378) was a strong case in the plaintiffs' favour.

Parties could not contract out of the Copyright Act, 1911, except by a written assignment. There was here clearly no express consent by Mr. Drabble, nor was there any implied consent. He did not consent to the insertion of the advertisement on March 12, 1927, except through himself. An irrevocable consent would be a grant of an interest in the copyright, and under section 5 (2) must be in writing to be valid. He cited L. French and Co., Limited v. Leeston Shipping Company, Limited (38 The Times L.R., 459 ; [1922] 1 A.C., 451) and Lord Buckmaster's speech on the question of implication. There was no reason to imply any terms here. There was here copyright in Mr. Heyl in the Daily Mail advertisement and in other work of his own, and in Mr. Drabble in the part composed by him, and neither could use the joint production without the consent of the other. There might be copyright in a document which the author could not reproduce or publish on account either of confidential relations or of libel. Byrne v. Statist Company (30 The Times L.R., 254 ; [1914] 1 K.B., 622) was very similar to the present case as to the interest of the author where the advertiser had given permission for the reproduction.

Mr. Justice Astbury, after stating the facts, said that the action was of a novel character. Mr. Drabble obtained the agreement of the Hycolite Company to his improving the advertisement of the company, which paid him for his material, and he was to obtain a commission from the newspaper that inserted the advertisement. Mr. Drabble's business appeared to include writing to firms asking their consent to the improvement by him of their advertisements, as he did in this case. The Hycolite Company agreed to his submitting a copy, which he did on July 5, 1926, describing it as "slightly revised copy" of the company's advertisement which had appeared in the Daily Mail. Mr. Drabble had claimed copyright in this as an original literary work. It was, in fact, only a colourable imitation of the Daily Mail advertisement, using most of the phrases verbatim or rearranging them. He (his Lordship) was of opinion that this was in no way an original literary work, even if it was a literary work at all. The matter then remained in abeyance until January, 1927, as the Hycolite Company had arranged for their advertisements for some time ahead. On January 4 Mr. Drabble sent a circular to the Hycolite Company, and later submitted to them what he called a reader's copy of his suggested advertisement, and also suggested the "Women's Corner" in the Morning Post as an advertising medium. That reader's copy had been lost.

His Lordship then read the correspondence, in which it was suggested that there should be an editorial in the "Women's Corner," for which purpose the Hycolite Company were said to have sent Mr. Drabble a booklet to provide information. His Lordship said that the circumstances of what was called the second edition of the advertisement, which appeared in the Morning Post of January 22, 1927, gave him great difficulty. Mr. Drabble was a most unsatisfactory witness. He swore that this advertisement was prepared by him without any further information being supplied to him by the company, and that he never saw the booklet. The advertisement contained matter which no honest or truthful person could have inserted in it if he had had no information except the original advertisement in the Daily Mail. His Lordship must not assume that Mr. Drabble had seen the booklet which he swore he had not seen, but he was not prepared to accept as proved statements made on oath by Mr. Drabble without corroboration. He might be right, and there was no evidence to the contrary.

On the question of originality, the onus of convincing his Lordship was on the plaintiffs, and they had not convinced him. The third edition of the advertisement, which was the same as the one complained of in this action, appeared in the Morning Post of February 12. His Lordship then dealt with the phrases in this advertisement, and said that, before it appeared, editorials had appeared in the Morning Post of January 29 and February 5, which Mr. Drabble admitted were taken from the booklet. A quarrel ensued later between Mr. Drabble and the Hycolite Company, and, eventually, on April 30, the advertisement was inserted in the Morning Post by the company without Mr. Drabble being concerned. The Morning Post, Limited, in its defence, pleaded that Mr. Drabble consented to this insertion, but, so far as any ad hoc consent was concerned, that defence had not been made out.

The issues were (1) whether the advertisement was an "original literary work" within the Copyright Act, 1911 ; and (2) whether a consent by the plaintiffs to its insertion must not be implied. On the first point his Lordship held that the advertisement was not an original literary work. On the second point, if there were any copyright in the advertisement, many matters required consideration. It seemed at first sight amazing that an agent could claim copyright in a work which had been prepared by him on instructions and information given to him by the advertiser. He thought that here it was necessary to infer that it was intended by both parties that the plaintiffs should only act as the agents of the Hycolite Company to put the advertisement in the newspaper and that the advertisement should remain the property of the company. As far as he could judge from the correspondence he doubted whether Mr. Drabble ever thought of claiming any rights until some time after the quarrel. Even if he were held to have produced an original work, he could only claim copyright in such part of it as was his own work and could not claim copyright in the work of the advertiser. In his Lordship's opinion there must be inferred a plain consent that the advertisement should remain the property of the company to insert whenever they chose. Mr. Macgillivray, in his very able argument, referred to section 5 (1) (b) of the Copyright Act, 1911, and said that the subsection had been construed judicially as referring only to a distinct contract of service, and his Lordship could not hold that in this case there was any contract of service. It appeared that this was the first time that any advertising agent had claimed the right by his copyright in an advertisement to restrain his employer from using it as he pleased. The defendants wished to give evidence that no such claim had been made, but such evidence was objected to and he had allowed the objection. But, in fact, the objection was as valuable to the defendants as the evidence would have been. Counsel had argued that an agreement between employer and agent as to the copyright would be an equitable assignment. He had been referred to observations of Lord Sumner in Performing Right Society, Limited v. London Theatre of Varieties, Limited (40 The Times L.R., 52 ; [1924] A.C., 1) as to such equitable assignment having to be in writing under section 5 (2), but those observations dealt with a different question. He was also referred to Eaton v. Lake (4 The Times L.R., 230 ; 20 Q.B.D., 378), but that dealt with an entirely different case under a different statute. He did not think that there was anything in the Copyright Act, 1911, to prevent parties from contracting out of the Act between themselves. He did not believe that any Court would grant an injunction in cases where it would involve breach of faith and breach of contract. One answer would be that there was a consent under section 2, which need not be in writing.

In his Lordship's opinion the plaintiffs prepared the advertisement on the instructions of their client upon the footing that they should derive benefit from it as long as their client continued to advertise through them. In his opinion there was here no original literary work within the Copyright Act, 1911, but even if there was such a work the plaintiffs had by contract rendered it impossible for the Court to grant any injunction to restrain the defendants from publishing the advertisement.

The action against both defendants must be dismissed with costs.

ROYAL BANK OF CANADA (ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR QUEBEC INTERVENANT) v. LARUE AND OTHERS.*

Canada — Bankruptcy Acts — Collocation of judicial hypothecs.

Under the Canadian Bankruptcy Acts a judicial hypothec upon real estate of a debtor resulting from the registration of a notice under Article 2121 of the Civil Code of Quebec is intended to be postponed to a subsequent authorized assignment for the benefit of his creditors. The Bankruptcy Act, 1919, to that effect is within the legislative authority of the Dominion Parliament under the British North America Act, 1867.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada (Mr. Justice Rinfret dissenting) which reversed decisions of the Court of King's Bench of Quebec and the Trial Judge (Chief Justice Lemieux).

Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. Lanctot, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and Mr. Maurice Alexander (K.C., Canada) appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Macmillan, K.C. (of the Scottish Bar), and Mr. Theobald Mathew for the Attorney-General for Quebec ; Mr. St. Laurent, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and Mr. Horace Douglas for the respondents.

The Lord Chancellor, delivering their Lordships' judgment, said :—

The facts leading up to this litigation are undisputed, and may be very shortly stated. On March 25, 1922, the claimant, the Royal Bank of Canada (which will be referred to as "the Bank"), obtained judgment against one Bélanger for $14,036.44 with interest and costs. On April 6, 1922, the Bank caused this judgment to be registered in the Registration Division of Quebec, and at the same time caused to be registered (in accordance with Article 2121 of the Civil Code of Quebec) a notice describing certain real estate of the debtor situate in that Division, so establishing a judicial hypothec upon that property resulting from the judgment. On April 11, 1922, the Bank registered a second notice describing other real estate of the debtor situate in the same Division, to be also affected by the judgment and the judicial hypothec thereby created. On December 24, 1923—no further steps having in the meantime been taken for enforcing the judgment and hypothec—Bélanger made an authorized assignment for the benefit of his creditors under the Bankruptcy Act of the Dominion (chapter 36 of 1919), and the respondents, Larue, Trudel, and Picher, were shortly afterwards appointed trustees under the assignment. The assignment and appointment were duly registered. The Bank filed a claim with the trustees, asserting a privilege in the nature of a judicial hypothec upon the real estate of the debtor described in the notices of April 6 and 11, 1922 ; but the trustees, on the authority of section 11 (10) of the Bankruptcy Act, rejected the claim of privilege except as regards the costs of the judgment. The Bank appealed against this rejection to the Superior Court of Quebec, which allowed the appeal and declared the Bank entitled to the preference which it claimed ; and this decision was affirmed by the Court of King's Bench of Quebec. But, on a further appeal by the trustees to the Supreme Court of Canada, that Court by a majority (consisting of Chief Justice Anglin and Mr. Justice Duff, Mr. Justice Mignault, and Mr. Justice Newcombe, Mr. Justice Rinfret dissenting) reversed the decision of the Court of King's Bench and confirmed the disallowance by the trustees of the Bank's claim for privilege. The Bank now appeals to His Majesty in Council.

The questions at issue between the parties are two in number, namely (1) whether on the true construction of the Bankruptcy Acts of the Dominion a judicial hypothec upon real estate of a debtor resulting from the registration of a notice under Article 2121 of the Civil Code of Quebec is intended to be postponed to a subsequent authorized assignment by the debtor for the benefit of his creditors ; and (2) if on the true construction of the Bankruptcy Acts such a hypothec is intended to be so postponed, whether the Acts are in that respect within the legislative authority of the Dominion Parliament under the British North America Act of 1867. It is only if both these questions are answered in the affirmative that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada can stand ; and it is convenient to deal with them in the above order.

1. The relevant provisions of section 11 of the Dominion Bankruptcy Act of 1919 as originally enacted were as follows :—

11. (1) "Every receiving order and every authorized assignment made in pursuance of this Act shall take precedence over :

* Reported by Sir W. J. Soulsby, Barrister-at-Law.

"(a) all attachments of debts by way of garnishment unless the debt involved has been actually paid over to the garnishing creditor or his agent ; and

"(b) all other attachments, executions, or other process against property, except such thereof as have been completely executed by payment to the execution or other creditor ; but shall be subject to a lien for one only bill of costs, including sheriff's fees, which shall be payable to the garnishing attaching or execution creditor who has first attached by way of garnishment or lodged with the sheriff an attachment, execution or other process against property ; Provided that this paragraph shall not apply to any execution or other process issued against real or immovable property under or by virtue of a judgment registered prior to the coming into operation of this Act, which judgment, as the result of such registration, became, under the laws of the Province wherein it was entered, a charge, lien or hypothec upon or of such real or immovable property."

. . . .

(8) "Every receiving order and every authorized assignment (or a true copy certified as to such order by the registrar or other clerical officer of the court which has made it, and as to such assignment certified by the trustee therein named) shall be registered or filed by or on behalf of the trustee in the proper office in every district, county or territory in which the whole or any part of any real or immovable property which the bankrupt or assignor owns or in which he has any interest or estate is situate."

. . . .

(10) "From and after such registration or filing or tender thereof within the proper office to the registrar or other proper officer, such order or assignment shall have precedence of all certificates of judgment, judgments operating as hypothecs, executions and attachments against land (except such thereof as have been completely executed by payment) within such office, or within the district, county or territory which is served by such office, but subject to a lien for the costs of registration and sheriff's fees of such judgment, execution or attaching creditors as have registered or filed within such proper office their judgments, executions or attachments."

The coming into force of the above Act had been postponed to July 1, 1920, and before it came into force it was amended by chapter 34 of the statutes of that year. By section 6 of the last-mentioned statute the proviso to paragraph (b) of section 11 (1), which excepted from the application of that paragraph judgments registered before the coming into operation of the Act, was repealed, and all judgments whether registered before or after July 1, 1920, were left to be governed by the general rule. Further, by section 7 of the same Act of 1920 it was enacted as follows :—

"7. Section 11 of the said Act is hereby amended by adding thereto the following sub-section :—

"'(16) The provisions of paragraphs one and ten of this section shall not apply to any judgment or certificate of judgment registered against real or immovable property in either of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick prior to the coming into force of this Act, which became, under the laws of the Province wherein it was registered, a charge, lien or hypothec upon such real or immovable property.'"

In 1925 this sub-section (16) was amended so as to include judgments registered against real estate in the Province of Quebec before the coming into force of the Bankruptcy Act, and this was done by 15-16 George V., chapter 31, section 5, which reads as follows :—

"5. Sub-section (16) of section 11 of the said Act, as that sub-section is enacted by section 7 of the chapter 34 of the Statutes of 1920, is hereby repealed and the following is substituted therefor :—

"'(16) The provisions of sub-sections (1) and (10) of this section shall not apply to any judgment or certificate of judgment registered against real or immovable property in any of the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Quebec, prior to the coming into force of this Act, which became, under the laws of the Province wherein it was registered, a lien or hypothec upon such real or immovable property.'"

Upon a review of these enactments their Lordships are of opinion that they have been correctly interpreted by the Supreme Court as having the effect of postponing a judicial hypothec upon real estate of the debtor to an authorized assignment by the debtor for the benefit of his creditors. Sub-section (1) of section 11 of the Act of 1919 gives to an authorized assignment precedence over all executions against property not completed by payment to the execution creditor ; and sub-section (10) carries the process a step further by giving to such an assignment, when duly registered in any district, precedence over all "certificates of judgment, judgments operating as hypothecs, executions, and attachments against lands (except such thereof as have been completely executed by payment)" within the district. It was stated by the learned Judges of the Quebec Courts that the words "certificates of judgment, judgments operating as hypothecs" were unknown in the jurisprudence of that Province, and their Lordships of course accept that statement as showing that the precise phrase used in the statute is new to Quebec ; but the Quebec Civil Code speaks (in Article 2020) of a judicial hypothec as "resulting from" a judgment and (in Article 2121) of a judgment as "conferring" a hypothec when registered, and the expression "judgments operating as hypothecs" is a not inapt paraphrase of this language. The view taken by Chief Justice Lemieux in the Superior Court that the intention of sub-section (10) was only to transfer to the trustee of the assignment the power of realizing the property affected by the hypothec, leaving to the hypothecary creditor an effective charge on the proceeds of realization, does not appear to their Lordships to give full effect to the enactment in sub-section (10) that the assignment is to have precedence over the judgment operating as a hypothec ; and their Lordships agree with the opinion of Mr. Justice Newcombe (who gave the reasons for the judgment of the majority of the Supreme Court) that the intention of these enactments was that the assignment should have precedence of all judgments operating as hypothecs for all purposes, including the distribution as well as the realization of the assets. The suggestion, put forward by counsel for the appellants on this appeal, that the sub-section was intended to give the assignment precedence over the judgment only and not over the hypothec following upon the judgment, appears to their Lordships to have no substance ; for if a judgment operating as a hypothec is postponed to the assignment, the hypothec which it operates must surely undergo the same process.

This conclusion, which their Lordships would have been disposed to adopt on a reading of the earlier part of section 11 (10) taken by itself, is confirmed by a consideration of the latter part of that subsection, which reserves to a judgment creditor who has duly registered his judgment a lien on the land for his costs of registration and sheriff's fees; for if the intention of the Legislature had been to leave to the hypothecary creditor his full charge on the land subject to the hypothec, it would have been unnecessary to preserve his lien for costs. Further, section 7 (16) of the Act of 1920, which excepted from section 11 (10) of the Act of 1919 any judgment registered against real property in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick before the coming into force of that Act which became under the law of the Province a charge, lien or hypothec against such property, carries a plain implication that such a judgment if registered after the coming into force of the Act of 1919 is intended to be affected by section 11 (10) of the Act. The Act of 1925 above cited was passed after the present dispute arose; but section 5 of that Act, which extends the operation of section 7 of the Act of 1920 to Quebec, shows plainly that the Dominion Legislature in 1925 interpreted the Act of 1919 as applying to that Province in the same sense.

For these reasons, which agree in substance with those given by Mr. Justice Newcombe on behalf of the majority of the Supreme Court, their Lordships are of opinion that the first of the two questions above set out should be answered in the affirmative.

Their Lordships now turn to the second question arising on this appeal—namely, whether the enactment of section 11 (10) of the Bankruptcy Act of 1919, as above construed, was within the powers conferred upon the Dominion Parliament by section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, which entrusts to that Parliament exclusive legislative authority over all matters coming within certain classes of subject there enumerated, including "bankruptcy and insolvency," or whether it infringes upon the exclusive power given by section 92 of the same Act to a provincial Legislature to make laws in respect of "property and civil rights" in the Province.

The expression "bankruptcy and insolvency" in paragraph (21) of section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, was referred to by Lord Selborne in L'Union St. Jaques de Montréal v. Bélisle (L.R. 6 P.C. 31) as "describing in their known legal sense provisions made by law for the administration of the estates of persons who may become bankrupt or insolvent, according to rules and definitions prescribed by law, including of course the conditions in which that law is to be brought into operation, the manner in which it is to be brought into operation, and the effect of its operation." In Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada (10 The Times L.R., 305; [1894] A.C., 189) Lord Herschell observed that a system of bankruptcy legislation might frequently require various ancillary provisions for the purpose of preventing the scheme of the Act from being defeated, and added, at page 200: "It may be necessary for this purpose to deal with the effect of executions and other matters which would otherwise be within the legislative competence of the provincial Legislature. Their Lordships do not doubt that it would be open to the Dominion Parliament to deal with such matters as part of a bankruptcy law, and the provincial Legislature would doubtless be then precluded from interfering with this legislation, inasmuch as such interference would affect the bankruptcy law of the Dominion Parliament." Taking these observations as affording assistance in the construction of paragraph (21) of section 91 of the Act of 1867, their Lordships are of opinion that the exclusive authority thereby given to the Dominion Parliament to deal with all matters arising within the domain of bankruptcy and insolvency enables that Parliament to determine by legislation the relative priorities of creditors under a bankruptcy or an authorized assignment. A creditor who has obtained judgment for his debt and has issued execution upon the debtor's lands or goods remains a creditor; and it is entirely within the authority of the Dominion Parliament to declare that such a creditor, although (as Mr. Justice Newcombe expressed it) he has been "first in the race for execution" but has not yet proceeded upon his execution and become satisfied by payment, shall on the occurrence of bankruptcy or a cessio bonorum be reduced to an equality with the general body of creditors. Then is there anything in the nature of a judicial hypothec in the Province of Quebec which exempts it from the possibility of being affected in like manner by the bankruptcy law of the Dominion? In their Lordships' opinion there is nothing in the Quebec law which can have that effect. It is true that judicial hypothec is classed in the Civil Code with legal and conventional hypothecs and is there said to establish a real right; but notwithstanding these provisions the hypothecary creditor remains a judgment creditor, and his hypothec, whether it may or may not be properly called a mode of execution, is at all events closely analogous to that process. Indeed, their Lordships were informed that Article 614 of the Civil Code of Procedure of Quebec has been held to require such a creditor to cause the movable goods of the debtor to be realized under the judgment before he can enforce his hypothec against the land. There is nothing therefore in the nature of a judicial hypothec which for the purpose now in question distinguishes it from an execution levied upon land, and Lord Herschell's judgment above cited shows clearly that such an execution may lawfully be postponed by a Dominion Act.

The contention that the enactment of section 11 (10) of the Bankruptcy Act infringes the authority of the provincial Legislature to deal with property and civil rights is effectively dealt with by Mr. Justice Newcombe. No doubt it was within the competence of the provincial Legislature to give to a judicial hypothec the quality of a real right; but if and so soon as that enactment comes into conflict with a Dominion statute duly passed under the authority of section 91 of the Act of 1867, then the Dominion statute prevails over the provincial legislation and takes effect according to its tenor. The decisions of this Board relating to what is sometimes called the "unoccupied field" are referred to in the judgment of Mr. Justice Newcombe, and conclusively establish this point.

The thesis that a postponement or annulment of the rights of creditors who under a provincial law have obtained preferential rights is within the domain of bankruptcy legislation receives support by reference to a series of provincial statutes to which Mr. St. Laurent in an able argument called their Lordships' attention. The Assignments and Preferences Act of Ontario (R.S.O. 1914, c. 134) enacted (by section 14) that an assignment for the general benefit of creditors under that Act should take precedence of attachments, garnishee orders, judgments, executions not completely executed by payment, and orders appointing receivers by way of equitable execution, subject to a lien for the execution creditor's costs. Similar provisions were contained in the Assignments Act of Manitoba (R.S.M. 1913, c. 12, section 8), the Assignments Act of Saskatchewan (R.S.S. 1909, c. 142, section 9), the Creditors' Trust Deeds Act of British Columbia (R.S.B.C. 1911, c. 13, section 14), the Act of New Brunswick respecting Assignments and Preferences by Insolvent Persons (R.S.N.B. 1903, c. 141, section 9), and (except as to lands) the Assignments Act of Nova Scotia (R.S.N.S. 1923, c. 200, section 46). In all these cases the provincial Legislatures when dealing with assignments by insolvents included in their legislation provisions postponing an execution to the general right of an assignee for the benefit of creditors; and it would be difficult to reconcile the course so taken by these Legislatures with the contention that such a postponement is not within the domain of bankruptcy law. It may be added that, since the "unoccupied field" where such priorities are regulated has been occupied by the Bankruptcy Acts of the Dominion, most of these provincial enactments have been repealed.

In the result their Lordships find themselves in agreement upon both questions with the reasoning and conclusions of the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada, and they will humbly advise his Majesty that this appeal fails and should be dismissed. The appellants will pay the costs of the respondent trustees.

SOCIÉTÉ ANONYME PÊCHERIES OSTENDAISES v. MERCHANTS MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Practice—Action—Costs—Order for stay of proceedings—Action ultimately settled upon terms that defendants pay plaintiffs' costs—Costs incurred by plaintiffs between stay and settlement—Whether premature—Costs incurred before issue of writ—Whether incurred usefully—Discretion of Taxing Master.

An order in an action for stay of proceedings does not necessarily mean that all activities should be stayed. Therefore, if one of the parties during a stay incurs costs for some useful purpose, as, for instance, the taking of the evidence of seamen before they become dispersed, and afterwards becomes entitled to his costs of the action, the costs incurred during the stay may be allowed.

It is a matter within the discretion of the Taxing Master to say whether costs so incurred were incurred prematurely, or whether the outlay was advisable and useful for the purposes of litigation still liable to take place. In his discretion the Master may even allow costs incurred before issue of the writ in the action, provided that he is satisfied of the advisability of incurring them.

This was an appeal from Mr. Justice MacKinnon.

* Reported by G. T. Whitfield-Hayes, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts were stated by the Master of the Rolls as follows:—

The case is this: On February 25, 1926, there was a loss of a trawler. That trawler was insured by the defendants in this action. The trawler belonged to the plaintiffs, and very soon after the facts as to the loss were ascertained it was notified on May 7, 1926, by a letter written to the plaintiffs, that the underwriters had determined to fight the case on the ground that the loss was not due to a peril insured against. The trawler had foundered, and it is not difficult to see that, among the possible charges which arise from that attitude taken up by the insurers, it might be possible that they were charging the plaintiffs with having scuttled the vessel. Whether that was specifically their intention or not, the plaintiffs were at any rate told that for the purpose of their success in the action it would be necessary for them to be prepared with evidence which should overcome the allegation of the underwriters that the loss was not due to a peril insured against.

Now in June, 1926, in consequence of that notification, the plaintiffs and their advisers sent over to the Continent to take the statements of the crew of the trawler. The members of the crew were said to be under contract to serve in other vessels, and it was quite possible that they would be so engaged and upon the high seas, in different directions, and their evidence would be lost if steps were not taken immediately to secure it. On July 20, 1926, the writ was issued, and on the 21st a letter was written by the defendants as to the usual agreement which was to be obtained, that all the underwriters would be bound by the decision in the action. On July 28 there was a summons for directions, and under that summons for directions an order was made for ship's papers, the usual order for ship's papers. That order is in the usual form, and it stated that there should be a stay until the order for the ship's papers had been complied with. The actual words are these. First of all, there was an order for security for costs in £100, with a stay meantime; and then there was the order for ship's papers; and then it was ordered "that in the meantime all further proceedings be stayed." In October some further statements of witnesses were obtained, and the opinion of the engineer, Mr. Camps, was also obtained. On January 25, 1927, the affidavit of ship's papers was prepared, but it was not communicated to the defendants. In March the documents which had been catalogued in the affidavit of ship's papers were ready, and then, and not until then, communication was made to the other side that the ship's papers were ready for delivery, and on March 5 the ship's papers were filed.

On May 20, 1927, the action was settled on terms under which the plaintiffs recovered, and were to be paid by the defendants their taxed costs. Now upon the taxation questions arose as to the three categories of costs. There were the costs which had been incurred before the action was commenced at all; there were, secondly, the costs which had been incurred after the writ had been issued, and which had been incurred before the time when the order for ship's papers was made; and, thirdly, there were the costs which had been incurred during the time when there was the stay of proceedings laid down or directed in the order for ship's papers. When the costs were brought before the Master, objection was taken to them that there had been a stay of proceedings and an order for security for costs and ship's papers, and the defendants submitted that the items which had been incurred up to the time when that stay was removed were premature ; and the Master answered that in a manner which I will deal with in a moment.

Upon the Master's answer being given, he made an order allowing in form both some costs which had been incurred apparently before action, some costs which had been incurred (such as obtaining evidence of witnesses) before the stay was imposed by the order for ship's papers, and also some costs which were incurred during the time when the stay operated.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon, on December 19, disagreed with the decision of the Master, and ordered that these costs to which I have referred should be disallowed ; and from that decision the appeal is taken to this Court. The result is that the question is raised, first, whether any costs at all could be allowed before action brought ; and, secondly, whether any of the costs could be allowed during the time when the stay operated.

Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. K. S. Carpmael appeared for the appellants ; Mr. R. I. Simey for the respondents.

The Master of the Rolls.—In my judgment, this appeal succeeds. It raises a somewhat novel point, and no doubt, from the large bearing that it may have, an important point.

Now, with regard to costs generally, it must be borne in mind that Order LXV., Rule 27, sub-rule 29, allows a very wide discretion to the Taxing Master, and I do not desire to say anything in any way to circumscribe that discretion. It is to be used by the Taxing Master, and the rule has been drawn in the terms in which it is, in order to give a wide latitude to the Taxing Master's discretion.

It is said that no costs ought to be allowed which have been incurred before action brought. That would be to state the proposition far too widely. It could not be supported in that form. In the case to which our attention has been called, a case which came before Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady, of Bright's Trustee v. Sellar (20 The Times L.R., 210 ; [1904] 1 Ch., 369), the observation is made by Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady ([1904] 1 Ch., at p. 371) : "Can he" —that is, the Master—"allow the costs of a transcript obtained before action ?" And it is answered in this way : "It is a matter of discretion. . . . His discretion is not confined to costs incurred after action," and a reference is made to the sub-rule to which I have already referred. Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady in that case did allow and adopt the Master's view that there should be certain expenses allowed in the bill which had been incurred before the action was brought, and for the reason that the expenses proved useful in the action and had been incurred at a time when it was right and proper that the outlay should be made in order to safeguard the position of the intending litigant.

It appears to me, therefore, that there is a power in the Masters to allow some costs which may have been incurred before action brought ; and, if the expense is an outlay made upon materials ultimately proving of use and service in the action, the Master has a discretion, which he probably would exercise in favour of the party incurring that outlay, to allow these costs, because the materials have been used during the course of and at the trial.

Then I come to the next class of costs—namely, the costs which have been incurred before the stay. As to those, it appears clear that, just as all other costs which have been incurred in the action and during the action subsequently to writ issued are in the discretion of the Master, so such costs to which objection has been taken—namely, in obtaining the evidence—would fall within the discretion of the Master. It is said that it cannot be clear at that moment what would be the issues as defined between the parties at a later stage of the trial, and therefore that the outlay then made was obviously unnecessary and ought not to be allowed. The answer is that, if it was a prudent outlay, then the Master has power to allow it, and it is for him to judge whether an outlay made subsequently to the issue of the writ was such as might reasonably be included in the costs to be taxed between the parties.

Then comes the more important point upon which the appeal has been presented to us. Mr. Justice MacKinnon has held, apparently, that the stay of proceedings included in the order for ship's papers prevents any costs incurred while that stay was operative from being recovered. I take note that the stay is of "All further proceedings." It is not a stay of activity. The steps which prudence dictates are not forbidden. The question whether the steps that are taken are or are not premature is a matter for the Taxing Master. I agree with the answer made by Sir George King in these terms : "I do not understand that this order entirely paralyses the plaintiff so that he cannot do anything by way of preparation for his real proceedings," &c. If this is so the question whether any act by the plaintiff during that period is or is not premature must be like every other question about premature acts, a question of "reasonableness to be decided by me." I think that Sir George King has rightly answered the objection carried in.

In the case of Harrison v. Leutner (16 Ch.D., 559) Sir George Jessel approved of the answers made by the Taxing Masters, who said (16 Ch.D., at pp. 559, 560) : "We have always acted upon the principle that the costs of all work in preparing, briefing, or otherwise relating to affidavits or pleadings, reasonably and properly and not prematurely done, down to the time of any notice which stops the work, is allowable ; and . . . the Taxing Master, having regard to the circumstances of each case, must decide whether the work was reasonable and proper and the time for doing it had arrived." Those words seem to contain a working rule which properly exhibits the discretion which is entrusted to the Masters.

I also would adopt, myself, the words used by Mr. Justice North in considering a matter akin to the question, namely, as to whether or not the activities of the parties' advisers have been paralysed or sterilized, whichever you like to call it. He said this (Whiteley Exerciser, Ltd. v. Gamage [1898] 2 Ch., 405, at p. 411) : "If he had said that he was prevented from preparing them"—that is, the affidavits —"by the order which stayed the plaintiffs' proceedings until security for costs had been given, he might have expected that the Court would laugh at him."

When one comes to consider the purpose of this order for staying proceedings, and the good sense of it, it appears to me to be clear that it was not intended to do more than prevent unnecessary steps from being taken in the action itself, and that it was not intended to prevent such activity as would contribute to the success of the party ultimately, and when a step was necessary, such as the collection of evidence, because the witnesses might be dispersed, it cannot be said that it was within the purview of the order made staying proceedings that no such expense should be undertaken and no such activity engaged in.

For those reasons, it appears to me that the Master's answers to the objections were right, and that Mr. Justice MacKinnon's order setting those answers aside is wrong. The appeal must be allowed, and the answers of the Master to the objections upheld with the taxation.

Lord Justice Atkin.—I agree. This case has been put before us as one of some importance to underwriters, and I agree that it is. The question arises in respect of costs incurred in an action on a marine policy, partly before the action was brought, and partly during the time during which there was a stay of proceedings under an order for ship's papers. The action was begun in July of 1926, and there was an order made in that month for ship's papers, and that order was not in fact complied with until a date in March of 1927, so that there was a long period during which the stay made under the usual order for ship's papers was operative.

Now in the first place it is necessary to consider what are the actual terms of the order. The terms of the order are: "That the plaintiffs and all persons interested do produce and show all papers," and so on, "and that in the meantime all further proceedings be stayed." I think it is important to compare that with a similar and concurrent stay which was imposed in the same order, an order that the plaintiffs (who were foreign plaintiffs) should give security for costs within a month, "otherwise all further proceedings in this action be stayed." As far as the legal operation of those two forms of words is concerned, I find myself quite unable to discern any difference. I think they have precisely the same effect, and therefore, in dealing with the question of costs incurred while a stay of proceedings is current, you have to my mind to consider the matter as though it made no difference whether the stay was granted by reason of security for costs, or an order for ship's papers, or upon any other ground.

The contention, or one of the contentions, made by the defendants, was that the effect of the stay of proceedings was such that the plaintiffs could not recover any costs incurred by them during that period—that they were, as the Taxing Master has put it in his answers to the objections, "paralysed." Now that seems to me to be quite an incorrect view of the effect of the order. All that the order does is to stay proceedings, and "proceedings" obviously do not include the preparations which may be made by the parties by seeing witnesses, taking proofs, indulging in correspondence, and so forth. "Proceedings" are such proceedings as are, for instance, taken into account when you have to deal with the provisions of the staying clause in the Arbitration Act, 1889, for example, a delivery of a pleading, or some step analogous thereto, such as taking out a summons, or appearing on a summons, and so forth; and to my mind it is quite a mistake to suppose that an order to stay directs the parties to hold their hands from the time when the order is made and to pursue no further activities with a view to ascertaining what the facts are and procuring evidence and so forth. Such a view, it is within everybody's experience, would be quite contrary to the ordinary practice. There is no doubt that, while a stay is pending for security for costs or for any other reason, it is the common practice of diligent plaintiffs and diligent defendants to use that time in making some preparation for the trial of the case. They may, of course, go too far—they may make excessive preparation; and, if they make excessive preparation, it may well be that the costs will not be allowed; but it is quite plain that nobody understands the order as being an order directing them to do nothing in the action, and I am quite clear that that is not the legal effect of it.

Now, what then is the position? The position seems to me to be that the Court has ordered, in the case of an action on a marine policy, a stay in order that the defendants may be put in possession of all the written documents that are in the possession of the plaintiffs or parties interested, or which they can reasonably procure under the order; and I have no doubt that one reason for which that order is made is to give the defendants information which otherwise would not be in their possession, to enable them to make up their minds as to what they are going to do in the case—whether they are going to fight it or whether they are going to yield, or whether they are going to admit part of it, and so forth. I think that that object ought always to be borne in mind when the Master is dealing with the question of costs incurred during that period; but inasmuch as, as I have said, it is not true that the parties are stricken with paralysis, and it is not true that no costs can be recovered merely because they have been incurred in that period, it is always a question of fact for the Taxing Master whether the costs were or were not reasonably incurred during that period, always bearing in mind the fact that there is a stay, and also (especially in marine insurance actions) bearing in mind the purpose for which the stay is granted. But subject to that, it seems to me that it is a pure question of fact for the Taxing Master: Was it or was it not reasonable under the circumstances for the plaintiff to have incurred the costs that he did incur, at the time at which he incurred them?

If nothing had been said by the underwriters, and there was no reason to suppose that they would or would not resist the claim, it might very well be that the plaintiffs would find themselves in a difficulty if they incurred elaborate expenditure to prove liability, if in fact the underwriters subsequently admitted liability. But that is not this case, because in this case the defendants' solicitors had written at a very early stage intimating that the defendants intended to resist liability, and expressing their reason in language which certainly might give rise to an apprehension at any rate, and a reasonable apprehension on the part of the plaintiffs' advisers, that the plaintiffs were going to be charged with fraud, because the trawler in this case undoubtedly foundered at sea, and the suggestion was that she was lost, not by a peril insured against. That would certainly, or might, convey to anybody concerned in those matters the suggestion that there was some wilful act alleged other than a peril of the sea.

In those circumstances the Taxing Master might, I think, very well take the view that it was reasonable, at the earliest stage possible, for the plaintiffs to take the evidence of the crew and the master of the trawler for the purpose of establishing what the true cause of the loss was, and also to take the evidence of an experienced surveyor who could survey the vessel before she was repaired with a view of indicating that the loss was in fact a loss from a peril insured against, and was not the result of wilful damage. The ship, I believe, had foundered, and therefore the surveyor would have to report upon the reports of the ship's condition before she had gone to the bottom of the sea.

Now, the Taxing Master has taken all this into account here, and it appears to me to be purely a question of fact for him, and therefore I think in this particular case there is no reason for upholding the objections which have been taken. It is for him to decide whether the costs were prematurely incurred or not ; he has in the circumstances of the case decided that they were not, and it is entirely a matter for him.

The other matter that arises is as to the costs incurred before the action was commenced. Upon that one has nothing to do with the question of a stay of the proceedings, but it is a pure question as to whether or not the costs incurred before the writ was actually issued are costs which the plaintiff can recover under an order for the costs of the action ; and upon that it appears to me to be very important to bear in mind that the Taxing Masters have to apply the words of Order LXV., Rule 27, sub-rule 29. That rule is the guiding rule in the taxation of costs. It was intended to sum up generally the principles upon which costs are awarded, and I cannot help thinking that if that rule were really rigorously applied by everybody—and by "rigorously applied" I mean applied in all cases, and giving full effect to the width of its language—there would be far fewer complaints brought by successful litigants than are brought at the present moment, because it is a rule which is intended to give to the successful litigant a full indemnity for all costs reasonably incurred by him in relation to the action. I think it says so in terms, that it is to allow "all such costs as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice." That is the whole principle on which the Taxing Master has to determine.

Now it is quite obvious that those costs are not limited to costs incurred after the writ has been issued. Costs are allowed every day, as appears by the Taxing Masters' rules, which are not binding, but which govern the practice in a limited form. I am not at all sure that the conventions fixed by the Masters are not too narrow ; but they may be very wise, because those may be the costs which are commonly in dispute and commonly raised, and it is desirable to deal with them ; but the costs certainly extend beyond that. The Taxing Master has discretion in every case to decide whether the costs incurred before the action were necessary or proper for the attainment of justice, and it may very well be that the costs that the Taxing Master approves are included in that term, as in the case which was put in argument, the case of an accident where a bridge breaks down and it is replaced forthwith, and the state of the bridge is the cause of the action, and where it is essential therefore that there should be an inspection by skilled witnesses at once of the state of that bridge. In those circumstances it may very well be that the Taxing Master might hold that such costs incurred before the issue of the writ were necessary for the attainment of justice, because the actual facts to be ascertained from such an inspection could not be ascertained at a later date, and of course the Taxing Master upon that would have to consider the probability of the defendant disputing liability or not disputing liability. That again is purely a question of fact for the Taxing Master, and here he has not misdirected himself. He says that certain costs were properly incurred in taking evidence, and by the professional gentlemen concerned doing what was necessary for the purpose of taking that evidence. I agree that the Taxing Master in this case seems to have been liberal. The costs incurred in this case seem to strike one as being on a liberal scale, but then that is entirely a question for him and not a question on which we can interfere.

There is one other point which was raised by Mr. Simey, and it was this, that no costs can be incurred (that is to say, properly incurred at all, as I understand him, in the action) until the issues have been determined (that is to say, have been defined) ; and he says that these costs were incurred before the defendants had delivered their defence or indicated what their defence would be. All that I can say is that that goes very much too far. That would mean this, that the litigant would never be entitled to recover any costs, save the actual costs of proceedings, until the defendant had delivered his defence, because until then the issues are not defined. That, again, does not seem to be the right view. The question is, in every case, what is the reasonable thing to do, and the Taxing Master is not bound by any such limit of time as is mentioned.

For these reasons it appears to me that the learned Taxing Master in his answer to the objections gave expression to what I cannot help believing is not only the law, but also has been the general practice in these cases. I think he exercised his discretion as to whether or not the costs incurred were premature or not. It seems to me that that is the only question which he had to determine, and in those circumstances I think the objection fails.

The result is that this appeal should be allowed, and the objections should be dismissed, with costs, here and below.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—I agree. The only objection made by the defendants to the taxation by the Taxing Master of the plaintiffs' bill of costs in respect of the relevant items, and therefore the only objection open to them in this Court, was in these terms : "As there was a stay of proceedings for security for costs and ship's papers the defendants submit that these items were premature." Now that objection was, I think, intended to raise a question of principle, at all events it was so treated by the Taxing Master, and the only question of principle that I myself can extract from that objection is that an order for a stay, whether it be pending security for costs or pending delivery of ship's papers, operates not only to stay the proceedings in the action, but also operates to stay what the Master's rule has aptly described as the "activities" of the parties in getting up their case, or looking further after the interests of their clients.

The Taxing Master has evidently had that question argued before him ; his answer shows it, and to my mind it is really the only question of principle that can be raised upon that objection, because of course the order itself would be a factor to take into account as to whether certain costs were premature, just as much as any other fact, but that would not make the question decided by the Taxing Master a question of principle.

Now Mr. Simey was reluctant, when I pressed him on the matter, to say that the order stayed the proceedings in the sense that it stayed the hands of the solicitors for either party pending the operation of the stay. All that he would say was this, that when such an order had been made the Taxing Master was bound to hold that any costs incurred by the parties pending the stay were premature and would have to be disallowed as a matter of principle. Now I think in that he was wrong. There can be no doubt, I think, that an order staying proceedings does not apply to staying the ordinary work of solicitors in getting up the case. As I have stated, they have to be careful in what they do pending such an order, because the Taxing Master would no doubt consider the fact of the order in coming to a conclusion whether the work was premature or not.

That leaves only the question whether in fact these costs were prematurely incurred, and in that I agree with my colleagues that it is a pure question for the Taxing Master, and is not open to review in this or any other Court. It is for him to say whether, in the special circumstances of the particular case, the costs were or were not prematurely incurred; and in considering that question he must, and did no doubt, have in mind the fact that an order to stay proceedings had been made, and no doubt other factors. He having once come to the conclusion, as he has done, that the costs objected to in the present case were not prematurely incurred, in my judgment that is not open to review.

I therefore agree that this appeal succeeds, and ought to be allowed, and that the Taxing Master's answers were perfectly right.

DEWE v. DEWE.
SNOWDON v. SNOWDON.*

Husband and Wife — Maintenance — Order refused by magistrate—Wife's appeal—Separation deed — Covenant for maintenance — Husband's bankruptcy — Wife proves for capitalized value of provision in deed — Fractional dividend—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 and 5 Geo. V., c. 59)—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict., c. 39)—Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 51).

A bankrupt is not relieved of his common law liability to support his wife by the discharge of his liability, on being adjudged bankrupt, under a separation deed to maintain his wife, whether she has proved in the bankruptcy for the capital value of the weekly sums which he covenanted under the deed to pay or whether she has not proved in the bankruptcy. On the extinction of the husband's liability under the deed by the bankruptcy, the wife's common law right is revived.

These were two appeals from justices raising analogous points: (1) Whether a bankrupt is by his discharge relieved of his common law duty to support his wife by reason of her having proved in the bankruptcy for the capitalized value of the husband's covenant in a deed to pay her a weekly sum for life for maintenance; (2) whether an undischarged bankrupt, on adjudication, is relieved of the same obligation under a similar covenant.

Mrs. Beatrix A. Dewe was the first appellant. She appealed from a decision of Mr. Bingley, the magistrate sitting at Marylebone Police Court, on October 10, 1927, dismissing a summons which she had issued against her husband, Mr. Albert Ernest Dewe, a dentist, of Market Harborough, Leicestershire, under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts for maintenance on the ground that he had wilfully neglected to provide her with reasonable maintenance. On December 9, 1919, the parties entered into a deed of separation by which he covenanted to pay her £2 10s. a week for their joint lives and, if he predeceased her, until she should remarry.

The relevant clauses of the deed were as follows:—

1. The said Beatrix Annie Dewe may at all times hereafter live separate and apart from the said Albert Ernest Dewe and from his marital control and authority as if she were sole and unmarried, and may from time to time reside at such place or places and in such manner as she shall think proper without any interference on the part of the said Albert Ernest Dewe.

2. Neither of them, the said Albert Ernest Dewe and Beatrix Annie Dewe, shall directly or indirectly molest or interfere with the other of them or compel or endeavour to compel the other of them to cohabit or live with him or her by any legal proceedings for restitution of conjugal rights or otherwise howsoever.

3. The said Albert Ernest Dewe shall during the lives of himself and the said Beatrix Annie Dewe, or until they shall mutually agree to live together again, pay to the said Beatrix Annie Dewe as her separate estate, but without power of anticipation, by equal weekly payments the weekly sum of two pounds ten shillings, the first of such weekly payments to be made on the day of the date hereof and future payments to become due and be made on Monday in each succeeding week, Provided Always that if the said Beatrix Annie Dewe shall survive the said Albert Ernest Dewe, and the said weekly payment shall not have been forfeited or otherwise determined in his lifetime, then the representative of the said Ernest Albert Dewe shall continue to pay such weekly payment in manner aforesaid until the said Beatrice Annie Dewe shall again marry or die.

5. If the said Beatrice Annie Dewe shall die in the lifetime of the said Albert Ernest Dewe all her separate estate and property, real and personal, of which she shall not have disposed in her lifetime or by will shall, subject to her debts and liabilities, go and belong to the persons or person who would have become entitled thereto if the said Beatrice Annie Dewe had then died intestate and a spinster, and in the same event the said Albert Ernest Dewe shall permit her will (if any) to be proved or administration to her personal estate and effects to be taken out by the persons or person who would have been entitled to do so if she had then died a spinster.

6. The said Beatrice Annie Dewe shall at all times hereafter keep indemnified the said Albert Ernest Dewe against all future debts and liabilities contracted or incurred by the said Beatrice Annie Dewe, and in case the said Albert Ernest Dewe shall at any time or times hereafter be called upon to pay or discharge and shall actually pay or discharge any such future debt or liability contracted or incurred, then and in every case it shall be lawful for the said Albert Ernest Dewe to deduct, retain and reimburse to himself out of the said weekly sum of two pounds ten shillings the amount which he, the said Albert Ernest Dewe, shall have so paid in respect of such debt or liability.

7. In case the said Albert Ernest Dewe and Beatrix Annie Dewe shall at any time hereafter with their mutual consent come together and cohabit with each other, or if their marriage shall be dissolved or if they shall be judicially separated from each other in respect of anything done or suffered by either party after the execution of these presents, then and in either of such cases the said weekly payment of two pounds ten shillings shall cease and be no longer payable and thenceforth all the covenants and provisions herein contained shall become void.

On September 12, 1923, the husband was adjudicated bankrupt. The wife, who had sued him on the deed in the High Court and been granted judgments, lodged a claim for £1,380 as the capitalized value of her claim under the deed. On the basis of the only dividend of 6d. in the £ she received £37 17s. 6d. in settlement, and had received nothing from him since.

The relevant subsections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, are :—

"28.—(2) An order of discharge shall release the bankrupt from all other debts [i.e., other than certain debts of a character not arising in this case] provable in bankruptcy."

"30.—(1) Demands in the nature of unliquidated damages arising otherwise than by reason of a contract, promise, or breach of trust shall not be provable in bankruptcy.

"(2) A person having notice of any act of bankruptcy available against the debtor shall not prove under the order for any debt or liability contracted by the debtor subsequently to the date of his so having notice.

"(3) Save as aforesaid, all debts and liabilities, present or future, certain or contingent, to which the debtor is subject at the date of the receiving order, or to which he may become subject before his discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the date of the receiving order, shall be deemed to be debts provable in bankruptcy."

Before the magistrate it was argued that by reason of the wife's proving in her husband's bankruptcy he had got rid of any liability to maintain her, and the wife had compromised the future payments due to her under the deed.

Mr. Bingley referred to the wife's having proved in bankruptcy and said :—

"I cannot see that in the face of this the wife can now turn round and say 'You have wilfully neglected to maintain me.'

"Obviously things have turned out very badly for her. But supposing there had been no bankruptcy and that this lady had said 'Instead of paying me this £2 10s. a week, I wish you would pay me £1,500 down to start a business,' and then supposing she failed, is it conceivable that, having got the money, she could then turn round and say, 'It is true, I did capitalize my claim on you under the deed, but still all the same you are liable to maintain me for the rest of my life'?

"I cannot believe that that is the law of the land. I am sorry I am against this lady. She has made an extremely bad bargain. She has not to my thinking made out her case, and it must therefore be dismissed."

Mr. N. R. Fox-Andrews, for the appellant, submitted that the magistrate had taken a wrong view. The law did not say that because a man was discharged from bankruptcy he should be regarded as being in the same position as if he had performed his contract. The effect of the bankruptcy law was to absolve him from the performance of his contract, but the law did not say that because he was discharged from bankruptcy he should be regarded as having performed the obligations in respect of which he had been discharged. Counsel referred to Jones v. Newtown and Llanidloes Guardians (36 The Times L.R., 758 ; [1920] 3 K.B., 381), in which Mr. Justice Shearman said :—

"The case presents some little difficulty and is bare of direct authority, but I think it must be decided upon the cardinal principle that by the common law of England a husband is bound to support his wife. . . . To the general principle that the husband is bound to maintain his wife there is one exception, and that is where the wife is guilty of adultery, in which case the husband is discharged from all liability thereafter to maintain her or to recoup the guardians for her maintenance. . . . But that is, so far as I am aware, the only case in which the husband's obligation is permanently determined."

Lord Merrivale.—That was a different obligation, by a citizen to a public authority. Assume the husband to have provided an ample fund for the wife : assume that she squanders it. The question arises if she has compounded with her husband for future maintenance. Distinctions may arise between maintenance presently provided and an agreement for future provision. In this case, even if the wife had not proved in the bankruptcy, the debt under the deed would have been discharged.

Counsel referred to Victor v. Victor (28 The Times L.R., 131 ; [1912] 1 K.B., 247), in which it was held by the Court of Appeal that on a husband being adjudged bankrupt his wife could not maintain an action on his covenant in a separation deed to pay her an annuity, though she had not proved in the bankruptcy. He read the following passage from the judgment of Lord Justice Moulton :—

"The mere fact that a man has become bankrupt does not free him from his obligation to support his wife, and an order for alimony is an act of the Divorce Court enforcing that surviving obligation."

He also referred to McQuiban v. McQuiban (29 The Times L.R., 766 ; [1913] P., 208), in which Sir Samuel Evans, P., held that, no action being maintainable by the wife against her husband, on his discharge from bankruptcy, under his covenant in a separation deed to pay her an annual sum, the deed was no bar to proceedings taken by her subsequently for restitution of conjugal rights.

Lord Merrivale.—What do you say is the present position of this deed ? Is it still subsisting ?

Mr. Fox-Andrews.—No, it has gone. It is a nullity in law, there having been a mutual discharge owing to the bankruptcy.

Continuing, he said that if the contention of the other side were right it would open the door to serious fraud. A husband, well knowing that he was likely to go bankrupt and also that his wife was unaware of it, and being on bad terms with her, might induce her to enter into a deed of this sort, and then engineer his bankruptcy and thereby rid himself of his obligations to his wife for the rest of his life. It would not matter whether she proved or not. It would open the door to very undesirable practices by husbands who wanted to get rid of their wives. He submitted that when the deed came to an end the common law obligation revived, and in this case the failure of the husband to pay maintenance constituted wilful neglect under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. He referred to Diggins v. Diggins (43 The Times L.R., 37 ; [1927] P., 88).

Mr. Honeyman, for the respondent, submitted that under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, the husband's pecuniary obligations were satisfied as if the wife had taken the full amount for which she proved.

Lord Merrivale.—If she came to this Court for restitution of conjugal rights and afterwards for a judicial separation, this Court would not be debarred from ordering the husband to make provision for her.

Mr. HONEYMAN cited the following passage from the judgment of the Master of the Rolls (Sir H. H. Cozens-Hardy) in Victor v. Victor (supra) :—

"It seems to me that the whole policy of the Bankruptcy Act is that the bankrupt is to get complete discharge from contractual obligations to pay sums of money, and the only right of the person under the terms of the contract, whatever the pecuniary claim is, is to come in."

Counsel said that here the husband would not have gone bankrupt if his wife had not secured two judgments against him. He referred to Ex parte Bates (11 Ch.D., 914), in which Lord Justice James said in his judgment :—

"The present case is simply that of an annuity payable by A to B. The provision of the statute (the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, 32 and 33 Vict., c. 71, s. 31) is plain. It says that such future or contingent debts or liabilities of a bankrupt are to be valued in the best way possible, and that, when the value has been ascertained, the sum so assessed is to be provable as a debt in the bankruptcy . . . both parties, the creditor and the trustee, taking the proof for better or for worse."

LORD MERRIVALE.—Do you say that under the statute he has compounded his liability to support his wife ?

Mr. HONEYMAN.—Yes, by the determination of her pecuniary rights under the deed.

In the second case of Snowdon v. Snowdon, Mr. John Snowdon appealed from an order of the Huddersfield justices, which directed him to pay 12s. 6d. a week for his wife's maintenance on the ground that he had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her. In 1922 they entered into a deed of separation, by which he agreed to pay her £3 a week for the support of herself and four children, reducible in certain circumstances to £2 5s. In July, 1926, he was adjudicated bankrupt, and his wife proved for £844 as the capitalized value of his liability under the deed. In fact, on a payment of a dividend of 8¾d. in the £, she received about £29.

Mr. H. B. D. GRAZEBROOK, for the appellant, adopted Mr. Honeyman's arguments, but added that in this case the husband was an undischarged bankrupt. The wife voluntarily proved in the bankruptcy "for better or for worse," and thus agreed to accept in full satisfaction of her rights whatever dividend was paid. If she had not proved in bankruptcy, she might on his discharge be entitled to maintenance. Under section 39 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, if the appellant were discharged and again became bankrupt the trustee in the first bankruptcy would be entitled to prove in the second bankruptcy in respect of debts not satisfied in the first. In these circumstances there had been no wilful neglect to maintain.

Mr. H. W. BARNARD, for the respondent, adopted Mr. Fox-Andrews's arguments, adding that the deed had gone and the wife thus started de novo.

LORD MERRIVALE delivered the following considered judgment :—

The case of Dewe v. Dewe is an appeal by a wife from the dismissal by a Metropolitan magistrate of her application under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1925, for an order for maintenance against her husband. The parties were married in 1915 and have two children. In 1919 they separated and agreed to live apart upon terms which were embodied in a deed dated December 9, 1919. The deed recited the agreement to live apart and an agreement by the husband to pay to the wife during their lives £2 10s. per week for the maintenance and support of herself and of the children, of whom the deed stated that the parties had agreed that the wife should have the custody, and witnessed that in pursuance of the agreement and of provisions of the deed the parties entered into the various mutual covenants therein contained. These are usual covenants in a separation deed. The covenant as to maintenance bound the husband to pay to the wife as her separate estate without power to anticipate £2 10s. weekly during their joint lives, and provided that in case the wife should survive the husband and the said weekly payment should not have been forfeited or otherwise determined in the husband's lifetime, his "representative" should continue such weekly payments until she should marry again or die. The wife covenanted for indemnity to the husband against any future debt or liability of hers and for a right of reimbursement out of the weekly allowance in case of breach of this obligation. There were also covenants for living apart and against proceedings to compel cohabitation and a proviso for determination of the weekly payments and avoidance of the deed in case of renewed cohabitation, dissolution of the marriage, or judicial separation in respect of causes arising after the making of the deed.

After proceedings by the wife in the High Court in an action for arrears under the deed, the husband, in 1923, was adjudicated bankrupt. The wife proved in the bankruptcy in respect of her rights under the deed as to moneys payable by the husband during the joint lives of the parties. In January, 1924, a first and final dividend of 6d. in the £ was declared and paid, and the wife received in respect of the claim so proved by her a sum of £36 17s. 6d.

The wife in 1926 called upon the husband to contribute towards her maintenance. Then, and at all material times, as is alleged, the husband was engaged in a profitable practice as a dentist. He made no contribution, and in October, 1927, the wife caused to be issued at Marylebone Police Court a summons alleging against the husband wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife. The husband at the hearing relied upon the receipt by the wife of a dividend in his bankruptcy, in respect of the estimated capital value of the sums payable by the husband under the deed. It was submitted on his behalf that inasmuch as the wife was not obliged to claim in the bankruptcy for sums which would thereafter have been payable under the deed, but which had not accrued due at the bankruptcy, she had thus made claim and acceptance of the sum paid by the trustee extinguished her rights against her husband and discharged him from future liability for her maintenance. To these submissions the learned magistrate gave his assent, and he accordingly dismissed the summons. The material passage in the statement by the learned magistrate of his reasons for the decision at which he arrived is in these words :—"To my mind, it cannot be said that this man has wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife, because they have separated under a properly drawn deed of separation approved by the wife's solicitors and providing her with £2 10s. per week for life. Unfortunately, the man went bankrupt, and in his bankruptcy, rightly or wrongly, she was advised to capitalize her claim—not to claim for the smaller amount of arrears then due—but to capitalize her claim for life to the extent of thirteen or fourteen hundred pounds. Unfortunately, she only got sixpence in the pound. I cannot see that in the face of this the wife can now turn round and say, 'You have wilfully neglected to maintain me.'"

Before the learned magistrate the wife's rights appear to have been treated as purely contractual rights conferred by a deed which had been satisfied by operation of law. Before us it was more persuasively argued that the wife had accepted the provisions of the deed in satisfaction of all right to maintenance, however arising, and that the husband's liability in respect of any such claim had been discharged by his bankruptcy or by the wife's acceptance of a dividend upon the capital value of the agreed amounts. Reliance was placed on the husband's behalf upon numerous cases which established long since the right of a wife situated as the now appellant to prove in bankruptcy for the whole value of an agreement for payments by her husband in respect of maintenance, and upon cases which established that, after bankruptcy, a wife so situated has no cause of action under the agreement for maintenance. From a judgment of Lord Justice James in Ex parte Bates (11 Ch.D., 914) these words were cited : " The statute has converted the annuity for the purpose of proof into a gross sum immediately payable, and on that sum the creditor is entitled to receive dividend ; . . . both parties, the creditor and the trustee, taking the proof for better or for worse." A judgment of Sir H. H. Cozens-Hardy, M.R., in Victor v. Victor (28 The Times L.R., 131 ; [1912] 1 K.B., 247) was cited for this statement : " It seems to me that the whole policy of the Bankruptcy Act is that the bankrupt is to get complete discharge from contractual obligations to pay sums of money, and the only right of the person under the terms of the contract, whatever the pecuniary claim is, is to come in." The various authorities relied upon do, of course, establish that bankruptcy is an answer to any claim under a separation deed made before bankruptcy for payment of agreed sums under it. They do not, however, deal with the question of marital rights which is here involved, and the amplitude of the language used in some of the cases may be misleading if it is considered without due regard to the subject matter which was then under consideration.

The practical objection to the conclusion sought to be reached is that it would convert an agreement to live apart with an allowance for maintenance into an agreement to live apart without provision for maintenance. Whether in the case of an agreement for maintenance between strangers the effect of bankruptcy would be what is suggested here would depend, no doubt, upon the tenor of the agreement as a whole. Here, however, it is necessary to have definitely in mind the position in law of the appellant as a married woman. Though the juristic capacity of married women has been, broadly speaking, equalized in recent years with that of other citizens, the changes made have not eliminated some of their privileges. The course of events, mainly legislative, which has given to married women capacity to contract and to sue and be sued, has not abrogated certain rules of law as to the consequences of marriage which affect disputes like the present, but they are apt to be forgotten. Behind the relevant statutory enactments is a historic development of law whereby contractual dealings with matrimonial rights have become cognizable by the Courts instead of being excluded as contrary to public policy. The judgment of Lord Brougham in the well-known case of Warrender v. Warrender (2 Cl. and Fin., 488), in 1835, and the arguments and judgment in the more important case of Wilson v. Wilson (1 H.L. Cas., 538), in 1848, give some information as to this matter.

All the changes in question have left married women possessed of exceptional rights which are relevant to the matters now under consideration. It is necessary, then, to see what is the nature in point of law of a wife's right to maintenance by her husband and to what extent the right is necessarily affected by a separation deed containing an agreement to pay moneys for maintenance. The right of a wife to maintenance as against her husband is not contractual in its nature. It is an incident under the common law of the status or estate of matrimony, which is thus summarily expressed in Bacon's Abridgement (I., 713) : " A husband is obliged to maintain his wife and may by law be compelled to find her necessaries as meat, drink, clothes, physic, &c., suitable to the husband's degree, estate, or circumstances." Among the authorities cited is the famous case seven times argued of Manby v. Scott (1 Sid., 109), wherein as to one resolution all the Judges agreed (at p. 120) : " Fuit resolve per touts les Justices d'Angleterre que baron doint maintaine lour femes ove necessaries." One of the next familiar illustrations of the wife's right of maintenance is her power to pledge her husband's credit for necessaries, and very often in actions for debt for necessaries supplied to a married woman living apart from her husband under an agreement for maintenance the liability of the husband has been found to depend upon an inquiry whether the husband had paid as agreed. In Ozard v. Darnford (Selwyn, N.P., 13th edition, 229) Lord Mansfield stated the rule as to exemptions from liability for necessaries to the wife in this concise phrase : " If upon separation the husband agrees to make her a sufficient allowance and pays it . . . the husband is not liable." The language is the more striking for its brevity—" agrees " and " pays." Besides the prima facie authority of the wife to pledge the husband's credit, another expression of the obligation which is inherent in the marriage tie is the liability of the husband to reimburse costs of maintenance of his wife which may fall on any Poor Law authority. This is statutory and intact. How and to what extent a wife can relieve her husband of liability for her maintenance is not necessary for consideration here. The effect of a separation agreement in common form with common form clauses as to maintenance is alone in question. An agreement for this provision suspends the common law right of the wife, but does not annul it. Without some express provision to the contrary, the right would become operative in its entirety upon a return of the parties to cohabitation. As from the bankruptcy of the husband there ceased to be in existence any agreement of his providing for the discharge of his common law obligation, or capable of being set up in answer to the wife's claim thereunder. The equitable right of the husband to set up the agreement made in limitation of the primary right is gone. How far, and for what purposes the separation agreement subsists, if at all, depends upon considerations not necessary for examination in this case.

That there is no combined effect, of a separation deed with provisions for maintenance and the subsequent occurrence of bankruptcy, which deprives a wife of her claim against her husband to be provided for as a wife, is declared in a considered judgment of Sir Samuel Evans, P., delivered in 1913 in the case of McQuiban v. McQuiban (29 The Times L.R., 766 ; [1913] P., 208). The facts bore some likeness to the facts in this case. The deed contained an agreement for maintenance and a covenant against any suit for restitution of conjugal rights, but the learned President declared that the foundation of such a deed is the obligation to maintain, and, in view of the decisions which preclude an action on the deed after bankruptcy, held that the husband's refusal of cohabitation and of maintenance founded a right in the wife to a decree of restitution, a decree which in case of disobedience might be made the ground of a decree of judicial separation, with due provision for maintenance. Besides raising the defence founded on the bankruptcy, the husband relies on the wife's action in making proof of a claim under the agreement and receiving a dividend from the estate. The receipt of this dividend is said to be by way of composition, novation, or satisfaction under a matrimonial agreement. It is to be observed, however, that the claim and receipt of dividend were not incidents in a transaction between husband and wife. The husband's estate came to be distributed according to law, and the wife, having an agreement for certain payments of money which gave right of proof, proved upon it, without any new bargain with the husband. Whether she proved or not, the husband's liability under that agreement went upon bankruptcy. If there is the appearance of inconsistency it arises from the statutory provisions governing bankruptcy. The argument comes back to the position that the common law right of wife against husband, which has been suspended during the existence of the agreement for periodical payment, revived as soon as that agreement was gone, and it revived notwithstanding the receipt of dividends payable by reason of the agreement. The wife in this case is not, then, disabled in point of law by the separation agreement and the husband's bankruptcy from alleging that her husband is "guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her" within the terms of the statutes under which her summons was issued. The husband is not relieved by the facts on which he has relied from his common law liability, and he does not provide maintenance for his wife. It is proper, therefore, that the case should go back to the learned magistrate in order that he may determine the extent of the contribution that the husband should be ordered to make, having regard to the wife's position, the husband's resources, and the provisions of the statutes.

On the application of Mr. HONEYMAN, his Lordship gave leave to appeal, subject to the husband's giving security for the wife's costs within a reasonable time.

In the case of Snowdon v. Snowdon, his Lordship said that the above judgment applied, and the appeal from the order of the justices was dismissed, with costs.

MR. JUSTICE BATESON concurred in both judgments.

ROE v. RUSSELL.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Statutory tenant—Right to sublet—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 15 (1).

A "statutory tenant" (i.e., a tenant who after the expiration of his tenancy at common law holds over under the Rent Restriction Acts against the will of the landlord, or any other person who is protected from eviction by the Acts) has a right to sublet a portion of the premises occupied by him to a sub-tenant, if he was not forbidden to sublet in his original contract of tenancy.

Decision of the Divisional Court (44 The Times L.R., 177) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of a Divisional Court, Mr. Justice Shearman and Mr. Justice Finlay (44 The Times L.R., 177).

In September, 1915, a Mr. Jamieson became the tenant of certain premises within the Rent Restriction Acts, and the rooms which were the subject of the present proceedings formed part of these premises. The landlord of the whole premises was then a Mrs. Alders, and under his tenancy agreement Mr. Jamieson was not forbidden to sublet. In November, 1919, Mrs. Alders assigned her interest in the premises to the plaintiff, Mr. Percy Davis Roe. In 1921 Mr. Roe served a notice to quit on Mr. Jamieson, who thereupon became a statutory tenant of the premises. In November, 1925, Mr. Jamieson sublet to the defendant, Mr. William Russell, an omnibus inspector, the rooms which were the subject of the present proceedings. In July, 1926, Mr. Roe obtained an order for possession of the whole of the premises against Mr. Jamieson on the ground of non-payment of rent, and Mr. Jamieson left the premises in May, 1927, leaving the defendant in possession of the rooms which had been sublet to him. Mr. Jamieson had never agreed that a term should be added to his tenancy prohibiting him from subletting.

The defendant was requested by the plaintiff to vacate those rooms, but he refused to do so. The plaintiff accordingly took proceedings in the Brentford County Court for the ejectment of the defendant from the rooms which he occupied. The county court Judge (his Honour Judge Hargreaves) decided in the plaintiff's favour, holding that Jamieson had no right to sublet part of the premises to a sub-tenant, and that the defendant was, therefore, a trespasser.

By section 15 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 :

"A tenant who by virtue of the provisions of this Act retains possession of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies shall, so long as he retains possession, observe and be entitled to the benefit of all the terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy, so far as the same are consistent with the provisions of this Act. . . ."

The Divisional Court held, following the reasoning in Keeves v. Dean (40 The Times L.R., 211 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 685), that a statutory tenant possessed no interest which entitled him to sublet, and they affirmed the decision of the county court Judge.

The defendant appealed.

Mr. Doughty, K.C., and Mr. Schultess-Young appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Sidney Isaacs for the respondent.

MR. DOUGHTY, in opening the appeal, said that the case raised one of the most important questions under the Rent Restriction Acts—namely, the power of a statutory tenant to sublet in whole or in part the premises of which he had possession under the Rent Restriction Acts. Counsel referred to the county court proceedings, and said that the appellant had throughout been treated as a trespasser. The judgments in the Divisional Court depended very largely on the reasoning of Lord Justice Bankes in Keeves v. Dean (supra), where he said that the statutory tenant had no estate or title out of which he could carve any estate. He (counsel) quarrelled with that statement.

Practically all tenants were now statutory tenants, because they had received notices to increase their rent. Section 5 of the Act of 1920 had been incorporated in an altered form in section 4 of the Act of 1923, which came into force on July 31, 1923, but had not been referred to in Keeves v. Dean (supra). Subsection (h) of that section provided that :—

"No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom, shall be made or given unless [certain other conditions were fulfilled or] the tenant without the consent of the landlord has at any time after July 31, 1923, assigned or sublet the whole of the dwelling-house or sublet part of the dwelling-house, the remainder being already sublet."

Counsel also referred to the judgments of Lord Justice Scrutton and Mr. Justice Lush in Keeves v. Dean (supra), and said that the scheme of the Act was to put statutory tenants in the same position as any ordinary tenant, with this exception, that they were entitled not to receive a further notice to quit. In Parkinson v. Noel ([1923] 1 K.B., 117) Mr. Justice Greer had treated the matter as settled that a statutory tenant could sublet part of the premises. It was true that that statement was obiter. Counsel also referred to Reynolds v. Bannerman (38 The Times L.R., 509 ; [1922] 1 K.B., 719). Subletting was also referred to in sections 2 and 7 of the Act of 1923. That Act contemplated a lawful subletting after notice to increase had been given, and of the 10 per cent. increase allowed half was to go to the landlord.

The practice of subletting had grown considerably, with the result that a large part of the time of the county courts had been occupied in apportioning the rents of sub-tenants.

Counsel submitted that, as yet, no reasonable explanation had been given of the meaning of the words "lawfully sublet" in section 7 of the Rent Act of 1923. With regard to the position of an under-tenant to whom premises had been let in breach of covenant not to underlet he referred to Dick and Another v. Jacques and Another (36 The Times L.R., 773).

On the question of subletting part of the premises, counsel referred to Campbell v. Lill (42 The Times L.R., 397), a decision of Lord Justice Bankes and Lord Justice Warrington, sitting as a Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division, where it was held that the tenant, who was a statutory tenant and had sublet a portion of the house to a sub-tenant, was, in the circumstances of that case, within the protection of the statute. It was held in Reeves v. Davies (37 The Times L.R., 431 ; [1921] 2 K.B., 486) that the interest in his dwelling-house of a statutory tenant who had been adjudged bankrupt vested in his trustee in bankruptcy, and that he (the tenant) could not claim the protection of the Act. He submitted that section 15 of the Act of 1920 was the foundation of his position here and that the tenant, which expression by the definition clause included the subtenant, was entitled to sublet either as an incident or as a condition of the tenancy.

Mr. SCHULTESS-YOUNG followed on the same side. The provision in section 15 of the Act of 1920 as to retaining possession did not mean actual occupancy. The statutory tenant became landlord of the subtenant and was responsible for keeping him in order, and if the tenant was evicted the superior landlord became landlord of the subtenant.

Mr. ISAACS, on behalf of the respondent, submitted that the decisions in both the Courts below were right, and that a statutory tenant was not entitled to sublet the whole or part of the premises of which he was tenant. In support of that contention he relied on Wheeler v. Smith, decided on May 14, 1926, and reported in the Estates Gazette ; Aston v. Smith (40 The Times L.R., 576 ; [1924] 2 K.B., 143) ; and Gidden v. Mills ([1925] 2 K.B., 713). He said that the Act of 1920, which consolidated previous Acts, was designed to protect the tenant. A reaction then set in, and the Act of 1923 was designed to cut down the rights of tenants by introducing the principle of decontrol.

He took his stand on the judgments in Keeves v. Dean (supra), where the principle laid down was that the right of the statutory tenant was merely a personal right not to be disturbed by his landlord. On that point he also referred to Remon v. City of London Real Property Company (36 The Times L.R., 869 ; [1921] 1 K.B., 49). He submitted that the statutory tenant was in the position of a licensee at common law. As soon as he parted with any portion of his right he lost the protection given to him in law. As to the position of a licensee, he referred to Coleman v. Foster (1 H. and N., 37). Another useful analogy was the case of a person holding a lien. In his submission it followed from the decision in Keeves v. Dean (supra) that if a person could not assign he could not sublet ; an assignee could not be distinguished from a sublessee.

The expression "terms and conditions" in section 15 of the Act of 1920 must be construed strictly, and a right to assign or to sublet was not a term of tenancy, but merely an incident of it. On the distinction between an incident and a condition see Brewer v. Jacobs ([1923] 1 K.B., 528).

Under section 15 a right to sublet, even if it was a term or condition of the tenancy, was inconsistent with the provisions of the Act in the same way as an assignment was. Further, the expression, "so long as he retains possession," contradicted the right to assign or sublet. The whole policy of the Act was to protect persons in occupation (see Hicks v. Scarsdale Brewery Company ([1924] W.N., 189)), and the distinction between a contractual tenant and a statutory tenant was a real one. Subletting was mentioned in the Acts both with and without the qualification "lawfully." He submitted that the subletting in each case must be lawful in the sense that the tenant had a contractual right under his covenant with the landlord, or, in the absence of such a covenant, under an implied power, to do so, and that the word "subletting" referred only to a letting by a contractual tenant. There might also be a contractual tenancy which was outside the scope of the Rent Restriction Acts, and the tenant might sublet at a rental which brought the subtenancy within the Acts. As to the distinction between a contractual and a statutory tenant, he referred, in addition to the cases already cited, to Cottell v. Baker and others (36 The Times L.R., 208) ; Ward v. Larkins ([1923] W.N., 189) ; Standingford v. Bruce (42 The Times L.R., 122 ; [1926] 1 K.B., 466) ; Fumasoli v. Comyn (132 L.T. Rep., 490).

If a statutory tenant lost the protection of the Acts the sub-tenant acquired no rights (see Prout v. Hunter (40 The Times L.R., 868 ; [1924] 2 K.B., 736); Leslie and Co., Limited v. Cumming and others (42 The Times L.R., 504 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 417)). Under section 5 (1) (d) of the Act of 1920, a landlord might, on providing alternative accommodation, obtain possession of the premises. That must make a statutory tenant's position a precarious one, and it was difficult to see how he could have, in these circumstances, an estate or interest in land. Further, if there were power to sublet and various sublettings took place, a burden might be imposed on a landlord to find alternative accommodation for all the subtenants, and this would lead to unreasonable results.

Mr. DOUGHTY replied.

The following considered judgments were delivered :—

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON.—This appeal raises a question of great importance to a number of persons in occupation of a few rooms in houses of low rental and rateable value. The question is whether, when their title to be in those rooms depends on a subletting by a person who himself had only a tenancy under the Rent Restrictions Acts—when a man is not in by the consent of his landlord, but because his landlord can only turn him out under conditions limited by those Acts—they have a good title. In other words, can a statutory tenant sublet part of the premises of which he is a statutory tenant ? The phrase "statutory tenant" comes from the marginal note to section 15 of the Act of 1920, "conditions of statutory tenancy," which is not part of the Act, but applies to the person who, in section 15, is described as a person "who by virtue of the provisions of this Act retains possession of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies." The Courts have interpreted this as referring to the provisions of section 5 of the Act of 1920, and section 4 of the Act of 1923, which prevent a landlord from getting rid of a tenant whose contractual tenancy has expired, except under the provisions of those sections. He stays in, not by the will of the landlord, who may desire to get rid of him, but by the provisions of the statute (See Remon v. City of London Real Property Company, 36 The Times L.R., 869 ; [1921] 1 K.B., 49). But, as I said in that case, Parliament originally "omitted expressly to provide what sort of a legal interest the person who stayed in by permission of Parliament, and against the will of the landlord," should have. The definition in section 15 of the Act of 1920, that so long as he retains possession he shall observe and be entitled to all the terms and conditions of his original contract of tenancy, so far as the same are consistent with the provisions of the Act, did not help very much when one came to the practical facts of life, and I think citizens are entitled to complain that their legislators did not address their minds to the probable events that might happen in cases of statutory tenancy, and consider how the legal interest which they were granting was affected by those probable events. For instance : (1) Can a statutory tenant dispose of his statutory tenancy by will ? (2) What happens to his statutory tenancy if he dies intestate ? (3) What happens to his statutory tenancy if the tenant becomes bankrupt, and his trustee (a) does not disclaim, (b) disclaims ? (4) Can a statutory tenant assign all his interest (a) for value, (b) without consideration, but under seal ? (5) Can he sublet (a) all his interest by several subtenancies ? (b) part of his interest by a sub-tenancy of part of the premises ? (6) Can he, retaining possession and control of the premises, and living in them, let unfurnished rooms to lodgers ?

I think it is pretty evident that the Legislature never considered as a whole the effect on the statutory tenancy of such ordinary incidents as death, bankruptcy, voluntary assignment, either inter vivos or by will, a total or partial subletting, but from time to time put into one of the series of Acts a provision as to one of those incidents without considering how it fitted in with the general nature of the tenancy which those incidents might affect. For instance, intestacy : Parliament, in 1915, section 2 (1) (d) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (War Restrictions) Act, 1915, defined "tenant" as including "any person from time to time deriving title under the . . . tenant." This appears to show that in some instances, at all events, the statutory tenant might pass on his statutory interest to others. Whether or not they thought of persons entitled under the Statute of Distributions does not appear ; but in 1920, by section 12 (1) (g), they brought in, in addition to persons deriving title under the tenant, "the widow of a tenant dying intestate who was residing with him at the time of his death, or, where a tenant dying intestate leaves no widow, or is a woman, such member of the tenant's family so residing as aforesaid as may be decided in default of agreement by the County Court." What would happen if those entitled under the Statute of Distributions, say a child not resident in the house, disputes with the widow, or a child resident in the house ; or who are to agree, whether all those entitled under the Statute, or all members of the family resident in the house, is left in obscurity. In Mellows v. Low (39 The Times L.R., 190 ; [1923] 1 K.B., 523), where there was intestacy but no notice to quit had been given to the tenant, and no member of the family resided in the house, and the administratrix did not reside in the house, the latter was treated as having title against the landlord, she being a person deriving title from the tenant. But the Legislature does apparently there recognize that the tenant may have an interest which passes to someone else on his death, and is not only personal to him living. Take a will : The statutes say nothing about this, except the definition of tenant as including persons deriving title under him, and, as curiously enough no statutory tenant seems to have left a will under which a question has come into Court, the Courts have said nothing. In Collis v. Flower ([1921] 1 K.B., 409), where a non-resident executor was treated as a tenant the death occurred during the contractual tenancy, and before notice to quit had been given. The question of statutory tenancy did not, therefore, arise. It would seem that since, as appears hereafter, the statutory tenant cannot assign inter vivos his interest, it is very improbable that he can assign by will, but it does not seem that the Legislature considered the matter at all.

Take next involuntary assignment to a trustee by bankruptcy. Again, except that "tenant" includes persons deriving title through a tenant, there is no indication that the Legislature thought about the matter. The Courts have had to deal with the question. In Reeves v. Davies (37 The Times L.R., 431 ; [1921] 2 K.B., 486), during the currency of a contractual tenancy the tenant became bankrupt, the trustee disclaimed, and the landlord claimed possession. The Court of Appeal held that he was entitled to it by reason of the trustee's disclaimer. They held that the bankrupt did not become a statutory tenant when the person to whom his interest had passed under the wide definition of property in the Bankruptcy Act disclaimed the lease. But this and the next case show that in certain circumstances the interest of the original tenant may pass to another by operation of law, and is not, therefore, merely personal to him ; for in Parkinson v. Noel ([1923] 1 K.B., 117) the bankruptcy of the tenant occurred while he was a statutory tenant, the trustee disclaimed, the landlord claimed possession from the statutory tenant, and the Courts gave the landlord possession. Again the statutory tenant is treated as having an interest which may pass to another.

Take next the case of a voluntary assignment during life. The statutes until 1923 only gave help in two respects. There was the definition that "tenant" included those deriving title from him; and section 15 (2) of the Act of 1920 provides that a tenant retaining possession should not, as a condition of giving it up, receive any consideration from any person other than the landlord. In Keeves v. Dean and Nunn v. Pellegrini (40 The Times L.R., 211; [1924] 1 K.B., 685) two assignments for value by statutory tenants to third parties came before the Court of Appeal. All three members of the Court held them bad as contrary to the Act in that the assignor received value from the assignee. But two members of the Court also held the assignments ineffective on a different ground. They said that a statutory tenant under section 15 (1) of the Act of 1920 was entitled to all the terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy, but that the right to assign the original tenancy was not a term or condition of the original contract of tenancy, but an incident of the tenancy created by the original contract, which, therefore, did not pass to the statutory tenant, who had only a personal right which he could not assign to anyone else. I did not agree with this, as I thought it was too narrow a construction of the phrase "terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy," which I thought included rights resulting from the grant in the contract, and I did not see how it fitted in with the previous decisions that the interest of the statutory tenant passed on bankruptcy to the trustee, or, as I thought, with the express provisions as to intestacy.

But it is to be noted that the facts on which the decision in Keeves v. Dean (supra) was based arose, and the action was commenced, before the Act of 1923 came into operation, and section 4 (1) (h) of that Act was not applicable or cited to the Court. That subsection made any assignment after July 31, 1923, without leave of the landlord, a ground on which the Court might eject the tenant, and it now seems clear, therefore, that whether an assignment is for value, or without consideration, but under seal, it may be used for ejecting the tenant, presumably because in the opinion of the Legislature his interest as statutory tenant was not one that he could assign, in that by assigning he would cease to retain possession within the meaning of the statute of 1920, section 15 (1).

This brings one, after a too lengthy preamble, the justification for which is the obscurity of the Acts, to the question in this case. Can the statutory tenant, while in possession, sublet part of the premises that he holds under his tenancy, remaining in possession of the rest of the premises? I can quite understand and sympathize with the Divisional Court, which approached this question on the lines of the reasoning of two of the Judges in Keeves v. Dean (supra). They would say that the right to sublet part of a contractual tenancy, in cases where there is no express provision to the contrary in the contract, is not a "term or condition of the contract," but only an incident of the tenancy thereby created, and it does not, therefore, pass to the statutory tenant who has only a personal right to occupy so long as he observes the terms and conditions, which does not give him a right to exercise other incidents of the grant than that of occupying the demised premises. Consequently two Divisional Courts said that the statutory tenant cannot sublet even part of the demised premises; this is the view of Mr. Justice Shearman and Mr. Justice Finlay in the judgment appealed from, where a subtenancy of part was created by the statutory tenant, who has himself now been ejected from the rest of the premises. It is also the view of Mr. Justice Salter and Mr. Justice Talbot in Wheeler v. Smith (1926), reported in the Estates Gazette Digest of Cases, a report which was certified by counsel engaged in it as being a correct report. It was also the view of Mr. Justice Swift, obiter, in Aston v. Smith (40 The Times L.R., 576; [1924] 2 K.B., 143, at p. 146). On the other hand, Mr. Justice Greer, before the decision in Keeves v. Dean (supra), had in Parkinson v. Noel (supra) stated, also obiter, that a statutory tenant could sublet.

But certain matters have to be considered: First, the two Lords Justices who expressed their opinion as to the personal right on the ground that incidents of tenancy or estate did not pass, expressly reserved the question as to subletting the whole or part of the premises. Lord Justice Bankes in Keeves v. Dean (supra, at p. 693) said:—

"I say nothing about subletting, because it may be that a statutory tenant who has sublet part only of the premises which he claims the right to retain and which he occupies is still entitled to the protection of the statute. What the position would be if he were to sublet the whole of the premises, and whether under those circumstances any distinction could be drawn between subletting and assignment, it is not necessary here to determine, and I do not decide it."

Mr. Justice Lush puts the difficulty in the assignor's giving up possession on an assignment, which he does not do in partial subletting.

Secondly, the provisions of the Act of 1923, section 4 (1) (h), apply to this case, and did not apply to Keeves v. Dean (supra), and were therefore not considered by the Court; and that subsection only makes as a ground of ejectment the subletting of part of the dwelling-house, the remainder being already sublet. That is to say, it does not treat as a ground of ejectment the subletting of part of the premises, the statutory tenant living in the house, part of which he sublets, but only a series of sublettings which between them account for the whole of the house and leave the statutory tenant out of possession of the premises. Some explanation of the presence of this provision may be found in the fact that the decisions of the Court of Appeal and House of Lords in 1922 and 1923 in Terrell v Chatterton (39 The Times L.R., 589; [1923] A.C., 578) had just brought to attention the effect of a tenant, who could not sublet the whole of his premises, making two partial sublettings which in effect sublet the whole demised premises. It is very difficult after this clause (h) to say that the statutory tenant cannot sublet part of the premises, when the landlord is not given power to eject him for doing so. It is true that this provision has very odd results. A, the statutory tenant of a house of nine rooms, sublets three to B, and three more to C; these sublettings, apparently, will not be grounds for his ejection by the landlord. He then sublets the last three rooms to D, and this apparently will justify the landlord in ejecting him from the whole of the premises. Will the sub-tenants be able to say, under the Act of 1920, section 5 (5), that the premises have been lawfully sublet; or will B and C be able to say it, but not D; though the ground of ejectment of A is the sublettings to B, C, and D, and not any one subletting. The same point will arise under the Act of 1920, section 15 (3), which for some reason which I cannot understand has been added to section 5 (5) of the Act of 1920.

Thirdly, a case where the provision of section 4 (1) (h) of the Act of 1923 was applicable came before Lord Justice Bankes and Lord Justice Warrington, sitting as a Divisional Court in Campbell v. Lill (42 The Times L.R., 397) in March, 1926. There the statutory tenant sublet part of the premises, remaining in possession of the rest, and the landlord endeavoured to eject him. Lord Justice Warrington said that he agreed with the opinions of Lord Justice Bankes and Mr. Justice Lush in Keeves v. Dean (supra). Lord Justice Bankes then had to decide the question which he had reserved in Keeves v. Dean (supra), whether a statutory tenant who sublets part is entitled to or has lost the protection of the statute. He and Lord Justice Warrington did not say that subletting of part is an incident of estate but not a term or condition of the tenancy, and therefore the power to sublet part did not pass to the statutory tenant under section 15 (1) of the Act of 1920, but he has only a personal right. On the contrary, they took the view that the statutory tenant was protected by the omission in section 4 (1) (h) of any mention of subletting only part of the premises. I personally find it very difficult to see how the statutory tenant could be protected from any consequences of subletting part, and yet his sub-tenant of part could be expelled. If the statutory tenant could not, by reason of his statutory tenancy, sublet part, he had by subletting part violated a condition of tenancy under the Act, and so become liable to ejectment under section 5 (1) (a) of the Act of 1920 and section 4 (1) (a) of the Act of 1923, but he was held not liable to ejectment. Under these circumstances I find it impossible to hold the decision of the majority as to assignment under section 15 (1) of the Act of 1920 binding on a question of partial subletting under section 4 (1) (h) of the Act of 1923.

But further, in my view, the continual references throughout the Acts to partial subletting and sub-tenancies must be treated as a recognition that in the opinion of Parliament a statutory tenant remaining in possession might sublet part of his demised premises. The references are sometimes to sub-tenants ; sometimes to tenants to whom the premises are lawfully let. I find it impossible to explain them by limiting them to sub-tenants created by a contractual and not by a statutory tenant. It is impossible to ignore the fact that there are a very large number of the latter class, for every landlord who has raised his rent by virtue of the Acts, and every tenant who has done the same to a sub-tenant, has only done so because of statutory tenancy. Section 7 of the Act of 1923 empowers the tenant to increase the rent of his sub-tenant by a certain percentage, and section 3 (1) of the Act of 1920 shows that this increase cannot apply to a contractual tenancy lawfully made by the tenant. It would seem to follow that section 7 of the Act of 1923 must relate to and recognize sub-tenancies created by statutory tenants.

Again, why should section 4 (1) (h) of the Act of 1923 make no mention of partial subletting by a tenant unless a statutory tenant had, in the view of the Legislature, a right to sublet part of his holding. Section 1 (1) (b) of the Increase of Rent, &c. (Amendment), Act, 1919, when it speaks of the tenant's not being ejected unless, amongst other things, by subletting the house or any part thereof or by taking in lodgers he is making an unreasonable profit, must have been dealing with statutory tenants amongst others, though, as to subletting the whole house, it is now extended by the Act of 1923, section 4 (1) (h), already referred to.

From these and other provisions I have come to the conclusion that the Rent Restrictions Acts contemplate that the statutory tenant remaining in possession might sublet part of his premises, subject to apportionment of the standard rent of the tenant's premises, so as to prevent the sub-tenant from paying an extortionate rent. He cannot, however, assign his tenancy of the whole of the premises, whether for value or not. Nor can he by a series of sublettings part with the whole of the premises which he holds as statutory tenant, though if he does so I desire to reserve the question of the position of the sub-tenants. I also would point out that the question whether persons occupying part of the house in which their landlord resides, though described as sub-tenants, are not really lodgers, and the effect of their being lodgers, were not raised in the Court below and were therefore not considered in this Court.

For these reasons I am of opinion that an order for ejectment should not have been made against the sub-tenant in this case, and his appeal must, therefore, be allowed and judgment entered for him, with costs here and below. I regret that I cannot order the costs to be paid by the draftsmen of the Rent Restrictions Acts and the members of the Legislature who passed them and are responsible for the obscurity of the Acts and their failure clearly to provide for such obvious incidents of tenancy as death with or without a will, bankruptcy, power to assign, and power to sublet in whole or in part demised premises.

Lord Justice Sargant.—I am of the same opinion. In considering the decision of the Divisional Court here it is of great importance to see what was the argument which was presented to them on the part of the sub-tenant Russell and which their judgment negatived. Put shortly it was this. Jamieson, the tenant of the whole, was not prohibited by his original contract of tenancy from subletting part ; this ability to sublet was one of the terms and conditions of his original contract, which, under section 15, subsection 1, of the Act of 1920 became applicable to his subsequent statutory tenancy ; and therefore the sub-tenancy created by him in favour of the defendant Russell was a lawful subletting, and is preserved against the landlord by subsection 3 of section 15, notwithstanding the determination of the statutory tenancy of Jamieson. Now this argument is directly in conflict with the reasoning of the majority of the Court of Appeal in Keeves v. Dean (40 The Times L.R., 211 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 685) which probably binds us and with which, moreover, I agree. For when the conclusion is reached that the statutory tenant has no estate or property as tenant at all, but has a purely personal right to retain possession of the property, it is difficult to apply to him, as part of the terms and conditions of his former tenancy, rights essentially incidental and due to the possession of property. It was to this argument, and this argument alone, that the decision of the Divisional Court was, as I read it, directed. Mr. Justice Shearman, for instance, put it thus : "I cannot understand how the right to sublet can be considered to be one of the 'terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy' when the right to assign is not," and Mr. Justice Finlay, after quoting the view of Mr. Justice Lush as to the purely personal character of the statutory tenant's rights, says : "It seems to me to follow that the statutory tenant . . . cannot sublet for precisely the same reason, namely, that he has no estate out of which the subletting can be carved." And it would seem that the decision of another Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Salter and Mr. Justice Talbot, in a case of Wheeler v. Smith reported, and as we are told through counsel accurately reported, in the Estates Gazette Digest of Cases, was founded on reasoning similar to that of Mr. Justice Shearman and Mr. Justice Finlay in the present case. In rejecting the foregoing line of argument on behalf of the sub-tenant the Divisional Courts appear to have been right. And it may be further noted that, even if the statutory tenant had the same estate as he previously had as a contractual tenant, that alone would not avail the sub-tenant ; for a contractual tenant, though entitled under his contract to sublet part, obviously cannot give his sub-tenant an estate exceeding in duration his own estate.

Before this Court, however, the argument for the appellant sub-tenant has taken a much wider range and has been of a much more cogent character. Mr. Doughty has founded himself mainly on the proposition that the statutory tenant is the creation of statute, and has such rights as the various Acts have given him either expressly or impliedly ; and that an examination of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (which two Acts are hereinafter referred to briefly as the Act of 1920 and the Act of 1923 respectively), shows that the Legislature has recognized the power of statutory tenants to create sub-tenancies, and has provided protection for the sub-tenants, independently of the continuance of the statutory tenancy of the statutory tenant. To appreciate this argument it is necessary to consider the general position of tenants of small properties at the time when the Acts of 1920 and 1923 were passed.

There can, I think, be no doubt that Mr. Doughty was right in his view that at both of these dates, and particularly at the time of the operation of the latter Act (July 31, 1923), the vast majority of the tenancies of the properties to which the Acts applied had ceased to be contractual tenancies and had become statutory tenancies. For landlords had naturally taken advantage of the intermediate legislation enabling them to make the statutorily authorized increases in the rents payable to them, and had for the most part (at any rate in England) adopted the method strictly necessary for that purpose of giving notices to determine existing contractual tenancies and subsequently giving notices of the appropriate permitted increases. And even in those cases (most common in Scotland) where landlords had adopted the method, subsequently held to be ineffective—see Kerr v. Bryde (39 The Times L.R., 61 ; [1923] A.C., 16)—of giving merely a notice of increase of rent, the error had been cured retrospectively by the Rent Restrictions (Notices of Increase) Act, 1923, which came into operation on June 7, 1923.

There can also be no doubt that both contractual tenants, while their tenancies remained contractual, and statutory tenants, whether originally contractual or not, had in innumerable cases, particularly having regard to the notorious deficiency of housing accommodation, and whether they were strictly entitled to do so or not, let or affected to let portions of their premises to sub-tenants ; and, so far as the position and rights of these sub-tenants were concerned, the cases appear to be divisible, at the time of the passing of the Acts of 1920 and 1923, into four classes—namely, (1) sub-tenants holding under tenants who still held on contractual tenancies, which did not prohibit the subletting of part ; (2) sub-tenants holding under tenants who still held on contractual tenancies which prohibited the subletting of part ; (3) sub-tenants holding under statutory tenants who had previously held on contractual tenancies which had prohibited the subletting of part ; (4) sub-tenants holding under statutory tenants who had not previously held on contractual tenancies which had prohibited the subletting of part. And since, as already stated, the number of statutory tenants was very much greater than the number of tenants still holding on contractual tenancies, the number of sub-tenants in classes (3) and (4), that is, holding from statutory tenants, was, at the dates of operation of the two Acts of 1920 and 1923, and particularly at the latter date, enormously in excess of the sub-tenants in classes (1) and (2), namely, those holding from tenants whose tenancies were still contractual.

Further, it is necessary to bear in mind the great practical difference between the assignment or parting with the possession of the whole of the premises held by a tenant on the one hand and the subletting of a portion of these premises on the other hand. In the first case the direct personal relationship between the landlord and the tenant, as such, is completely put an end to. But in the second case that direct personal relationship still remains, although, as regards a portion of the premises, and as between the tenant and the sub-tenant themselves, a new contractual relationship is created with which the landlord is not directly concerned, apart from any breach of contract in cases where the tenant was expressly prohibited from subletting part. It may well be that a non-prohibited sub-tenancy of this kind may not have all the legal characteristics of a full legal tenancy, such as the existence of a reversion in the sub-landlord to which rent is incident and which would involve full powers of assignment of the interest of either the sub-landlord or the sub-tenant. But it may still create a personal contractual relationship between the sub-landlord and sub-tenant which will subsist during the existence of the superior tenancy of the sub-landlord in respect of the whole premises. It is to be remembered that at common law a lease merely created personal contractual rights and gave nothing of the nature of indestructible estate to the lessee. It was only by the Statute of Marlebridge that the lessee was first protected against having his position destroyed—see Challis on Real Property, 3rd Edition, at page 426. And it was not till the reign of Henry VIII. that the full assignability of the relationship of the lessee to the lessor, and vice versa, was completely established.

Indeed in practice, where an individual is placed, as the statutory tenant undoubtedly was, in the position of having an exclusive personal possession of his premises, he is necessarily in a position in which he can place a third person in actual possession of a part of the premises, while retaining possession of the remainder, and that wholly irrespectively of whether his own right to exclusive undisturbed possession is purely personal or amounts to something in the nature of an estate or interest in the premises. And from this point of view it is of interest to refer to the comparatively recent case of Grove v. Portal (18 The Times L.R., 319 ; [1902] 1 Ch., 727), where a mere exclusive licensee of fishing rights, restrained in terms from underletting (that is from underletting the whole rights), was nevertheless held entitled to grant a sub-licence to two "rods" to participate in the fishing rights with him. The landlords of statutory tenants were not, in view of the exclusive possession of the tenants, able to discriminate between those whom the tenants took as lodgers and those whom they affected to take as sub-tenants. And these last-named persons were in a position which, during the retention by the statutory tenants of their relationship towards their landlords, was practically indistinguishable from that of sub-tenants holding under ordinary sub-tenancies from contractual tenants.

Bearing these considerations in mind, then what is the true interpretation to be put upon the Act of 1920 and the Act of 1923, and, I may add, on section 1 (1) (b) of the Increase of Rent, &c. (Amendment) Act, 1919, where they refer to and obviously recognize the creation and existence of sub-tenancies? Mr. Isaacs, in his careful and able argument for the respondent landlord, insisted, and indeed was bound to insist, that the sub-tenancies referred to throughout were merely those in the first of the four classes to which I have referred above—namely, sub-tenancies from tenants who still held on contractual tenancies not prohibiting subletting. But to confine these references to this very minute class of sub-tenancies is, in my judgment, to place altogether too narrow an interpretation on this legislation, and indeed, in some cases, to come into conflict with the fairly obvious meaning of the passages in question. For instance, section 1 of the Increase of Rent, &c. (Amendment) Act, 1919, is a section which must, I think, be referring to and protecting statutory tenants, and if this is so, subsection (1) (b) of that section refers to and recognizes sub-tenancies existing under statutory tenants, and indeed treats them, for the purposes of that subsection, as standing in very much the same position as lodgers of the statutory tenants. Again, section 8 of the Act of 1920 would seem to apply quite clearly to statutory tenants; and if this is so there is great difficulty in limiting the sub-tenancies referred to in that section to sub-tenancies created by tenants who still held by virtue of contractual bargains only. And in section 12 (1) (g) of that Act the extension of the meaning of "tenant and tenancy" to include sub-tenant and sub-tenancy, and the extension of the meaning of "let" to include sublet, seem to me incompatible with a limitation of these expressions to the very limited class of sub-tenancies to which Mr. Isaacs sought to restrict the operation of the Act of 1920. Even more clearly inconsistent with that restricted meaning is the language of section 4 of the Act of 1923, substituting a new section for section 5 of the Act of 1920. That new section is obviously applicable to statutory tenants generally; and, this being so, subsection (1) (b) of that section must be read as recognizing sub-tenants of statutory tenants, and classing them for the purposes of the subsection with persons "residing or lodging" with them. And subsection (1) (h) of that section, while making an assignment by the statutory tenant or a subletting or sublettings by him of the whole of his dwelling-house an event on which a judgment of ejectment may be given, obviously treats a mere subletting of part as an event which does not involve a liability to forfeiture. Section 4, subsection (1) (h), of the Act of 1923 was not relied on, or even referred to, in Keeves v. Dean (supra), probably because the material facts in that case had occurred before the Act of 1923 had come into operation. But it was referred to and formed the main ground of the decision in the subsequent case of Campbell v. Lill (42 The Times L.R., 397), decided by a Divisional Court consisting of Lord Justice Bankes and Lord Justice Warrington. The latter Judge pointed out that on all sound canons of interpretation the word "tenant" should be given the same meaning in every part of the section. This is a strong authority in favour of the view that the section is not limited to contractual tenancies, but comprises statutory tenancies, and therefore recognizes sub-tenancies of parts of the premises included in statutory tenancies. Mr. Isaacs laid some stress on the circumstance that in some parts of the legislation in question, such as section 5, subsection 5, and section 15, subsection 3, of the Act of 1920, and section 2, subsection 2, section 4, subsection 5, and section 7, subsection 1, of the Act of 1923, reference is made to "lawful subletting"; and he argued that this was but the mere formal expression of what are referred to merely as "subletting" or "sub-tenancies" in other sections of the two Acts, and that this confirmed his suggestion that under either form of expression all that was being dealt with was the first of the four classes of cases which have been set out above—namely, sublettings effected by tenants still holding under contractual tenancies that did not prohibit the subletting of part of the premises. But I can see no reason for thinking that this phrase has so narrow a meaning. It will be remembered that under the scheme of the Acts, where a contractual tenancy prohibited the subletting of part of the premises, the resulting statutory tenancy being "on the same terms and conditions" would also prohibit the subletting of part. And I think that the phrase "lawfully sublet" is amply and properly satisfied by being held to refer either to this first class of sub-tenancies or to the fourth class of sub-tenancies above referred to, that is, to sub-tenancies under statutory tenants who had not previously held on contractual tenancies which had prohibited the subletting of part of the premises.

A further argument for the respondent was that the Legislature could hardly have intended to subject landlords, not only to the creation of an irremovable class of tenants, but also to the possible and indeed almost inevitable creation of a number of sub-tenants of portions of the demised premises. But in my judgment this argument was effectively countered by Mr. Doughty, who pointed out that even on the respondent's view this was the result with regard to all premises comprised in tenancies which still remained contractual and were not subject to a prohibition as to partial subletting; and that, if once it were thought expedient to subject any landlords to such an increased burden, there seemed to be no reason why this burden should be cast on those landlords only whose premises were still held by tenants on contractual and not statutory tenancies. The whole legislation on this subject, and there have been some ten Acts dealing with these questions, though it has only been necessary to refer specifically to three, bears marks of having been passed in some haste and in view of successive emergencies that arose during and after the war through the lamentable shortage of housing accommodation. It is patchwork legislation, has not been framed with any scientific accuracy of language, and presents great difficulties of interpretation to the Courts that have to give practical effect to it. But these considerations, in my judgment, tend in favour of the appellant rather than the respondent in this case. It is the respondent who has to rely on legal niceties, such as fine-drawn distinctions between the comparatively minute class of tenants whose tenancies still remain contractual and the vast class of those who are known as statutory tenants. Apart from such fine distinctions, the appellant can point to the clear recognition by section 4, subsection 1 (h), of the Act of 1923 of the right of statutory tenants to sublet part of their premises without incurring forfeiture, and can also point to the words of section 4, subsection 5, of the Act of 1923 which prevent the recovery of possession against a tenant being operative against a sub-tenant. It is no doubt true that this last subsection contains the phrase "lawfully sublet." But the argument for the respondent admits that the word "lawfully" at least includes a condition that there shall have been no express contractual prohibition against the subletting of part of the premises; and there seems to be no sufficient reason for construing the word "lawfully" as implying any further condition which would limit the section to contractual tenancies not subject to this prohibition and exclude statutory tenancies not subject to a like prohibition. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed with costs.

MR. JUSTICE EVE.—This appeal raises the important question whether the holder of a statutory tenancy under section 15, subsection 1, of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, in whose contract of tenancy no prohibition against subletting was contained has power to sublet part of the controlled premises and thereby confer on any sub-tenant, to whom such part was sublet before any proceedings for possession or ejectment were commenced against the statutory tenant, the protective provisions of section 5, subsection 5, and section 15, subsection 3. In other words, has the part of the premises so sublet been "lawfully" sublet within the meaning of the Act as amended by the Act of 1923?

It has already been decided in this Court that a statutory tenant cannot assign his interest (Keeves v. Dean, 40 The Times L.R., 211; [1924] 1 K.B., 685), but in the same case the question of his right to sublet was expressly reserved. The decision involved a difference of opinion between the members of the Court upon one important point of construction as to whether the right to assign was or was not a "term or condition" of the original contract of tenancy within the meaning of section 15, subsection 1, of the Act of 1920. The majority of the Court held the right to be incident to the tenant's estate, and not properly or indeed accurately described as a term or condition of the tenancy agreement, and this interpretation which I accept as binding upon us, has been applied in the present and at least one other case by the Divisional Court to negative any right of the statutory tenant to sublet. But it is to be observed that the decision in Keeves v. Dean (supra) did not rest upon this point alone. The Court examined the other relevant sections of the Act, and in particular section 15, subsection 2, and came to the conclusion that the statute was not intended to confer upon the statutory tenant a right to transfer his legal position under the Act to another person by assignment, and this conclusion is fortified by section 4, subsection 1 (h), of the Act of 1923 which excepts from the benefit of the restrictions on the right to recover possession any tenant who without the consent of the landlord has at any time after the coming into force of the Act of 1923 assigned or sublet the whole of the dwelling-house or sublet part of the dwelling-house, the remainder being already sublet.

On behalf of the sub-tenant it has been argued that the very terms of that subsection clearly show that the Legislature is drawing a distinction between an assignment and a subletting of the whole on the one hand, and a subletting of a part on the other, and we have been taken through the Acts, section by section, and invited to determine that not only is there nothing in the Act to negative the right to sublet a part, but many indications that such sublettings are contemplated.

By the definition section, section 12, subsection 1 (f) and (g), except where the context otherwise requires, the expression "tenant" includes any person from time to time deriving title under the original tenant, the expressions "tenant and tenancy" include "sub-tenant and sub-tenancy" and the expression "let" includes "sublet."

In examining the context in which these various expressions are to be found, we are certainly entitled, if not bound, to take into account the circumstances in which the Acts came to be passed, the nature of the tenements to which they apply, and the primary object of the whole legislation. The abnormal shortage of available dwellings for persons compelled by their means and avocations to reside in dwellings of very moderate rental value, and the apprehension that an excessive demand for accommodation of this class would inevitably raise rents to an insufferable extent, were no doubt the main factors in promoting the passing of the Acts, and from the very first, and still more forcibly as the competition for habitations increased, it must have been appreciated that premises of the nature intended to be protected by the Acts were rarely occupied by one family alone, but were frequently sublet in floors, and even single rooms, to several. Indeed, unless such had been the case, it is difficult to believe that the Acts would have accomplished what they have done. Moreover, it must not be lost sight of that no one can fail to have foreseen that the tenants holding under contracts would by degrees become statutory tenants in part by the determination or expiry of their tenancy agreements, and in part also by the service of notices of intention to increase rents.

Bearing these matters in mind, I agree with the other members of the Court that examination of the Acts, and in particular of those provisions to which counsel for the appellant directed our attention—section 5 (as amended by the Act of 1923), subsection 1 (b) and (h) and subsection 5, section 8 and section 15, subsection 3, and in the Act of 1923, section 7—leads to the conclusion that the right of subletting is not restricted to subletting during the currency of the tenancy agreement, but is contemplated and intended to be exercisable by the statutory tenant.

Reliance was naturally placed by the respondent on the expression "lawfully sublet" which occurs in both Acts, but the presence of the qualifying word is, I think, explained by this, that there are at least two forms of subletting which are not lawful under the Acts: one, a subletting which sublets the whole of the dwelling-house, or sublets a part, the remainder being already sublet; and the other a subletting made after the commencement of proceedings for recovery of possession, or ejectment. I agree in thinking that the appeal should be allowed.

ELLERMAN LINES, LIMITED v. READ AND OTHERS.*

Ship — Salvage—Contract—Breach—Damages—Foreign judgment—Obtention by fraud—Injunction against enforcement.

The plaintiffs' steamer stranded in the Black Sea, and the defendant L., who was a British subject, agreed to try to salve her on the terms (inter alia) that security for payment of his remuneration should be arranged in London and that he would not arrest the ship unless there was an attempt to remove her before the security had been given. Security was given in London in accordance with the salvage contract, and the ship was refloated and taken to Constantinople for temporary repairs. Before she was ready to leave, the defendant L. brought an action against the master in the Turkish Court on the ground that the ship was about to be removed without security having been given. By order of the Turkish Court the ship was arrested, and, as the master had no evidence of what had been done in London and L. took an oath that security had not been given, the Turkish Court awarded L. £23,890. L. then disposed of the ship, and the plaintiffs brought this action, (1) for damages for breach of contract, (2) for a declaration that the Turkish judgment was invalid, and (3) for an injunction to prevent the Turkish judgment from being enforced.

* Reported by E. J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to damages including the value of the ship, and were not liable to be sued in England on the Turkish judgment ; and that as the judgment had been obtained by a British subject by fraud there must be an injunction restraining the enforcement of it in any part of the world.

Judgment of MacKinnon, J. (44 The Times L.R., 7), varied.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs against the decision of Mr. Justice MacKinnon (44 The Times L.R., 7).

The plaintiffs, Ellerman Lines, Limited, brought an action against three defendants, Count Z. Landi, Grech, and Read, for damages for breach of contract, for a declaration, and for an injunction.

In November, 1924, a steamer, the Falernian, belonging to the plaintiffs, stranded in the Black Sea. A salvage steamer, the Semper Paratus, of which, the plaintiffs said, the three defendants were joint owners, and of which the defendant Landi was master, came up. After negotiations the master of the Falernian entered into a salvage agreement with Landi on the terms of "no cure no pay." The agreement was in the usual form approved by Lloyd's and contained, inter alia, provisions that the remuneration for the salvage services should, in default of agreement, be fixed by arbitration in London ; that security for payment of that remuneration should be arranged in London ; and that the salvor would not arrest the ship except in the case of an attempt to remove her before security had been given.

The Falernian was refloated and taken to Constantinople, and was there placed in dry dock for temporary repairs to enable her to be towed to Marseilles for permanent repairs. The plaintiffs sent out a Dutch tug to tow her to Marseilles, and on July 6, 1925, she was ready to start. Meanwhile, Landi had taken steps to prevent her leaving Constantinople, and by order of the Turkish Court she was arrested on July 1. Landi had begun an action in that Court against the master of the Falernian on the ground that the ship was about to be removed without security having been given. The Court decided that the onus of showing that security had been given was on the master, and as he had no evidence at Constantinople of what had been done in London he could not discharge the onus. Landi took an oath that security had not been given, the master took no further part in the proceedings, and the Court gave judgment against him by default.

It appeared that in default of appearance by a defendant the Turkish Court did not go into the merits of the dispute, but gave judgment for the amount claimed by the plaintiff. They accordingly awarded Landi a sum amounting in English money to £23,890. Later, Landi allowed his brother to obtain judgment against him for an alleged debt of £2,500, and the brother took over the Falernian in satisfaction. He then sold her, and in the result she had passed irrevocably out of the hands of the plaintiffs.

Security had, in fact, been given in London in March, 1925, in accordance with the salvage contract, and by swearing that security had not been given Landi obtained the judgment of the Turkish Court by fraud.

In September, 1925, while the Falernian was still lying at Constantinople, the plaintiffs began this action in the English Courts. In the course of the proceedings they had obtained an interim injunction, restraining the defendants from enforcing their Turkish judgment. In the action the plaintiffs claimed, first, damages for breach of contract ; secondly, a declaration that the Turkish judgment had been obtained in circumstances which rendered it invalid ; and, thirdly, an injunction to prevent the defendants from enforcing the Turkish judgment. The defendants counterclaimed to enforce their judgment for the £23,890.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon held (1) that as the plaintiffs were not parties to the Turkish proceedings the doctrine of res judicata could not apply to the question of breach of contract and the plaintiffs were entitled to damages, but that those damages did not include the loss of the ship, since that was not a necessary consequence of the breach ; (2) that the Court had power to make the declaration asked for, and there would be a declaration that the plaintiffs were not liable to be sued in England on the Turkish judgment ; but (3) that the Court could not grant an injunction restraining the enforcement of the Turkish judgment in any part of the world.

The plaintiffs appealed. There was a cross-appeal by the defendants as to costs, which was dismissed.

Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Mr. David Davies appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Wilfrid Lewis and Mr. G. K. Rose for the defendants other than Grech, who was not represented.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in giving judgment, said that this was a curious and, fortunately for English commerce, an unusual case. After stating in detail the facts leading up to the injunction, his Lordship said that Mr. Justice MacKinnon had, for some reason, declined to grant an injunction to take effect outside the jurisdiction. He (the Lord Justice) was unable to share the Judge's doubts on the matter. This was a case of an English contract broken by Count Landi, a naturalized British subject. Considerable portions of the contract were to be performed here. It was proved that Landi had broken the contract and had, by fraud, obtained a foreign judgment against the British shipowners. He was proceeding to enforce that foreign judgment against the property of the persons with whom he had contracted. In such a case English Courts could always assert their power to stop a British subject who was before them from breaking his contract, and they would do it in this form. They did not grant an injunction to restrain the foreign Courts. They had no power to do so, but they did restrain the British subject from applying to those Courts to obtain the fruits of the judgment fraudulently obtained by him.

The law on this matter had been stated very clearly by Lord Brougham, L.C., in Lord Portarlington v. Soulby (3 Myl. & K., 104, at p. 107) thus :—

"In Love v. Baker (2 Freem., 125) it appears that one only of several parties who had begun proceedings in the Court of Leghorn was resident within the jurisdiction here, and the Court allowed the subpœna to be served on him, and that this should be good service on the rest. So far there seems to have been very little scruple in extending the jurisdiction. Lord Clarendon refused the injunction to restrain those proceedings at Leghorn, after advising with the other Judges ; but the report adds, 'sed quacre, for all the Bar was of another opinion' ; and it is said that, when the argument against issuing it was used that this Court had no authority to bind a foreign Court, the answer was given that the injunction was not directed to the foreign Court, but to the party within the jurisdiction here. A very sound answer as it appears to me ; for the same argument might apply to a Court within this country, which no order of this Court ever affects to bind, our orders being only pointed at the parties to restrain them from proceeding."

He (the Lord Justice) had no doubt that the English Courts had jurisdiction to restrain persons from taking proceedings in a foreign Court to obtain the fruits of a judgment obtained by fraud. He could not conceive that where the English Courts found that a British subject had taken proceedings in a foreign Court based on fraud the English Courts could not interfere. He thought it was quite clear that there was jurisdiction in the present case to grant an injunction restraining Count Landi from acting upon the Turkish judgment and that such an order ought to have been granted. In his opinion an order should be made for an injunction in the terms asked for in the statement of claim against each of the three defendants.

The remaining question to be dealt with referred to the damages. He proposed to alter the Judge's order by saying that the wages and expenses of master and crew should be allowed for a reasonable time in view of all the circumstances ; and, further, he held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the value of the ship as at the date when they were first deprived of her use by arrest.

For those reasons the appeal must be allowed.

Lord Justice Atkin said that he agreed. He thought that the English Courts were not so bankrupt of resources as not to be able to deal with a case of this kind. The principle which they asserted was not that they were entitled to assume jurisdiction over the foreign Courts. They had nothing to do with the jurisdiction of those Courts. The principle upon which they acted had reference only to the personal relation of the defendants and to their violation of the rules of equity. In this case he thought that it was essential that an injunction should be granted restraining the defendants from taking advantage of the judgment obtained by them by gross fraud.

Mr. Justice Eve said that he concurred. In his opinion the foreign proceedings had been instituted in clear breach of contract and a judgment had been obtained by deliberate misrepresentation. In these circumstances the plaintiffs were entitled to all the protection that the Courts could extend to them and there ought to be an injunction against each of the three defendants.

HIRSCH AND ANOTHER v. MONTREAL PROTESTANT SCHOOL COMMISSIONERS AND OTHERS.*

Canada — Quebec — Legislation — Validity —Education—Rights of Jews—British North America Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 3), s. 93—3 Edw. VII., c. 16 (Quebec statute), ss. 1, 6.

By s. 1 of the Quebec statute, 3 Edw. VII., c. 16, "Any provision to the contrary notwithstanding, in all the municipalities of the Province, whether governed, as regards schools, by the Education Act or by special laws, or by the Education Act and by special laws, persons professing the Jewish religion shall, for school purposes, be treated in the same manner as Protestants, and, for the said purposes, shall be subject to the same obligations and shall enjoy the same rights and privileges as the latter."

By s. 6, "After the coming into force of this Act, the children of persons professing the Jewish religion shall have the same right to be educated in the public schools of the Province as Protestant children, and shall be treated in the same manner as Protestants for all school purposes."

Held, that under s. 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, this statute is not ultra vires except so far as it would enable persons professing the Jewish religion to be appointed to the Protestant Board of School Commissioners in the City of Quebec or Montreal or to any Protestant Board of Examiners or to take part with Protestants in the establishment of a dissentient school outside those cities, and except so far as it would confer the right of attendance at dissentient schools outside the cities of Quebec and Montreal upon persons of religious faith different from that of the dissentient minority.

The Provincial Legislature can pass legislation to establish separate schools for persons who are neither Roman Catholics nor Protestants, provided that it does not interfere with the rights of the two Christian communities in their denominational schools.

* Reported by Sir W. J. Soulsby, Barrister-at-Law.

Decision of the Supreme Court of Canada ([1926] S.C.R., 246) varied.

Their LORDSHIPS affirmed, with certain variations, a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada ([1926] S.C.R., 246) relating to the education of Jewish children in the Province of Quebec. The appellants were two of the Jewish members of a Commission appointed in 1924 by the Lieutenant-Governor.

On the hearing of the arguments in December Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. St. Laurent, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), Mr. M. Alexander (K.C., Canada), and Mr. F. Gahan appeared for the appellants; Mr. G. A. Campbell, K.C., Mr. J. J. Creelman, K.C. (both of the Canadian Bar), and Mr. D. N. Pritt, K.C., for the Protestant School Commissioners; Mr. A. Perrault, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), for the Roman Catholic School Commissioners; Mr. Lanctot, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), for the Attorney-General for Quebec; Mr. Horace Douglas for the respondent Schubert: and Mr. Lafleur, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and Mr. D. N. Pritt, K.C., for the interveners.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said:—

This appeal, which raises questions of great importance in relation to public education in the Province of Quebec, had its first origin in the decision of the Superior Court of Quebec in 1903 in the case of Pinsler v. Protestant Board of School Commissioners of Montreal (23 Q.L.R., 365). In that case Mr. Justice Davidson held, on the construction of the Quebec Education Act of 1899, that a person professing the Jewish faith, not being the owner of real estate inscribed on the Protestant panel for the purposes of the city school tax, could not compel the Protestant School Commissioners to admit his son as of right to a school under their control. In consequence of this decision the Legislature of the Province passed in the year 1903 an Act (3 Edw. VII., c. 16) which provided as follows:—

"1. Any provision to the contrary notwithstanding, in all the municipalities of the Province, whether governed, as regards schools, by the Education Act or by special laws, or by the Eduction Act and by special laws, persons professing the Jewish religion shall, for school purposes, be treated in the same manner as Protestants, and, for the said purposes, shall be subject to the same obligations and shall enjoy the same rights and privileges as the latter. . . .

"6. After the coming into force of this Act, the children of persons professing the Jewish religion shall have the same right to be educated in the public schools of the Province as Protestant children, and shall be treated in the same manner as Protestants for all school purposes."

By the intervening sections (sections 2 to 5), provision was made for giving to the Protestant school authorities throughout the Province the benefit of school taxes and contributions paid by or in respect of persons professing the Jewish religion.

This statute was put in force for some years, but eventually—the number of Jewish children attending the Protestant schools in Montreal having greatly increased (it is said to have risen from 2,144 in 1903 to 11,974 in 1923)—it was found that the taxes and allowances received by the Protestant Board in respect of Jewish children were considerably less than the cost of educating those children, and a question was raised by the Board as to the validity of the Act of 1903. An Act passed by the Quebec Legislature in 1922 for increasing the subvention out of the school fund to the Protestant Board (12 Geo. V., c. 44) failed to put an end to the dispute, and on July 21, 1924, the Lieutenant-Governor appointed a Commission, upon which Roman Catholics, Protestants, and Jews were equally represented, to inquire into (among other things) the question of the instruction of Jewish children in the Protestant or other schools. The Commission, being divided in opinion as to the validity of the statute of 1903 and other matters, recommended that the Governor of Quebec should submit to the Court of Appeal and (if necessary) to the Privy Council the question of law which had been raised; and, accordingly, on February 3, 1925, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council submitted to the Court of King's Bench (Appeal Side) the following questions:—

"1. Is the Statute of Quebec of 1903, 3 Edward VII., c. 16, ultra vires?

"2. Under the said statute—

"(a) can persons of Jewish religion be appointed to the Protestant Board of School Commissioners of the City of Montreal?

"(b) is the Protestant Board of School Commissioners of the City of Montreal obliged to appoint Jewish teachers in their schools should they be attended by children professing the Jewish religion?

"3. Can the Provincial Legislature pass legislation providing that persons professing the Jewish religion be appointed—

"(a) to the Protestant Board of School Commissioners of the City of Montreal; or

"(b) to the Protestant Committee of Public Instruction; or

"(c) as Advisory Members of these bodies?

"4. Can the Provincial Legislature pass legislation obliging the Board of School Commissioners of the City of Montreal to appoint teachers professing the Jewish religion in their schools should they be attended by children professing that religion?

"5. Can the Provincial Legislature pass legislation providing for the appointment of persons professing the Jewish religion on the proposed Metropolitan Financial Commission outlined in the project submitted by Messrs. Hirsch and Cohen?

"6. Can the Provincial Legislature pass legislation to establish separate schools for persons who are neither Catholics nor Protestants?
